This brings me to a consideration of the special provisions of section 43. Now on the construction of that section I cannot say that I feel any doubt. It appears to me that under sub-section 2 the surplus income after providing for maintenance is to be accumulated for the benefit of the persons who become entitled to the "property" from which the income has arisen—that is to say, in this case the persons who become entitled to the corpus of the fund set apart; and those persons are not the daughter alone, but the daughter for life and the remaindermen after her death. So that the daughter becomes entitled only to the income of the ultimate fund arising from the original corpus of the fund and the surplus accumulated income combined. In my opinion, In re Scott was wrongly decided. I think that the grounds on which Buckley, J., based his judgment in that case—namely, that the tenant for life of the contingent legacy was entitled to the income during minority apart from the Act of 1881—was wrong, and led him to an erroneous way of construing section 43.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order of Joyce, J., who has declared that the unapplied income and accumulations of a settled legacy of £50,000 belong to the defendant Eva Bowlby, who has attained twenty-one. The order was made by the learned judge contrary to his own view, on the ground that the case was covered by Buckley, J.'s, decision in In re Scott; and this appeal is in truth brought to review that decision. Buckley, J., held that, according to the true construction of section 43, sub-section 2, of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, which directs trustees to accumulate the residue of income not applied for maintenance, and to hold accumulations for the benefit of the person who ultimately becomes entitled to the property from which the same arises, a tenant for life of a contingent share of residue who had attained twenty-one was entitled to the accumulations. I am unable to adopt this view. Subject to any "contrary intention" expressed in the instrument (sub-section 3), it seems to me that the words "property from which the same arises" mean the property the income arising from which has been accumulated. This involves, not that the persons interested in the capital will alone take, but that the accumulations become an accretion to the capital, with the result that all persons interested therein, whether as tenant for life or otherwise, will in due course and order take precisely the same interests as they take in the original capital. I cannot adopt the view that the accumulations of income arising before the contingency happens, belong to the person whose life interest does not commence until the contingency happens. I think, therefore, that the decision in In re Scott ought not to be followed.

It was assumed in In re Scott that section 43 authorized the trustees to allow maintenance and to accumulate the residue of the income; but I think this was not so. It is settled that section 43 has no application unless, apart from the Act, the infant would, under the terms of the will, be entitled to the arrears of income on attaining twenty-one: In re Dickson. This must mean either as tenant for life or absolutely. If a share of residue is given absolutely to an infant contingently on attaining twenty-one, the infant will be entitled to both capital and arrears of income on attaining twenty-one, and section 43 will apply. But if the infant only becomes tenant for life of the share of residue with its accretion on attaining twenty-one, the case does not fall within the language of section 43 as interpreted by the Court of Appeal.

The main stress of the argument before us was, however, based upon a ground which was not suggested in In re Scott. Put shortly, it may be stated as follows: A contingent legacy by a father to an infant child is an exception to the rule that interest is not payable until the contingency happens, and in such a case interest is payable from the testator's death until the happening of the contingency, and the child is entitled to have maintenance provided out of such interest, and the child has a vested interest in the whole of the income, or so much of the income as may not be applied for maintenance; and inasmuch as the object of section 43 was not to alter the rights of parties, the accumulations arising from the vested interest of the infant legatee must belong to the infant, there being an expression of a "contrary intention" within sub-section 3 of section 43 sufficient to negative the direction in sub-section 2: In re Humphreys. It is not easy to understand precisely on what principle the courts have for centuries proceeded in this matter. The words used by a testator have a different operation and effect according as the legatee is or is not an infant child of the testator. It appears to be a matter of construction, a presumption being raised that a father making a future vested or contingent provision for an infant child did not intend the infant to be deprived of maintenance in the meantime. It is, however, certainly not an absolute rule that in all cases a legacy by a father to an infant child carries interest from the death, for the presumption does not arise if a provision for maintenance out of other property is contained in the same will: Wynch v. Wynch, Ellis v. Ellis, and Donovan v. Needham, 9 Beav. 164. There are, moreover, authorities which show that interest allowed on such a legacy is not always allowed at the ordinary rate. On the other hand, there is no doubt that, whether we regard the language used by the text-writers or the form of order usually adopted by the court, the common means of providing maintenance has been to declare that the legacy carries interest from the death.

Upon the whole, however, I think that the true view is that the infant is entitled not to interest on the legacy as such, but only to maintenance, although for the purpose of creating a fund, and as a matter of convenience, the court has been in the habit of allowing an annual sum at the rate of 4 per cent. upon the amount of the legacy: Mole v. Mole. The case of Chambers v. Goldwin, where a provision for maintenance in the will ceased on the daughter's marriage at the age of eighteen, and she did not attain a vested interest in her legacy of £15,000 until twenty-one, is important. The legacy was expressly stated to carry interest at the rate of 6 per cent. from her attaining twenty-one. Lord Eldon there allowed maintenance for the interval between the marriage and the attainment of twenty-one, but not in the shape of interest on the legacy nor at the same rate at which it had been allowed up to marriage. On examining the record, it appears that the husband applied for and was allowed arrears of maintenance at the rate of £350 a year, and there is no trace of further payment having been made. Martin v. Martin is also important. There was a similar contingent legacy to the plaintiff, and a provision for maintenance up to the age of fifteen. Wood, V.C., gave maintenance not by giving interest on the legacy from the testator's death, but simply from the date when the provision in the will for maintenance ceased. Upon the whole, I think it is not correct to say that an infant child is entitled as of right to interest, as such, from the father's death until the contingency happens; and that being so, the contention on the part of the respondent fails. No authority has been produced in which this doctrine has ever been applied to a case in which the infant child is only tenant for life of the contingent legacy, and, if I had taken a different view on the main point, I am not prepared to say that I should have extended the doctrine to such a case.

I have thought it desirable to deal with the general principles raised before considering the particular language of this will, upon which, as it seems to me, the case might well be decided. The testator's eldest son had attained twenty-one, and was named executor and made a residuary legatee. A legacy of £50,000 is given to each of his younger sons who should attain twenty-five, and there is an express maintenance clause which provides that the accumulation should go in augmentation and so as to follow the destination of the legacy. The follows a legacy of £50,000 to each daughter who should attain twenty-one or marry with consent, with a declaration that the legacy should not vest absolutely in her, but should be retained by the trustees of the will and held by them upon trust to pay the income of such legacy to her for life, with various trusts over. The will subsequently authorized the trustees at their discretion to appropriate any part of his personal estate in or towards satisfaction of any legacy given by the will; and in the last clause but one of the will the testator directed that all his children should be made wards of court, and that "notwithstanding anything hereinbefore contained, all powers, whether statutory or otherwise, as to education, maintenance, or advancement of such children or any of them, while minors, shall be exercised by my trustees only under the direction of the said court." Now it seems to me clear that section 43 has no application unless and until an appropriation was made, for until that date it was impossible to say that any property was held by the trustees in trust for the infant. But an appropriation has been made by the trustees with the concurrence of the residuary legatee, who was in fact a party to the appropriation. This appropriation was in satisfaction of the contingent legacy. The testator has by this final clause manifested an intention that with reference to this appropriated fund section 43 shall apply in like manner as the express power of maintenance has to apply to the legacies to younger sons. In other words, he has said that section 43 shall be treated as applicable to the funds appropriated for the daughters' contingent legacies, even though, apart from that, section 43 would not be strictly applicable to the case. What, then, is the provision he has made? That the court shall say what allowance is to be made by the trustees for maintenance. This, and only this, is to be given. This is what has been done in fact. In the language of Sir William Grant in Hanson v. Graham, "whatever is not taken out of the fund for maintenance must follow the fate of the principal, whatever that may be." The daughter's life interest in the contingent legacy only arose on the happening of the contingency—that is, on her attaining twenty-one. Prior to that date she took no interest in the legacy as such, although she was entitled to a provision for maintenance out of the antecedent income arising from the appropriated fund. I do not think it can reasonably be held that she had a vested interest in the income of the appropriated fund for the period before the contingency itself happened. The result is that, in my opinion, the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Farrer & Co.; Kennedy, Ponsonby, & Ryde.

From K. B. Div.
(Collins, M.R., and Stirling and Mathew, L.JJ.) — Nov. 15.

POWELL AND THOMAS v. EVAN JONES & CO. (a.)

Principal and agent — Secret commission — Right of principal to recover from sub-agent—Fiduciary relation—Declaration with respect to commission payable in the future.

The defendants, being desirous of raising money by the issue of debentures in a company which they were promoting, applied to the plaintiffs for that purpose, offering them commission on the amount of the debentures issued. The plaintiffs arranged with C. that he should endeavour to obtain the required sum for the defendants from a certain society, and that he should receive a share of the commission. C. accordingly introduced the defendants to the society, and the society found the required sum and the debentures were issued through their instrumentality. C. received a secret commission from the society, and by an agreement between him and them certain further sums were to be payable by them to him in the way of commission on the transaction. The plaintiffs having brought an action against the defendants to recover the commission agreed between them, the defendants counterclaimed against the plaintiffs and C. to recover the amount of the secret commission.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the defendants were entitled to recover from C. the amount of the secret commission which he had received, and also to a declaration that, if C. should at any time receive further sums as commission from the society, he should become indebted to the defendants for such sums as he should receive them; but that they were not entitled to a declaration that C. was a trustee for them in respect of money which he might thereafter receive from the society.

Appeal from the judgment of Kennedy, J., at the trial of an action without a jury.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs, Percy Powell and H. J. Thomas, of Cardiff, against the defendants, Evan Jones & Co., of Cardiff, to recover £1,400, the amount of agreed commission at the rate of 2 per cent. on debentures to the amount of £70,000 issued by a company called the Field Line (Cardiff) (Limited). The plaintiffs alleged that the sum claimed was payable under the following agreement or commission note, which was dated the 7th of August, 1902, addressed to the plaintiffs, and signed by the defendants: "In consideration of your introducing to us the Law Guarantee and Trust Society for the purpose of negotiating a debenture issue in connection with a fleet of steamships, and of such negotiations resulting in business, we undertake to pay you a commission of 2 per cent. on the amount that may be mutually agreed between us and the said society to be advanced."

The defendants pleaded by way of defence (1) that no commission was earned, as no advance had been obtained for them through the instrumentality of the Law Guarantee and Trust Society; (2) that one Cowperthwaite, who had acted in the matter as the sub-agent of the plaintiffs, had improperly stipulated for and had received secret commission from the Law Guarantee and Trust Society, contrary to his duties, and that the plaintiffs were so far responsible for his acts that they were not entitled to recover their commission from the defendants. The defendants further counterclaimed against the plaintiffs and Cowperthwaite to recover the amount of the commission received by him from the Law Guarantee and Trust Society.

The material facts were as follows: In the spring of 1902 the defendants Evans Jones & Co., who were a firm of shipowners, formed the plan of creating a steamship company, to be called the Field Line (Cardiff) (Limited), and to be incorporated under the Companies Acts, and they were desirous of obtaining £70,000 by an issue of debentures, which were to be raised on the security of certain ships to be transferred to the company. With that purpose in view they entered into communication with the plaintiffs Powell and Thomas, offering them a commission on the amount of the debentures issued. The plaintiffs thereupon approached one Akenhead, who introduced Cowperthwaite to them. The plaintiffs arranged with Akenhead and Cowperthwaite that Cowperthwaite should endeavour to obtain for the defendants the required amount from the Law Guarantee and Trust Society, and that Akenhead and Cowperthwaite should receive certain shares of the commission. Cowperthwaite had previously had various business transactions with the Law Guarantee and Trust Society, and was stated to be an agent of theirs, though this was not known to the plaintiffs or to the defendants. On the 16th of July an interview took place between the plaintiffs, the defendants, and Cowperthwaite, when it was arranged that Cowperthwaite should introduce the defendants to the Law Guarantee and Trust Society, which was done. On the 7th of August the agreement or commission note above set out was signed. The Law Guarantee and Trust Society found the required sum, and the debentures were issued through their instrumentality. Without the knowledge of the plaintiffs or of the defendants it was arranged between Cowperthwaite and the Law Guarantee and Trust Society that he should receive the usual commission payable to their agents. He had already received £145 in respect of that commission, and it appeared that by his agreement with the society he was to be entitled to receive by way of further commission a certain percentage on the annual premiums payable on a sinking fund policy of insurance which was to be effected by the company with the society to ensure the ultimate payment of the amount of the debentures.

Kennedy, J., gave judgment for the plaintiffs on the claim, and the appeal from this part of the judgment was settled. As to the counterclaim, the learned judge came to the conclusion that either the defendants had adopted Cowperthwaite as their agent to negotiate the loan, or, at any rate, there was a fiduciary relation between them, and, upon the authority of De Bussche v. Alt, 8 Ch. D. 286, 26 W. R. Dig. 192, in either view of the case, he held that the defendants were entitled to recover from him the secret commission which he received. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendants as against Cowperthwaite for the amount of the secret commission received by him; and he further made a declaration that, if Cowperthwaite should at any time receive further sums as commission from the Law Guarantee and Trust Society, he should become indebted to the defendants for such sum or sums as and when he should receive the same.

Cowperthwaite appealed from the judgment on the counterclaim, and the defendants gave cross-notice of appeal.

Buckmaster, K.C., and H. M. Sturges, for Cowperthwaite.—Cowperthwaite acted solely for the plaintiffs, and there was no evidence of any privity of contract between him and the defendants. Whatever right the plaintiffs may have to recover the secret commission from him, the defendants have no such right. In this case there was no necessary implication of authority to employ a sub-agent, as there was in De Bussche v. Alt.

J. Eldon Bankes, K.C., and Holman Gregory, for the defendants, in support of the cross-appeal.—The declaration made by the learned judge is insufficient. The defendants ask for a declaration that they are entitled to any benefit which Cowperthwaite may have under his agreement with the Law Guarantee and Trust Society for secret commission. If by reason of the decision in Lister & Co. v. Stubbs, 38 W. R. 548, 45 Ch. D. 1, they are not entitled to a declaration of trust, they are at least entitled to declaration of agency—that is, that Cowperthwaite was acting as their agent when he made his agreement for commission with the Law Guarantee and Trust Society.

COLLINS, M.R.:—The question is whether or not, in the circumstances of this case, the borrowers, Evan Jones & Co., are entitled to recover from Cowperthwaite the amount of commission which he has received from the lenders, the Law Guarantee and Trust Society. It is argued on the part of Cowperthwaite that they are not, because there was no privity of contract between them and him. The argument is that Cowperthwaite was introduced into the transaction merely as a sub-agent, that he acted in the matter for Powell and Thomas, and not as agent for Evan Jones & Co., and that there was no privity between him and Evan Jones & Co. The learned judge at the trial seems to have come to the conclusion that in fact there was privity of contract between Evan Jones & Co. and Cowperthwaite. But he was clearly also of opinion that, whether there was such privity or not, there was a fiduciary relationship between them which debarred Cowperthwaite from making a secret profit out of the transaction without the consent of Evan Jones & Co. I am of opinion that the learned judge was right in law and fact. If it were necessary to establish privity of contract, which, in my judgment, it is not, I think there was abundant evidence that, with the assent of all parties, Evan Jones & Co. did make Cowperthwaite their agent for reward. But beyond that, as the learned judge also held, inasmuch as Cowperthwaite knew that Powell and Thomas, in employing him, were acting as agents for Evan Jones & Co., for the purpose of procuring a loan for them, he stood in such a fiduciary position towards Evan Jones & Co. as debarred him from acting in a manner contrary to their interests. He was under a personal incapacity to receive a private reward from the lenders without the knowledge of Evan Jones & Co. The judgment of the learned judge was clearly right so far as regards the money already received by Cowperthwaite from the Law Guarantee and Trust Society.

I think it is equally clear, after considering the case of Lister & Co. v. Stubbs, that the declaration made by the learned judge was also right, and that though Cowperthwaite is a debtor to Evan Jones & Co. in respect of all sums actually received by him under the contract for commission made by him with the Law Guarantee and Trust Society, yet Evan Jones & Co. are not entitled to a declaration that Cowperthwaite is a trustee for them in respect of money which he may hereafter receive. He cannot be compelled to enforce the contract so far as it has not been enforced for their benefit. In the case cited Lindley, L.J., said as follows: "The real state of the case as between Lister & Co. and Varley & Co. and Stubbs in this. Lister & Co., through their agent Stubbs, buy goods of Messrs. Varley at certain prices and pay for them. The ownership of the goods, of course, is in Lister & Co.; the ownership of the money is in Messrs. Varley. Then Messrs. Varley have entered into an arrangement with Stubbs, who ordered the goods of them, to give Stubbs a commission. That is what it comes to. What is the legal position between Messrs. Varley and Stubbs? They owe him the money. He can recover it from them by an action, unless the illegality of the transaction afford them a defence; but the appellants have asked us to go further and to say that Messrs. Varley were Stubbs's agents in getting his commission from Lister & Co. That appears to me to be an entire mistake. The relation between Messrs. Varley and Stubbs is that of debtor and creditor—they pay him. Then comes the question as between Lister & Co. and Stubbs, whether Stubbs can keep the money he has received without accounting for it? Obviously not. I apprehend that he is liable to account for it the moment that he gets it. It is an obligation to pay and account to Messrs. Lister & Co., with or without interest, as the case may be. I say nothing at all about that. But the relation between them is that of debtor and creditor; it is not that of trustee and cestui que trust. We are asked to hold that it is—which would involve consequences which, I confess, startle me." These observations seem to me to apply to the present case, and they show that Evan Jones & Co. are not entitled to any declaration larger than the one which they have got. They have the right to receive any money which may be paid to Cowperthwaite by way of commisson under his agreement with the Law Guarantee and Trust Society, and to that extent they are entitled to a declaration of title. But, unless and until any money payable under the agreement comes into the hands of Cowperthwaite, Evan Jones & Co. have no right in respect of it. I think, therefore, that both the appeal and the cross-appeal must be dismissed.

STIRLING and MATHEW, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeals dismissed.

Solicitor for Cowperthwaite, C. F. Ingram.

Solicitors for the defendants, Williamson, Hill, & Co., for Ingledew & Sons, Cardiff.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. }
Buckley, J. } Dec. 16, 21.

GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY CO. v. FISHER. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Covenants for title—Defect in title—Right of way—Railway company—Compensation—Breach of covenants—Measure of damages—Solicitor and client costs—Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 7.

F. sold land to a railway company, conveying it as beneficial owner. He had previously granted a right of way over part of it, which had become vested in J. The company knew at the time of the conveyance that other persons probably had rights over the land. The intention of the parties was, however, that, as between themselves, the land should be conveyed freed from any rights of way over it. The company blocked the land over which J.'s right of way existed. J. claimed and was awarded in arbitration a certain sum as compensation for loss of his way. The company, contesting his right of way, defended an action brought against them by J. to establish it and enforce the award, and had judgment given against them with costs. They then sued F. for damages for breach of his covenants for title.

Held, that the action lay; that the damages were (1) the sum awarded to J. as compensation; (2) the costs of J. in the arbitration paid by the company; and (3) their own costs therein, and that these latter were the costs taxed as between solicitor and client.

But held, that the damages did not include the costs of the action brought by J. against the company, who should not have defended it.

Turner v. Moon, 50 W. R. 237, [1901] 2 Ch. 825, followed.

Barnett v. Corporation of Eccles, [1900] 2 Q. B. 423, 48 W. R. Dig. 101. distinguished.

This was an action for breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment and freedom from incumbrances implied by the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, upon a sale for value by the beneficial owner.

Before the year 1899, the defendant, as owner in fee simple of the Drayton Park estate, in the parish of Hanwell, had deposited with the Hanwell District Council plans showing the laying out of the estate in plots abutting upon certain roads, one of which was Tennyson-road.

By indentures of the 7th of February, 1899, and the 23rd of October, 1899, the defendant conveyed certain plots lying upon that estate, and abutting on the western end of Tennyson-road, with the result that they became vested in J. C. Johnstone, and by the conveyance there was granted by the defendant a right of way over Tennyson-road. On the 14th of June, 1900, an agreement was executed for the sale by the defendant to the plaintiffs, for £11,000, of 8 acres 22 perches of land, being a number of plots on the Drayton Park estate abutting on both sides of Tennyson-road itself. That agreement was carried into effect by a conveyance of the 13th of August, 1900. That conveyance referred to the plans deposited with the district council, and the conveyance granted to the plaintiffs a certain right of way over so much of Tennyson-road as was shown on the plan upon the conveyance, "in common with all other persons entitled to use the same." The same plan was on the agreement.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Tennyson-road shown upon the plan was only the western end of the road, and a piece adjoining on the east to that western end, upon which piece the road was indicated as constructed as to half its width on the land sold to the plaintiffs. Except to this extent the road was not in that plan shown as continuing eastward over the land which the plaintiffs bought. The agreement and conveyance both provided that the plaintiffs should erect and for ever maintain a certain fence five feet high in certain places where its erection would stop and close the road at its eastern end, as shown on that plan. The land conveyed to the plaintiffs was coloured red on the plan on the conveyance. In the conveyance the defendant was expressed to convey to the plaintiffs "as beneficial owner in fee simple." The agreement for sale contained recitals, which are referred to in the judgment, suggesting that the plaintiffs were going to erect a railway upon the land.

At the time when the plaintiffs acquired the land they knew that the estate had been plotted out, and that intended roads had been shown, as above mentioned; that Tennyson-road had been pegged out throughout its entire length, although not constructed; that plots had previously been sold on the estate; and that some of these plots were at the western end of Tennyson-road.

The plaintiffs, having acquired the land, constructed railway sidings upon it, and thus blocked and destroyed the road.

In July, 1902, Johnstone claimed £5,000 compensation for the loss of his way over that part of the road so blocked up and destroyed. The matter went to arbitration, the company appointing an arbitrator under protest, with the result that in June, 1903, the arbitrator awarded a sum of £510 as compensation. After the award was made the plaintiffs did not—as his lordship said it seemed to him they ought to have done—pay the amount awarded, and seek to recover against the defendant their damages up to that time, but they allowed an action to be brought upon the award, and defended the action with a view to raising the question whether Johnstone was entitled to any right of way over so much of Tennyson-road as the plaintiffs had blocked. In the result a special case was stated upon which Bigham, J., found against the company, deciding in fact that Johnstone had a right of way over the whole of the road.

The plaintiffs thereupon brought this action against their vendor, Fisher, claiming as damages, first, £510, the amount they had paid as compensation to Johnstone; secondly, the costs they had had to pay on the arbitration and in the action; and thirdly, their own costs as between solicitor and client in the arbitration and in the action.

Cripps, K.C., and Howard Wright, for the plaintiff company.—The defendant, having conveyed to the company as beneficial owner, is liable under the covenants for title implied by the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, s. 7, to indemnify the company against the loss which has been occasioned to them in consequence of the right of way existing over part of the land conveyed, a right of way created by the defendant himself: Turner v. Moon, 50 W. R. 237, [1901] 2 Ch. 825. And it makes no difference that the purchasers knew of the defect of title, or even that it was disclosed on the conveyance: Page v. Midland Railway Co., 42 W. R. 116, [1894] 1 Ch. 11. In addition to other damages the plaintiffs are entitled to have repaid to them all their own costs in the arbitration proceedings (Sutton v. Baillie, 40 W. R. 28; Rolph v. Crouch, 16 W. R. 252, L. R. 3 Ex. 44) taxed as between solicitor and client: Smith v. Compton, 3 B. & Ad. 407.

Buckmaster, K.C., and W. Mackenzie, for the defendant.—The plaintiffs were put upon their inquiry, and if they had inquired they would have discovered the existence of the right of way. It was in fact disclosed on the conveyance. They cannot therefore sue on the covenants for title in respect of it: Oldfield v. Pound, 5 Ves. 508. They could not have resisted an action for specific performance at the suit of their vendor, and still less can they sue him on his covenants for title. The costs connected with the arbitration were unnecessarily incurred. The company should have paid the money due for compensation at once without going to arbitration. They cannot therefore be recovered as damages: Baxendale v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., 23 W. R. 167, L. R. 10 Exch. 35. It is no answer to say that they could not tell the amount of the compensation; that observation would apply to every defendant against whom an action is brought for unliquidated damages. In any case the costs must be those taxed as between party and party, and not as between solicitor and client: Barnett v. Corporation of Eccles, [1900] 2 Q. B. 423.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 21.—BUCKLEY, J., after stating the facts: At the time when the plaintiffs acquired the land they knew, as it seems to me, that such a state of things existed as that possibly or probably previous purchasers of land upon the estate had so taken their conveyances as that they would be entitled to rights over Tennyson-road, including so much of it as was included in the estate within the land coloured red on the plaintiffs' conveyance. I am satisfied, however, that as between the plaintiffs and defendant the bargain was made upon the footing that such rights of way, if any, over the land sold to the plaintiffs, as previous purchasers possessed should be abrogated, and that the plaintiffs should take the land discharged from those rights if they existed. [His lordship referred to a letter of the 6th of April, 1900, and to certain negotiations which took place before the purchase by the plaintiffs.] When I come to look at the conveyance and the plan upon it, the same thing is, to my mind, clear. The recital of the agreement of sale is that the price shall include compensation for various things which never could come into contemplation unless the railway company were going to use the land for the purpose of laying a line of railway upon it. These, it is said, are common form words in the cases of purchases by railway companies. This is true, but I cannot on that account disregard them. The conveyance further contains a provision that the plaintiffs are to erect and for ever maintain the fence which I have mentioned, and which, if constructed, will necessarily prevent the user of the road beyond the place where the purchased land first attains its greater width from north to south. Having regard to these facts it is, in my opinion, plain that as between the defendant as vendor and the plaintiffs as purchasers the bargain was that so much of Tennyson-road as lay upon the plaintiffs' land should be abandoned, and if any rights of third parties were interfered with, it would result that it was for the defendant to make good to the plaintiffs any diminution in value of the property which as between them was the subject of the agreement and conveyance. The plaintiffs say that they are entitled to damages against the defendant, and that the damages are first, £510; secondly, the costs they have to pay on the arbitration and in the action; and thirdly, their own costs as between solicitor and client in the arbitration and action. I have to decide whether in this they are right.

It was decided by Joyce, J., in Turner v. Moon, that in an action for damages for breach of the covenant for title implied by section 7 of the Conveyancing and Law on Property Act, 1881 (which is this case), damages may be recovered for defect of title by reason of the existence of an undisclosed right of way. Upon the point there decided I simply follow, without expressing any opinion of my own, the decision of my brother Joyce. The defendant argues, however, that the plaintiffs here are not entitled to damages because they knew of the rights subsisting between Johnstone and Fisher (the defendant). I think they did know, but I also think that, for the reasons which I have stated, Fisher's conveyance was as between himself and the plaintiffs a conveyance intended to be a conveyance of the land discharged from those rights. It was decided in Levett v. Witherington, 1 Lutw. 317, that mere notice to a purchaser of a defect of title does not bar his right to recover; and in Page v. Midland Railway Co. it was further decided that no difference is to be made by reason of the fact that the defect of title appears upon the face of the conveyance. "There is no warrant" said Lindley, L.J., "for qualifying the Acts covenanted against by inserting 'save as herein appears,' or 'save as shown by the abstract,' or 'save as explained before the execution of this deed,' or any words to any such effect. If a vendor does not intend that his covenant for title shall extend to defects disclosed to the purcaser, whether on the face of the deed, or aliunde, the vendor must take care not to word his covenant so as in terms to cover such defects, or he must insert some clause in the deed clearly explaining and controlling his covenant." The knowledge which the purchasers here obtained by seeing the estate plan and knowing of the previous sales of plots upon the footing of that plan, was notice outside the conveyance. The fact that the plan had been deposited with the Hanwell District Council, and that other persons were entitled to use some portion at least of Tennyson-road, was notice on the face of the conveyance, but neither the one nor the other justifies the insertion into the conveyance of words qualifying the covenant in respect of the acts covenanted against. There was in this conveyance no express covenant which required qualification, but there was an implied covenant and, having regard to the decision in Turner v. Moon this implied covenant, unless qualified, gives rise to a right to damages. I have no doubt myself but that the defendant knew that the company contemplated the use, and intended that the company should use the purchased land in such a manner as that Tennyson-road, so far as it lay on that land, should never be constructed. I think that the defendant is liable in damages.

Then what is the measure of damages? It is, first, the £510 which the plaintiffs have been compelled to pay in order to enjoy the land in the actual state in which by the contract they were to enjoy it. To this is to be added, I think, the costs to which they were necessarily put in determining in the arbitration that £510 was the proper figure. Johnstone had claimed £5,000. Under section 68 of the Act of 1845, the company were bound either to admit that to be the figure or to proceed to arbitration. They did the latter, with the result that £510 was the amount awarded, and they had to pay the costs of Johnstone taxed as between party and party, and their own costs of the arbitration proceedings. They are, I think, entitled to recover all those as damages: Rolph v. Crouch. Then subsequently the company defended the action on the award. They cannot, in my opinion, claim as damages any of the costs which they either had to pay or which they incurred in that proceeding. They knew the facts from which they ought to have been aware that the rights were such as Bigham, J., subsequently decided them to be; and they ought not to have put Johnstone to bring the action. Those costs are not legal damages as between them and Fisher. I think, however, that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the £510 and the taxed costs which they had to pay in the arbitration proceedings, and their own costs in the arbitration, and I give judgment for the damages thus ascertained, and the costs of the action. The costs of the plaintiffs in the arbitration must be their costs as between solicitor and client. This case is not the same as Barnett v. Corporation of Eccles. There is a distinction between cases where a person is entitled to an indemnity and where a person is simply recovering damages. In the one case he gets solicitor and client costs, in the other case not. The costs of the company are those they incurred. The matter must be treated as if Fisher, and not the railway company, had been the party opposing Johnstone, in which case, of course, they must have paid the costs of their own solicitor.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Jan. 18.—The matter was mentioned again on this date.

H. E. Wright, for the plaintiffs, said that a question had arisen as to whether the damages ought to include interest upon the £510 which the plaintiffs had had to pay. This interest was claimed in the statement of claim, and he submitted that the plaintiffs were entitled to it.

W. Mackenzie, for the defendant, submitted that such interest was not payable. The claim in the statement of claim was not a demand within the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 28: Rhymney Railway Co. v. Rhymney Iron Co., 38 W. R. 764, 25 Q. B. D. 146.

His lordship said that he had not intended the £510 to exclude interest upon it, which he thought that the plaintiffs were entitled to have.

Solicitors, R. R. Nelson; Mills, Currie, & Gaskell.

Chan. Div. } Jan. 12, 13.
Joyce, J. }

AINSWORTH v. WILDING. (a.)

Mortgage—Mortgagee in possession—Sale of part of mortgaged estate—Redemption—Account—Rests.

A mortgagee in possession from time to time sold portions of the mortgaged property. He had in his hands at the dates of such sales a balance of rents and profits over disbursements.

(a.) Reported by R. FRANKLIN STUBBING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the accounts were properly taken without making rests in the account of rents and profits at the date of each sale.

Thompson v. Hudson, 18 W. R. 1081, L. R. 10 Eq. 497, considered and explained.

Wrigley v. Gill, [1905] 1 Ch. 241, followed.

Held, also, that the expenses of a sale of mortgaged property are correctly deducted from the gross proceeds of the sale, and only the net proceeds must be brought into the account, although the mortgagee has in his hands a balance of rents and profits sufficient to pay such expenses.

Adjourned summons.

For some years previous to 1877 Richard and John Wilding acted as solicitors for one John Smith, who was a builder and quarry-owner, and they made large advances to him from time to time; they also acted as his agents, and received rents and other moneys on his account.

On the 7th of October, 1877, Smith gave the Wildings a mortgage on certain freehold and leasehold property to secure the sum of £12,500 with interest at 5 per cent. This sum was the amount which, according to the Wildings, was then due to them from Smith. But Smith was not satisfied that he owed them so much. In January, 1878, the Wildings gave Smith twenty-four hours' notice of their intention to sell the mortgaged property unless he paid off the amount. Smith at once brought an action against them for an account of what was due on their mortgage and for redemption.

Thomas Ainsworth was Smith's solicitor in this action until the summer of 1879, when a change of solicitors took place.

On the 28th of March, 1878, Malins, V.C., made a decree in Smith's action declaring that the mortgage of the 7th of October, 1877, ought to stand as a security for what was due at that date from Smith to the Wildings on the balance of account of the dealings and transactions between them with interest at 5 per cent. from the 7th of October, 1877. The decree went on to direct an account of what was due to the Wildings for principal and interest on their security, having regard to the declaration, and the judgment then proceeded to decree redemption in the ordinary way. The costs were reserved, but the Vice-Chancellor intimated his intention of making the Wildings pay all the costs if less than £12,500 was found on taking the accounts to be due from Smith to the Wildings on the 7th of October, 1877.

Under this decree accounts were carried in in the nature of an ordinary current account between the parties in which interest was calculated not only on what Smith owed the Wildings, but also on what the Wildings owed Smith for moneys received by them for him as his agents. There was much disputing over the accounts as to the true balance, but ultimately on the 4th of August, 1879, after Ainsworth had ceased to act for Smith, the accounts were agreed to and Smith signed a memorandum stating that on the 7th of October, 1877, he owed the Wildings on their security £11,805 3s. 1d., and he agreed to settle the action on those terms, and to pay his own costs and £100 towards the defendants' costs. This ended the disputes between Smith and the Wildings, and an order staying the proceedings on these terms was drawn up on the 9th of August, 1879, the £100 to be paid within two months. Previously, on the 8th of February, 1879, Smith had mortgaged the same property as that comprised in the mortgage of October, 1877, but subject to it, to Ainsworth.

In October, 1879, the Wildings entered into possession of the mortgaged property and from time to time sold portions of it. Smith never paid off any part of the principal money secured by the mortgage of October, 1877, and was adjudicated a bankrupt on the 21st of January, 1884, and died in 1892.

Richard Wilding died in 1884, leaving John Wilding solely entitled to the mortgage.

On the 22nd of August, 1890, Ainsworth, who was not a party to the former action, brought an action against John Wilding, Smith, and a third mortgagee for an account of what was due on the security of the 7th of October, 1877, for redemption, for foreclosure against the third mortgagees, and for damages against J. Wilding for alleged sales at an undervalue.

Ainsworth died in December, 1890, and the action was continued by his executors, the present plaintiffs.

After much intervening litigation as to an alleged consent judgment (see Ainsworth v. Wilding, 44 W. R. 540, [1896] 1 Ch. 673, and Wilding v. Sanderson, 45 W. R. 462. 675, [1897] 2 Ch. 534), this action was continued and the statement of claim as finally amended, in addition to what was asked in the original claim, asked to have an account of all the dealings and transactions between John Smith and the Wildings taken upon the principle of a current account, and, if necessary, that the alleged settled account might be re-opened.

The action came before Joyce. J., who made an order on the 3rd of August, 1901, declaring that the deed of the 7th of October, 1877, should stand as security for what was due at that date from Smith to the Wildings on the balance of account between them, together with interest at 5 per cent. from the 7th of October, 1877, and directing that the following accounts should be taken:

1. An account of what, having regard to the above declaration, was due to John Wilding under his security, such account to be taken as an ordinary mortgagee's account and to commence with the balance of £11,799 15s. 1d., being the sum of £11,805 3s. 1d. appearing in the account filed in the action of Smith v. Wilding, less £5 8s., the amount of one bill of costs, which account was to be treated as a settled account up to the 7th of October, 1877.

2. An account of the rents and profits of the property comprised in the mortgage of the 7th of October, 1877, received by the defendant or on his behalf.

3. An inquiry as to what parts of the property comprised in the said mortgage had been sold, and for what sums of money and by whom they had been received.

4. An account of the proceeds of any sale received by the defendant on his behalf.

The accounts had since been carried into chambers. They were in three parts. The first part was an account of the principal and interest due on the security, in which rests had been taken on the sale of any property by bringing in the net proceeds of such sale according to Thompson v. Hudson, 18 W. R. 1081, L. R. 10 Eq. 497. The second part was an account of the rents and profits and disbursements taken without any rests, and the third part was an account of the proceeds of sale of the property in which the expenses of sale had been deducted from the gross proceeds and only the net proceeds carried into the principal and interest account.

There had been a balance of rents and profits over disbursements since January, 1885. Rests had been taken in the principal and interest account on the 29th of November, 1886, the 2nd of December, 1890, and the 18th of November, 1891, when portions of the property had been sold.

The surplus of rents and profits in the hands of the mortgagee on the 29th of November, 1886, was £233, on the 2nd of December, 1890, £1,118, and on the 18th of November, 1891, £1.166.

No rests had been taken since 1891 of the principal and interest account as there had been no sales subsequent to that date. The surplus rents and profits were not sufficient to pay the interest.

Objection was taken to certain items in the defendant's account which were adjourned to be dealt with by the judge.

The question for decision was whether the true effect of Thompson v. Hudson was that a general rest should be made in the principal and interest account by bringing in not only the proceeds of the sale, the occasion for the rest, but also any balance of rents and profits in the hands of the mortgagee at the date of such sale.

Younger, K.C., and Leigh Clare, for the plaintiffs, the representatives of Thomas Ainsworth.—These accounts are supposed to be prepared according to the decision in Thompson v. Hudson, rests being made whenever any of the mortgaged property was sold, the net proceeds of the sale being brought in and deducted from the principal debt and interest then due, but according to a true view of Thompson v. Hudson whenever a sale takes place a general rest ought to be made of all moneys in the mortgagee's hands, irrespective of where it was derived from. In Thompson v. Hudson the sale was only the occasion for the rest. What was brought into account was much more than the proceeds of the sale of the house at Albert-gate. Rests are not decreed as a matter of course, a case for them has to be made out—viz., if a mortgagee enters into possession when no interest is in arrear. In the present case annual rests would not be decreed because the interest was in arrear. The reasoning of Turner, L.J., in Nelson v. Booth, 6 W. R. 845, 3 De Gex & J. 119, that a mortgagee is not bound to receive his money by driblets, does not apply to a sale of part of the property, because by the sale the mortgagee shows his willingness to receive so much of his debt; and as surplus rents and profits are applicable in discharge of principal and interest as well as proceeds of sale, there is no reason why, the occasion for the rest having arisen by the action of the mortgagee—viz., by the sale—there should not be a general rest not only of the proceeds of such sale, but also of the balance of rents and profits in the mortgagee's hands at the date of such sale. As the mortgagee had in his hands rents and profits sufficient to pay the expenses of each sale, the amount brought into the principal and interest account ought to be the gross proceeds of such sale, and the expenses ought not to be deducted, but paid for out of the rents and profits.

Hughes, K.C., and Austen Cartmell, for John Wilding, the mortgagee.—The decision in Thompson v. Hudson only went to this point, that a mortgagee must bring into account the proceeds of sale and set them off against the principal and interest due at the date of the sale. The Master of the Rolls did not consider the question of rents and profits. The point was considered in the recent case of Wrigley v. Gill, [1905] 1 Ch. 241, by Warrington, J., who held it was not the usual practice in taking accounts against a mortgagee in possession to make rests in the account of rents and profits, at the date of the sale of the mortgaged property merely on the ground of such sale, and that Thompson v. Hudson was an exceptional case. In Nelson v. Booth Turner, L.J., pointed out that a mortgagee was not bound to receive his money by driblets, but different considerations arise if he sells part of the property; it was only equitable that he should bring in the proceeds of the sale, as he was realizing part of the corpus, and there was no rest, only a discharge of security pro tanto; but it was impossible to invest driblets. The reasoning that applied to corpus was quite different to that which applied to rents and profits which were only fruit. [JOYCE, J.—I cannot find a word in the reports of Thompson v. Hudson that rents and profits were taken into account; from the report in the Law Journal it is clear that only the proceeds of sale were taken into account; nothing is said in the order as to rents and profits.] The reasoning of the Master of the Rolls refers solely to the proceeds of sale, and looking at all the materials it is now clear that Thompson v. Hudson did not decide anything as to bringing in rents and profits in making a rest on the occasion of a sale, and further, it is against the ordinary practice.

Younger, K.C., replied.

JOYCE, J.—This action of Ainsworth v. Wilding, as I understand it, is practically an action for redemption by a second mortgagee against the first mortgagee, and a decree was made by me on the 3rd of August, 1901, directing (with some directions immaterial for the present purpose) common accounts. That decree contains no direction for making rests, and I see no reason for adding such a direction now, even if it would be allowable for me to do so. The accounts have been brought in, and what has been done as to sales of property has been this: The receipts from the sales have been brought in as debits against the mortgagee and credits to the mortgagor in the first account—namely, the account which is practically an account of what is due on the security, and brought in at the date of receipt.

Now what has been contended for by the plaintiffs has been this: They have started what, to my mind, is a new and ingenious theory, that whenever a mortgagee brings in an account of what he has received from a sale a rest is to be made at that date in the account of rents and profits, so as to bring in any balance which would be in the hands of the mortgagee from the rents and profits. No authority for this proposition has been or, I believe, could be cited, but this was said to have been done in the well-known case of Thompson v. Hudson, 18 W. R. 1081, L. R. 10 Eq. 497, and to be really involved in the decision in that case. Now the law or practice, whichever you call it, on this subject has recently been stated, and, I think, correctly stated by Warrington, J., in the case of Wrigley v. Gill, where he says that the practice is this: "The first account—that is, the account of what is due—is treated as separate from the account of rents and profits. If money is received from an exercise of the power of sale the money is credited to the mortgagor under the first account—that is, the account of what is due—at the date at which it is received, but unless rests have been directed in the judgment the accounts of rents and profits, following the usual rule, goes on without rests." And later on he says: "The ordinary rule is admitted that in the absence of special circumstances the account against a mortgagee in possession is not directed with rests—that is to say, the account of rents and profits runs on from beginning to end without reference to the question whether he has at any particular time had in his hands more than sufficient to pay the interest or not, the reason being that a mortgagee is not bound to accept payment by driblets, but is entitled to have the account taken as a whole, and not to be treated as repaid until that account has been so taken." Now, on further investigation it turns out that Thompson v. Hudson is no authority against what Warrington, J., has stated. Certainly the question as to making the rest in the account of rents and profits does not appear in any of the reports to have been argued or even referred to. No doubt the Master of the Rolls does mention a very large sum as having been received, a sum so large that, I suppose, it was thought by some of the counsel, and by myself too, that it must have consisted in great part of receipts in respect of rents and profits. But, on looking into the contemporaneous reports of the case, it appears in the report in the Law Journal, 40 L. J. Ch., there having been two mortgages in the case of Thompson v. Hudson (which is quite an immaterial circumstance), and the interest on both mortgages being in arrear, the plaintiffs entered into possession of all the mortgaged property. The date of the entry into possession is given in the report in the WEEKLY REPORTER as 1861. The report in the Law Journal, at p. 28, reads: "And from time to time, previous to May, 1861, sold portions of the Whitby estate, and applied the proceeds in reduction of interest on both mortgages, so as to leave in that month only about £1,000 due in respect of such interest." It appears that the plaintiffs had been in possession but a very short time. I conclude from these reports that the sums received consisted of receipts in respect of purchase-money of various lots of the Whitby estate, the aggregate of which sums so received as purchase-money, until the £21,600 was received from the Albert-gate house, was less than the interest due by £1,000. If possibly it could be ascertained that any part of the amount received in that case was received in respect of rents, there was no order that it was to be applied in reduction of interest, but the mortgagee himself gave credit for the amount. On the whole I see no reason whatever to suspect that there could have been anything of the kind, or that there had been any receipt of rents at all. Taking that report alone there is certainly no decision, express or implied, that what, had been received in respect of rents must be given credit for against interest due at the date of the sale, and when we look at the order itself it is perfectly plain that no such order was made, because the only order made was as follows: "His lordship being of opinion that the sale moneys received by the plaintiffs from the sale of the mortgage properties are to be applied first in payment of interest, costs, and expenses due to them at the dates when such sale moneys were respectively received, and then in reduction of principal due at these dates respectively, refers the certificate back to chambers to vary."

It appears to me to be an entirely new theory that a rest is to be made in the account of rents and profits whenever—because it must go to that length—any sale of any kind took place of any part of the mortgage property. In my opinion the objection raised to the account on this ground fails, and the account must be taken in the way I have stated without making rests, and no rest is to be made in the account of rents and profits.

The costs of any sale of the mortgage property are always deducted from the gross amount of the proceeds of the sale, and only the net proceeds of the sale are brought into the account of what is due notwithstanding there may be a balance of rents and profits in the hands of the mortgagee sufficient to pay the expenses of the sale.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Bower, Cotton, & Bower.

Solicitors for the defendants, Robbins, Billing, & Co.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Phillimore and Kennedy, JJ.) July 12, 1904.

SCOTT v. PILLINER. (a.)

Local government—Bye-law—Sale of paper devoted wholly to giving probable result of races and other competitions—Validity of bye-law—Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 4), s. 16.

A county council purporting to act under the powers granted to them by section 16 of the Local Government Act, 1888, made a bye-law imposing a penalty on any person frequenting and using any street or other public place "for the purpose of selling or distributing any paper or written or printed matter devoted wholly or mainly to giving information as to the probable result of races, steeplechases, or other competitions."

Held (by Lord Alverstone L.C.J., and Kennedy, J., Phillimore, J., dissenting), that the bye-law was invalid, as it was in its terms unreasonable.

Case stated.

An information was preferred against the appellant by the respondent, a superintendent of police, charging him with frequenting and using on the 19th of April, 1904, a certain street or public place situate in the parish of Handsworth, and called Soho-street, and then and there selling or distributing a certain paper devoted mainly to giving information as to the probable result of races, steeplechases, and other competitions contrary to a bye-law made by the Staffordshire County Council under section 16 of the Local Government Act, 1888.

The bye-law was the following: "No persons shall frequent and use any street or other public place either on behalf of himself or any other person for the purpose of selling or distributing any paper or matter or printed matter devoted wholly or mainly to giving information as to the probable result of races, steeplechases, and other competitions. Every person contravening any of the foregoing provisions shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding £5."

The justices convicted the appellant and fined him £5, but stated this case for the opinion of the court as to the validity or otherwise of the bye-law.

Danckwerts, K.C. (Pritchett with him).—This bye-law is invalid, firstly, because it is too wide. It goes far beyond Thomas v. Sutters, 48 W. R. 133 [1900] 1 Ch. 10. Secondly, because it is unreasonable, as it punishes acts which are quite innocent in themselves.

Avory, K.C. (Shakespeare with him).—This bye-law is aimed at putting down street betting, and it is recognized that the sale of tips on races does lead to betting. The bye-law is nearly covered by Thomas v. Sutters.

Danckwerts, K.C., in reply.

PHILLIMORE, J.—I regret to have to disagree with the other members of the court, but I think that at times the courts have been too astute in finding grounds for holding bye-laws invalid. Parliament has given these powers for the good government of their respective districts to county councils and other bodies, and though Parliament itself legislates for the good government of the United Kingdom, I think the local authorities can exercise the powers given them within their particular areas, and if additional provision for the good government of those areas are found to be necessary I think we ought not to interfere.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It may very well be that these papers do facilitate street betting, as their only reason for existence is that they appear to give information as to the probable result of races and other competitions. I think that this bye-law is reasonable, or at any rate not unreasonable, and that it is within the power of the county council to make it, and that it ought to be supported.

KENNEDY, J.—I feel obliged to come to a different conclusion. This bye-law is framed for the purpose of subjecting to penalties persons who "frequent and use any street or other public place . . . for the purpose of selling or distributing any paper or written or printed matter devoted wholly or mainly to giving information as to the probable result of races, steeplechases, and other competitions." It seems to me that we must endeavour to construe such a bye-law entirely on legal principles, and apart from any consideration of what might be desirable as new legislation. That which renders a person liable to a penalty under this bye-law is the selling or distributing of written or printed matter "devoted" wholly or mainly to giving information as to the probable result of races, steeplechases, or other competitions. Now it cannot be disputed that such information may be given without any breach of the law at all. It is not in itself immoral. It is not necessarily information as to bets, or as to where they may be made. It is harmless to most people. The words are wide enough to include information as to the probable result of any athletic contest. I should be slow to think that it was reasonable to penalize the sale or distribution of papers giving information as to these things merely because those who buy such a paper will have an additional opportunity of getting knowledge or suggestions which may lead them to make bets. One may have a strong view as to the mischief of betting, but one's objection to it ought not to govern the decision of this case. The question for us is whether it is reasonable for the county council to penalize the sale or distribution of such newspapers or other documents as may be held to come within the very wide description given in the bye-law. The question must be dealt with on broad grounds, and I think it would be going too far to say that this bye-law is reasonable merely because most of the information contained may help people to make bets.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I also think the bye-law cannot be supported. I quite agree with the principles laid down by my brother Phillimore, but I also think bye-laws laid down by the local authority should be free from ambiguity and should not make things unlawful which are otherwise perfectly lawful. I think this bye-law is open to the objection that it may bring within its purview papers which are mainly devoted to giving results of competitions on which there might be no betting at all. I do not wish to say that a bye-law could not be framed so as to suppress street betting by means of tipsters. I think a bye-law might be passed so as to hit the real mischief and to be confined to it. Both on the ground of uncertainty, and on the ground that it may strike at perfectly innocent sales of newspapers I think that this bye-law is bad and cannot be supported.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for appellant, Judge & Priestley, for Philip Baker, Birmingham.

Solicitor for respondent, H. M. Davis, for Hand & Co., Stafford.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Kennedy, JJ.) } April 13; May 3, 1904.

In re ALLISON, JOHNSON, & FOSTER (LIMITED). Ex parte BIRKENSHAW. (a.)

Company—Winding up—Invalid appointment of liquidator—Claim for remuneration—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 67.

A limited company, resolved on a voluntary winding up, and appointed the appellant, liquidator. This resolution was subsequently set aside as invalid by an order of the court. On a compulsory winding up of the company the appellant claimed to prove as a creditor for work done by him while purporting to act as liquidator prior to the order of the court.

Held, that section 67 of the Companies Act, 1862, could not be used to justify the appellant's claim against the company for services as liquidator, as he had never had valid authority from the company to act as liquidator, nor was the appellant entitled at common law to be paid on a quantum meruit for such services; but that the appellant was entitled to claim reasonable remuneration for such work as he had done for the company for business purposes unconnected with the voluntary winding up, or which had been used by the official receiver and liquidator in the compulsory winding up with full knowledge of the facts.

This was an appeal by Birkenshaw from the decision of his Honour Judge Raikes, K.C., sitting at Kingston-upon-Hull County Court, who upheld the decision of the official receiver and liquidator in the winding up of Allison, Johnson, & Foster (Limited), rejecting the claim of the appellant to prove as a creditor in the winding up.

The facts of the case as stated in the written judgment of the court are as follows: The company, in January, 1903, was embarrassed by such financial difficulties that at a directors' meeting, on the 16th of that month, which seems to have been attended only by the chairman and one other director, it was resolved that it was advisable to wind up the company voluntarily, and that the appellant, William Parker Birkenshaw, who is a chartered accountant, should be appointed liquidator.

On the following 28th of January a meeting which is described in the company's minute book as an extraordinary general meeting of shareholders was held, at which resolutions to the same effect are recorded as having been passed, but only Mr. Hushwood Irving Foster (the chairman) and a Mr. F. E. Johnson were present, of whom the last-named took no part in the voting; and the proceedings were set aside as invalid ab initio by the order of Farwell, J., in the following July.

On the same day—the 28th of January—the company's solicitors, Messrs. Shackles & Dunkerley, wrote to Mr. Birkenshaw and informed him of his appointment, under the resolutions, as liquidator, which he accepted, and he continued to act until the 25th of July, when he was served with a writ and notice of an interim injunction.

The company had since been in course of winding up under the order of the court.

The work in respect of which the claim was made was work done by Birkenshaw, as liquidator under the resolutions of the 28th of January, employing in portions of it, as a liquidator who is an accountant commonly does, both his partner Young and the clerks in the firm's office. Particulars of the work appear in a statement which he sent in with the claim to the official receiver and liquidator.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Adams, for the appellant.—The decision of the learned county court judge was wrong. The appellant is entitled to claim in respect of the work he did for the company as liquidator. Section 67 of the Companies Act, 1862, provides, inter alia, that "all appointments of . . . liquidators, shall be deemed to be valid, and all acts done by such . . . liquidators shall be valid, notwithstanding any defect that may be discovered in their appointments or qualifications." The company benefited by the work he did as liquidator, and he is entitled to be paid for such work at any rate on a quantum meruit.

He cited In re Bridport Old Brewery Co., 15 W. R. 291, L. R. 2 Ch. 191; Dawson v. African Consolidated Land and Trading Co., 46 W. R. 132 [1898] 1 Ch. 6; and British Asbestos Co. v. Boyd, 51 W. R. 667, [1903] 2 Ch. 439.

Tindal Atkinson, K.C. (H. S. Cautley with him), for the respondents.—The appellant is not entitled to be paid for his services as a liquidator either under section 67 of the Companies Act, 1862, or on a quantum meruit. The object of section 67 is to protect outside persons who deal with a company; it was not intended to apply to the case of a liquidator in regard to the company itself.

He referred to the judgment of Chitty, J., in Harben v. Phillips, 31 W. R. 173, 23 Ch. D. 14, at pp. 27, 28.

Adams replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 3.—KENNEDY, J., read the following judgment of the court: In this case the judgment of the learned county court judge at Kingston-upon-Hull has upheld the rejection by the official receiver and liquidator of the claim of Messrs. Birkenshaw & Young, trading as Carill, Birkenshaw, & Ferguson, to prove as creditors in the winding up of the above-named company for £165 0*s*. 3d. The appellants ask us to reverse that judgment. The material facts are few and simple, but they raise a point of some difficulty upon which there appears to be no express or direct authority in the reports. [The learned judge then stated the facts as above set out, and continued:] It appears to us that the judgment of the county court judge in so far as it upholds the rejection in toto of the appellants' claim ought not to be upheld, but should be varied in the way and to the extent which I will mention later on. It was sought by the appellants' counsel to justify the claim on, substantially, two alternative grounds: first, as valid under the 67th section of the Companies Act, 1862; secondly, as a good claim at common law for remuneration upon the basis of quantum meruit in respect of work and labour done for the company at its request. In regard to the first and main contention of the appellants, I am of opinion that the learned county court judge was right. The 67th section validates acts done by de facto directors, managers, and liquidators, notwithstanding any defect that may be afterwards discovered in their appointments or qualifications. It has been held that the provision covers not merely acts which affect the relations between the company and persons outside the company who have no notice of the defect, but also acts affecting members in their relation to the company and the relations of members inter se: Dawson v. African Consolidated Co., and British Asbestos Co. v. Boyd, But I do not see on principle (and no authority for the contention was cited to us on the argument) how how this provision can be used to justify the claim of a person against the company for services as liquidator when he never had authority from the company to act as liquidator. The remuneration of a liquidator in a voluntary winding up may be fixed by a resolution of the company (the Companies Act, 1862, s. 133 (3)); if not so fixed, it has to be settled by the court, as the court thinks just: see In re The Amalgamated Syndicates (Limited), [1901] 2 Ch. 181, 49 W. R. Dig. 35. In this case there was no resolution of the company at the so-called meeting of the 28th of January for fixing Mr. Birkenshaw's remuneration as liquidator, and if there had been it would have been invalid; and I am at a loss to see how the court can be asked to award him remuneration out of the funds of the company in liquidation for work done, whether done by himself personally, or under his direction by his clerks or partners, in a capacity in which he was never validly authorized by the company to act. Nor does the appellant, in our judgment, make out a good common law claim to reward for the work he did, merely because he did it. There can be no implied contract for payment arising out of acceptance of the work done, where the work was done upon an express request which turns out to be no request at all, but which down to the time when the whole of the work had been done was supposed by both parties to be valid and operative.

But we think that, if and so far as the appellant can prove that his labours have been beneficial to the company and have been accepted by the company for business purposes of the company unconnected with liquidation, or have been utilized, with full knowledge of the facts, by the official receiver and liquidator of the company in the winding up, which has been carried on under the court's order, it is consistent alike with law and equity for us to hold that there has been such an acceptance of them upon an implied promise of reward, a promise of reward to be implied from the making use of materials prepared by him and for which they must have paid someone else if they did not use what he had done, as entitled Mr. Birkenshaw to this extent to claim to be remunerated on the basis of a quantum meruit. So holding, we think that the proper direction to give on the appellants' application would be that the items of the appellants' claim should be investigated by the registrar, and that the claim should be admitted by the official receiver and liquidator for such a sum, if any, as should upon such investigation be found to be just and proper remuneration for the work, if any, done by Mr. Birkenshaw (whether personally or under his direction, by his partner or the firm's clerks) since the 28th of January, 1903, of which the company had the benefit of for business purposes unconnected with the liquidation, or of which the official receiver and liquidator has availed himself in the winding up.

Order varied accordingly.

Solicitors for the appellant, Woodhouse & Davidson, for J. T. Woodhouse, Aske, & Ferens, Hull.

Solicitors for the respondents, Maples, Teesdale, & Co., for Davis, Hull.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. Admiralty. } Aug. 1, 8, 1904.

"THE ELMVILLE." (a.)

Ship—Necessaries—Disbursements by master—Bill of Exchange—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 167-742.

A master defended, and lost, an action on a bill of exchange given by him for necessaries supplied to his ship, which bill was dishonoured by his owners.

The Court held that in the circumstances of the case the costs of the action incurred by the master were not liabilities properly incurred on account of the ship within the meaning of section 167 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), inasmuch as the defence did not appear to be reasonably necessary in the interest of the ship.

Motion.

On the 8th of December, 1903, the master of the steamship Elmville drew a bill of exchange upon his owners for a sum of £300 odd for the supply of bunker coal and certain disbursements for pilotage and harbour dues. The bill was dishonoured and an action was commenced against the master by the holders. The Elmville had been mortgaged and the mortgagees commenced an action shortly after the action on the bill was instituted, and the master also instituted an action against his owners on the bill of exchange and for other disbursements and for his own wages, and judgment went by default, a reference and the question of priorities being agreed to. The mortgagees' action also went by default, the vessel being ordered to be sold. The holders of the bill of exchange also obtained judgment against the master on the bill of exchange, in an action which the master defended. The registrar at the reference in the master's action disallowed the master's own taxed costs in the unsuccessful action on the bill of exchange, and also the plaintiffs' costs in that action, which the master had become liable to pay.

The master moved to vary the report of the registrar in respect of the disallowance of his costs incurred in unsuccessfully defending the action on the bill, and further moved for a declaration that he was entitled to claim a bonus of £50 awarded in respect of wages in priority to the claims of the mortgagees of the vessel.

Balloch, for the appellant.

Stephens, for the respondents, the owners of the vessel.

JEUNE, P., in giving judgment, said: It appears to me that this case is substantially covered by authority. The question is whether the master is entitled to claim not only the actual disbursements which he has made in the ordinary sense of the word, but the costs which he has incurred in an action on a bill of exchange to which he was a party. I do not think any question arises about this being a disbursement within the meaning of the Admiralty Court Act of 1861, s. 10, because although the money has not been actually spent, still I think if it was all proper expenditure made by the master of the ship it would fall within that definition. I think the authority of The Feronia, 2 L. R. 2 Ad. & Ecc. 65, which to my mind covers the principle upon which this case is to be decided, would cover the costs for which the master was liable, although he has not actually paid them, if they were, when paid, within the terms which were considered in The Feronia to be disbursements. The Feronia laid it down in broad terms that all proper expenditure made by the master were to be considered as disbursements within the meaning of the Act, and the emphasis in that view appears to me to be that the payment must be made by the master of the ship as such master. Upon that matter very much, indeed, turns, because in the subsequent case of The Orienta, [1895] P. 49, 43 W. R. Dig. 170, in which I had occasion to consider the matter fully—perhaps needlessly fully, because the Court of Appeal thought it a more simple matter than it appeared to me, though they came to the same decision as that which I had arrived at—the question was, I think, really whether the liability was a liability incurred in terms by the master in his office as master, or merely by his being the drawer of a bill at the request of his owners, irrespective of his being master. That was the view taken in a simple and decisive way by the Court of Appeal in The Orienta. The judgment given by Lord Esher, of course the very highest possible authority on a question of this kind, puts the matter very simply as follows: "For a century or more it has been common knowledge that the master is only authorized to pledge his owner's credit for what may be called 'things necessary' for the ship; that is to say, he can pledge his owner's credit if he is in a position where it is necessary, for the purposes of his duty, that these things should be supplied, and he cannot have recourse to his owners before ordering them, just as he can give a bottomry bond on the ship where the necessity arises in the sense which I have just stated. But then there come these Acts of Parliament, which say he should have a lien for disbursements. Now, if he should have a lien upon the ship, then the ship is bound to him; but the master cannot bind the ship to himself by ordering goods which he was not authorized to order at all, so as to pledge his owner's credit for them. The real meaning of the word 'disbursements' in Admiralty practice is disbursements by the master, which he makes himself liable for in respect of necessary things for the ship, for the purposes of navigation, which he, as master of the ship, is there to carry out—necessary in the sense that they must be had immediately—and when the owner is not there, able to give the order, and he is not so near to the master that the master can ask for his authority, and the master is therefore obliged, necessarily, to render himself liable in order to carry out his duty as master. Here no disbursements were made by the master; no goods were ordered by the master at all; no liability was incurred by the master in respect of these goods. He is not liable for the price of the coals, though it may be that the bill is drawn for the exact price. What he has done is, at the request of his owners, to make himself drawer of the bill of exchange which the owners were to accept; but it does not make the the master liable to anybody unless the owners dishonour the bill when it becomes due and the proper notices have been given. That is not a liability in respect of the coals—that is a liability is respect of the bill of exchange. It is not a liability incurred by him in his office as master, but by his being the drawer of the bill at the request of his owners irrespective of his being master." That appears to me to govern the principle in this case. Being the master he no doubt drew the bill, but when we come to the question whether he was justified in defending the action or making the ship liable for the costs of that defence, then I have to consider whether it was necessary in the interests of the ship to have defended that action. There my difficulty arises, because I confess I do not see why it was. He might perfectly well have allowed judgment to go by default. I do not think there was any real defence.

(a.) Reported by GWYNNE HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

He acted as an individual and not as master of the vessel, and even if there was some sort of request to him by the owners to defend, I do not think that was addressed to him as master of the vessel for the purposes of the vessel, but addressed to him on account of the accident of his being a party to the bill of exchange, in which the owners were interested. To use the words of Lord Esher, the liability incurred by him in respect of costs was not a liability incurred by him in his office as master, but by his being the drawer of the bill at the request of his owners, irrespective of his being master. I think, therefore, that the captain cannot have the costs of this action against the ship.

Solicitors for the appellant, Stokes & Stokes.

Solicitors for the owners and mortgagees, Williamson, Hill, & Co., for Ingledew & Co., Cardiff.

K. B. Div. (Channell, J.) April 18, 19, 1904.

SMYTH (Appellant) v. STRETTON (Respondent). (a.)

Inland Revenue—Income tax—Assistant master at schools—Liability to income tax on increase of salary—Scheme for provident fund—Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 146, Schedule E.

Under a provident fund scheme for the year 1900 at Dulwich College it was provided that with respect to assistant masters that the following increase of salaries should be granted from the date on which the scheme came into operation, subject to certain conditions: "(a) Assistant masters having not less than five years' but less than fifteen years' service an increase of 5 per cent.; (b) assistant masters having not less than fifteen years' service and over an increase of 7½ per cent.; (c) a further addition, equal in amount to the above sums, to be granted from the same date to the assistant masters alluded to in (a) and (b) subject to certain conditions." All assistant masters were required to become members of the fund at the expiration of five years from their respective appointments. The whole of the above increases of salary were not to be paid to the masters, but to be retained by the governors and accumulated at compound interest for the purpose of forming the said provident fund.

Among the conditions to which the above increases of salary were subject were that assistant masters having less than ten years' service who might resign their appointments, or from any other cause than ill-health cease to belong to the college, should be entitled to receive the total increase sanctioned by (a) and the accumulations thereof, but should not receive the additional increase sanctioned by (c) or the accumulations thereof. In the event of any such assistant master retiring from ill-health the governors, in addition to the increase sanctioned by (a), might grant him the further 5 per cent. sanctioned by (c) and the accumulations thereof. Masters of over ten years' service were to receive on retirement before the age of sixty the total sum due under (a) or (b) and (c) with accumulations. Masters removed for misconduct or, having been guilty of misconduct, allowed to resign were not entitled to receive the increase sanctioned by (c) or accumulations thereof. Any additional increase under (c) remaining unissued was to be credited to the fund for exceptional cases.

Held, that the true effect of the scheme was to add the sums specified in both (a) and (c) to the salary of assistant master; and that the respondent, an assistant master, was liable under section 146, Schedule E, of the Income Tax Act, 1842, to pay income tax on that addition to his salary.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Case stated by the Income Tax Commissioners for the Division of East Brixton.

The respondent, one of the assistant masters of Dulwich College, appealed against an assessment made upon him under Schedule E of the Income Tax Acts in the sum of £385 in respect of his emoluments as assistant master received from the governors of Dulwich College for the year ended the 5th of April, 1901, on the ground that the assessment included £35 not liable to taxation, being the amount placed to his credit by the governors under the provident fund scheme for the year 1900.

The material parts of the scheme in question were as follows:

As to the present assistant masters:

(1) That the following increase of salaries shall be granted from the date on which the scheme comes into operation, subject to the conditions hereinafter mentioned: (a) Assistant masters having not less than five years' but less than fifteen years' service, an increase of 5 per cent.; (b) assistant masters having not less than fifteen years' service and over, an increase of 7½ per cent.; (c) a further addition, equal in amount to the above sums, shall be granted from the same date to the assistant masters alluded to in (a) and (b), such addition being, however, subject to the conditions provided by paragraph 5; (d) assistant masters not having fifteen years' service shall, on reaching that period, be eligible for the increase sanctioned by (b) and (c); (e) in the case of the few present assistant masters of advanced age, it shall be open to the governors to grant the maximum increase alluded to in (b) and (c).

As to future assistant masters:

(2) That future assistant masters shall in like manner, on attaining five years' service from the date of their appointment, be entitled to the increase of 5 per cent. as in clause 1 (a), and to the additional increase of 5 per cent. as in clause 1 (c), but shall not be entitled to any further increase.

As to all assistant masters:

(3) That all assistant masters shall be required to become members of the fund at the expiration of five years from the date of their respective appointments.

(4) That the whole of the above increases of salary shall not be paid to the masters, but shall be retained by the governors and accumulated at compound interest for the purpose of forming the said provident fund, but subject to the provisions hereinafter contained.

(5) That assistant masters having less than ten years' service who may resign their appointments, or from any other cause than ill-health cease to belong to the college, shall be entitled to receive the total increase sanctioned by (a) and the accumulations thereof, but shall not receive the additional increase sanctioned by (c) or the accumulations thereof. In the event of any such assistant master retiring from ill-health, the governors, in addition to the increase sanctioned by (a), may grant him the further 5 per cent. sanctioned by (c), and the accumulations thereof. In the event of death of any such assistant master whilst in the service of the college, the 5 per cent. due by (c) as well as under (a), with the accumulations thereof, shall be paid to his legal representative.

(6) That assistant masters who shall have served ten years or upwards, and who may retire before the age of sixty from any other cause than misconduct, shall receive the total sum due to them respectively under (a) or (b) and (c), and the accumulations thereof. In the event of death before the age of sixty whilst in the service of the college, the full amount credited the assistant master in the fund books shall be paid to his legal representative.

(7) That assistant masters who shall at any time be removed for misconduct, or having been guilty of misconduct may be allowed to resign—such misconduct being certified to by the master of the college—shall not receive the additional increase sanctioned by (c) or the accumulations thereof.

There were further provisions in the scheme, but these are not material to the point in issue.

The appellant contended (1) that he had no actual enjoyment of the sum of £35, it being in the nature of a bonus at the end of his career as a master at the college, and that he could not raise any money on the sum; (2) that with respect to a moiety of the sum it was uncertain whether it would ever be received, as under paragraph (c) of the scheme power was reserved by the governors to refuse such part of the grant—in other words, that the moiety was contingent, not vested in character, and therefore could not be described as income in any way.

It was also argued that the sums credited under the scheme did not form the subject of agreement when the appellant entered the employ of the governors, or of any subsequent agreement, and that it was open to question whether they were legally recoverable.

In support of the assessment the Crown surveyor quoted the charging words under Schedule E of the Income Tax Act, 1842, s. 146, whereby all emoluments "accruing by reason of such offices" are made liable to assessment, and contended that the whole amount credited was practically an addition to the annual income, performing the function of a payment to a superannuation fund, and thus relieving the appellant from the necessity of making similar provision out of the salary actually paid to him during the year in question; that the possibility of forfeiture was too remote to affect the question, and that the scheme did not comply with the conditions laid down for deduction in the way of life insurance premiums by section 54 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, as amended.

The commissioners were of opinion that the sum of £35 was not liable to taxation, and reduced the assessment accordingly from £385 to £350.

Sir E. Carson, S.G. (S. A. T. Rowlatt with him), for the appellant.

Danckwerts, K.C. (Ellis J. Griffith with him), for the respondent.

April 19.—CHANNELL, J.—This case was argued before me yesterday, and I think it better for me to give judgment in it whilst the matter is fresh in my mind, though I cannot say that I am altogether satisfied with the decision that I am about to come to. It seems to me to depend upon this: There is a scheme established by the governors of Dulwich College, and the question is whether the true effect of that scheme is to increase the salaries of the assistant masters, imposing at the same time an obligation upon them to deal with a portion of the increased salaries in a certain way; or whether the trueeffect of the scheme, when you look at the substance of it, is not really to increase the salaries, but to give to the masters upon their ceasing to hold the position of assistant masters gratuities or allowances. I do not use the word "gratuities" in the sense that there is no consideration for it, because the services of the masters during the time that they serve, after the arrangement is made, are no doubt consideration for it, but retiring bonuses, or something of that kind, when they cease. If that is the true effect of the scheme then I do not think it becomes salary for the purposes of taxation, and, on the whole, I agree with what counsel for the respondent says, that you must look at the substance of it and not the words. But, at the same time, I do not say that you must disregard the words, because the fact is, as I think it is in this case, that the objects of the scheme could have been carried out in two different ways. It could have been done either by increasing the salaries and saying: "If we increase your salaries you must devote a certain portion of them to certain purposes," or it could have been carried out by giving them retiring bonuses. Then, if you are left in doubt as to which of those two ways the governing body have in fact carried it out, I do not think you can do otherwise than look at the words they use. Now, in this case this scheme deals with two different percentages of 5 per cent. each; there is another of 7½ per cent., which does not apply to this particular master, but stands on precisely the same footing as the first 5 per cent. that we have to deal with, and we may leave that out. There are two percentages of 5 per cent. under clause (a) and clause (c) in the first section of the scheme. They are substantially different in my opinion. They both come under the same words as to the increase of salary, and each party is entitled to draw an argument, and each party has drawn an argument from the fact that they are lumped together. Counsel for the appellant say that (a) is quite clearly in their favour and therefore that I must come to the conclusion that the entirety is an increase of salary. On the other hand, counsel for the respondent says that (c) is quite clearly in his favour, and it is not a sum which the assistant masters ever get at all except as a matter of discretion and bounty, and that therefore I must take it, as (c) is heaped together with (a), neither (a) nor (c) are increases of salary. That prevents me from getting much benefit from either argument; they must be set off against one another, and one has to look at what the real substance of the thing is. In this case I have to deal with a decision which certainly is very much in point, and that is the decision of Bell v. Gribble and Hudson v. Gribble, 51 W. R. 457, [1903] 1 K. B. 517. That establishes, if authority were wanted (I think for the main proposition authority clearly existed before), that a sum recoverable by way of salary or wages is not the less salary or wages taxable, because for some reason or other the person who receives it has not got the full right to apply it just as he likes. The fact that income which is income, but which has even by operation of some statute to be devoted compulsorily to some purpose or another, does not prevent it being income. That is decided, of course, by one of the various Mersey Docks cases—namely, Mersey Docks v. Lucas, 32 W. R. 34, 8 App. Cas. 891. But this case of Bell v. Gribble goes a little further. There is the case dealt with by Mathew, L.J.: "Suppose in the case of a marriage settlement a man agrees to set apart out of his salary at his office so much every year by way of investment. According to Mr. Asquith's argument that would not be income, but really it is clear in each of the cases I have mentioned the payment is purely voluntary, and is of the same character as a payment made by a thrifty man who out of his salary reserves so much every year for old age or for contingencies." Now, the case is quite clear where a man has a salary from his office, which is what the Lord Justice puts, and by agreement with somebody else, I presume his father-in-law, has bound himself to set apart a certain portion of that salary year by year, and save it and invest it for the benefit of his wife and children; it still is income, although he has contracted with somebody else to employ it in a particular way, and to save it; but the decision in Bell v. Gribble and Hudson v. Gribble goes beyond that, because it applies the same rule to a case where the money comes from the person with whom the contract is made to apply it in a particular way. In Bell v. Gribble it was a case of an Act of Parliament of the city of Manchester enabling them to establish a provident fund for their servants, but it was dealt with as a case of contract, and was a case of contract, of course; the statute was merely the authority of the corporation to contract, and the servants who became servants, and who need not have become servants, were dealt with as contracting with the corporation upon those terms. It is an extension of the illustration Mathew, L.J., was giving, because there is a substantial difference between a sum placed out of the disposal of the person who is being dealt with as having got the enjoyment of it, if it is placed out of his disposal by a contract with the person from whom he gets it. There is a distinction between that and his getting it from one source and contracting with another person to deal with it in a certain manner. I think it is a substantial difference. I may illustrate it by what I think is a pretty well known illustration relating to a technical subject, though not of use beyond an illustration, and that is the law in reference to bills of sale. If a borrower is getting from a lender an advance on a bill of sale it is legitimate to treat the entire sum purporting to be advanced as now advanced notwithstanding that there are some deductions made from that sum for the purpose of paying sums which the borrower is by some other existing independent obligation liable to pay, such as to deduct sums payable for rent, and so on. Those may be properly treated, as I understand the law, as part of the advance, and the advance may be stated as an advance of the entire sum, notwithstanding a portion of it is detained by the lender for the purpose of paying the sum due on an existing obligation of the borrower for his rent or for other matters. But if a sum is detained by the lender from the borrower for some agreed bonus or for something that there is no obligation of the borrower to pay other than the obligation created by the contract that is being made between the parties at the time, then you may not state the entire amount to be an advance made at the time. That illustrates what I mean—that there is a substantial difference between a sum being detained by the person who would otherwise pay it, by reason of a right to detain it that is created as part of the same contract which he is carrying out, and to that extent, therefore, it seems to me that the decision in Bell v. Gribble and Hudson v. Gribble goes beyond what the previous cases and the illustration of Mathew, L.J., has established. But it is binding, and it seems to me that it creates a difficulty in my saying that the governing body here did not mean as to both of these sums really to increase the salary, and to increase the salary with a view of enabling the assistant masters, without losing money, to take part in this provident fund, and not only enabling them to do it, but binding them to do it. In Bell v. Gribble the servants were bound to make those payments or to allow those deductions as part of the terms of their service, just as here this becomes part of the engagement of these assistant masters from the time that it came into operation, and whether they are previous masters or newly-appointed masters really makes no difference for the purpose.

I think, under the circumstances, that I am bound to hold that this scheme really meant what it said; that it did mean to increase the salaries, and to provide that as to one portion of the increase the assistant master should have it in any event. All the clauses show that as to the first 5 per cent. the masters were to have it, or their representatives were to have it if they died, and they were even to have it if they left by reason of some misconduct, and they were to have it not year by year, but when they left, and with compound interest. The scheme has been criticized by somebody in refurence to the grammar of clause 4, and, I think, criticized with some grounds; it also may be criticized on the ground that it does not state at what rate of interest this compound interest was to be, nor does it state for anybody who had to assess the compound interest what he would want to know, what was done as to rests, whether it was to be annual or half-yearly, or how the compound interest was to be calculated. It is not absolutely complete if it is to be criticized, but that does not make any difference for the purpose that I have to consider. In reference to the first 5 per cent., it seems to me that it must have been meant to be that which it is said to be—viz., an increase of salary payable at a future date, and when payable, payable with compound interest; and therefore I do not think the case would have been arguable if that provision stood alone. It does not stand alone. The next one, if it stood alone, would certainly be very arguable. I am not quite clear about it now, but it seems to me that, being put as it is with the other sum which is clearly salary, and being in express and clear words, used, not by ignorant people, notwithstanding what I have said as to their grammar and other things, but by people — namely, the governors and masters of this college — who must be considered to understand quite well what they say, stated distinctly to be salary; and it seems to me not by any means necessary to prevent it being salary, because there is a binding obligation. As to this sum (c), it is to be left in the hands of the governors of the college upon certain specific terms which are that the masters are not to have it in every possible event, for they are not to have it if they do not serve for ten years unless their non-service for as much as ten years depends on the case of ill-health; and then in the case of ill-health it is discretionary with governors to give it. So in that case, if they have served for less than ten years, they do not get this sum (c) as of right, and also if they are removed for misconduct or having resigned to avoid being removed for misconduct, they do not receive that sum, but that sum in those cases, if it is not given to them, goes into a general fund which the governors are to distribute to exceptional and special cases requiring and deserving assistance. Therefore each man when he pays down, if you may call it paying down, or when he has deducted from what otherwise would be his salary the sum (c), when he is paying over or submitting to the deduction of that sum, he is paying it in the nature of a premium in respect of advantages which he is probably to get, advantages secured to him for certain in certain events, which he may not get in certain other events, but he is also purchasing the right to have or to ask for and possibly to get it if he happens to be specially unfortunate, and therefore in that sense, "specially deserving" an additional allowance out of the sums which other gentlemen have contributed. Gentlemen who have served for five years and therefore come into this charge, but have not served for ten, and have gone out perhaps to some better appointment elsewhere, will have paid certain sums which they will not get back, and those go to increase the fund, and each person who subscribes to the fund has a chance of getting a portion of those funds. The result is it is like a premium paid down for an insurance in certain events, a sum paid for advantages which you may or may not get, or get to a greater or a lesser extent. It is exactly like the case of a person being obliged to insure his life; that would not prevent the sum being salary. In one sense it is a hard case on these assistant masters. It is a ground of complaint (it is not for me to say if it is legitimate or not) against the income tax that it charges in the same way income arising from a man's own work and exertions, out of which there is a moral obligation at any rate to put something by for his family and those dependent upon him, and for his old age and chance of illness. It treats that, for the purpose of taxation, on exactly the same footing as income arising from capital, which capital remains intact and is there for the man in his old age or his children. It is an objection to be made to the tax; but there is the tax —it exists—and considerations of that sort, it seems to me, cannot be taken into account in considering whether a particular case comes within the principles of the taxation. Of course the Legislature has done something for persons in that position—it is very little —but something in the way of the provision that exists as to deducting the premiums on life assurances. That is done to meet the grievance. This case, though it may possibly come within the mischief which that particular provision is meant to meet, does not come, as it seems to me, within any of the statutory relief that has been given. Of course it is not a life assurance within the meaning of that provision, nor can it possibly be said, and it is not argued by counsel for the respondent in an argument which has assisted me very much, that it comes within the express words set out in this case about certain deductions allowed by Act of Parliament, which was one of the things considered in Bell v. Gribble. But this case could not be said to come within that, and does not. The result seems to me to be that I must take this sum as a sum which really has been added to the salary and is taxable, and it is not the less added to the salary because there has been a b'nding obligation created between the assistant masters and the governors of the schools that they should apply it in a particular way.

Judgment for the Crown.

Solicitor for appellant, Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

Solicitors for respondent, Druces & Attlee.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Cozens-Hardy, L.J.) — Feb. 13.

HARBOTTLE v. ROBERTS.
PEEL, Claimant. (a.)

Practice—Interpleader—Summary decision—Value of subject-matter in dispute over £50—Jurisdiction—Right of appeal—Ord. 57, rr. 8, 11.

The jurisdiction of a master on the hearing of an interpleader summons to order that the dispute between the claimants shall be decided in a summary manner under ord. 57, r. 8, is not limited to cases in which the value of the subject-matter in dispute does not exceed £50.

No appeal lies, even with leave, to the Court of Appeal, in such a case.

Appeal from an order made by Bray, J., at chambers.

The plaintiff, having obtained judgment in the action, proceeded by writ of fi. fa. to levy execution on the defendant's goods. A claim to the goods was thereupon made by the holder of a bill of sale, and the sheriff took out an interpleader summons. The value of the goods in dispute was more than £50. On the hearing of the summons, the master decided to dispose of the matter in a summary manner under ord. 57, r. 8, and adjourned the summons for the production of evidence.

From this decision the execution creditor appealed to the judge at chambers. Bray, J., affirmed the decision of the master, and ordered that the matter in dispute should be summarily decided by the master, but he gave leave to appeal from his order to the Court of Appeal.

The execution creditor accordingly appealed.

Rowlatt, for the claimant, took the preliminary objection that no appeal lay. It was held in Bryant v. Reading, 34 W. R. 496, 17 Q. B. D. 128, that a decision of a master on an interpleader summons to dispose of the claims in a summary manner was in itself a summary decision under ord. 57, r. 8, and was therefore, by virtue of Waterhouse v. Gilbert, 15 Q. B. D., 569, 33 W. R. Dig. 158, not appealable to the Court of Appeal.

Edward Clayton, for the execution creditor.—The value of the goods in dispute being over £50, the master had no power to order that the matter should be decided in a summary manner. A rule of practice has always prevailed restricting the exercise of the summary jurisdiction under ord. 57, r. 8, in the absence of consent, to cases where the amount in dispute does not exceed £50: see Annual Practice, 1905, vol. 1, p. 833. The existence of this rule was recognized in Van Laun & Co. v. Baring Brothers & Co. (Limited), 52 W. R. 59, [1903] 2 K. B. 277.

COLLINS, M.R.—In my opinion the preliminary objection is a good one. The case of Bryant v. Reading shows that a decision to dispose of a claim in a summary manner is, so far as regards the right to appeal, the same thing as a summary decision itself. But it is said that, as the value of the subject-matter here was more than £50, a rule of practice governs the case, and by that rule the judge had no jurisdiction to order the matter to be decided summarily. To my mind it is clear that such a rule of practice, if it exists, has never been anything more than a mere rule of practice. It does not fetter in any way the provisions of the statutory rules; and, although in this case the value of the subject-matter in dispute is more than £50, it is clear that the rule (ord. 57, r. 8) does not exclude the jurisdiction of the master to deal with the case in a summary manner. Nothing that I said in Van Laun & Co. v. Baring Brothers & Co. is contrary to this; in fact that case is confirmatory of what I am now saying. A mere rule of practice cannot restrain the application of substantive provisions of statutory rules. The authority of Bryant v. Reading is therefore in point, and shows that no appeal lies to this court. The fact that the learned judge has given leave to appeal cannot make any difference. The preliminary objection, therefore, succeeds, and the appeal must be dismissed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J., concurred.

Objection upheld.

Solicitors for the claimant, Freshfields.

Solicitors for the execution creditor, Cohen & Cohen.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal.
(Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) Jan. 18.

AYLWARD v. MATTHEWS. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—"Building"—Steam crane platform—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7, sub-section 1.

The applicant's employer entered into a contract to erect a steam crane platform for the purpose of carrying a crane wherewith to raise building materials for the construction of a permanent building by another contractor. The platform was constructed of timber supported by three long wooden legs, each leg consisting of four uprights connected together by cross-pieces of wood. Each leg was let into the ground, and where so let in it was surrounded by loose bricks to keep it firm. In order to construct the platform planks were placed resting on the cross-pieces, and ladders were placed on the planks to enable the workmen to go up and down. The ladders and planks were the scaffolding by means of which the crane platform was being erected, and when it was completed they would be removed. While the applicant was working at the erection of the crane platform he fell and was injured. At the time of the accident the structure was sixty-two feet high, but the permanent building was less than thirty feet high. In proceedings to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the county court judge found that the crane platform was a "building" within section 7, sub-section 1, of the Act, and that it was being constructed by means of a scaffolding, and he made an award of compensation.

Held, that, though the structure was a temporary wooden structure, the county court judge was entitled to find that it was a "building" within the Act.

Appeal from an award of Judge Emden, at the Lambeth County Court, under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant for compensation was a labourer employed by Matthews in the construction of a steam crane platform. Matthews was a crane erector, and had entered into a contract to erect a steam crane platform to be used for the purpose of hoisting up materials in connection with building operations at a school. When Matthews had completed the erection of a crane platform he and his men would leave, and they would have no more to do with the work of building. The crane platform in the present case was constructed of timber supported by three long wooden legs, each leg consisting of four uprights connected together by cross-pieces of wood so as to form a hollow square 4½ feet each way. Each leg was let into the ground, and where so let in it was surrounded by loose bricks to keep it firm. In order to construct the platform planks were placed resting on the cross-pieces and ladders were placed on the planks to enable the workmen to go up and down. The ladders and planks were the scaffolding by means of which the platform was being erected, and they would be removed when the platform was completed. The crane platform would be removed when the permanent building was finished. The applicant was working on one of the legs, and as he was descending a ladder inside the leg, the plank on which the ladder was resting broke, and he fell and was injured. At the time of the accident the crane structure was sixty-two feet in height, but the permanent building was not thirty feet high, only the foundations having been laid. In proceedings to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the county court judge found that the steam crane platform was a "building" within section 7, sub-section 1, of the Act, exceeding thirty feet in height, and that it was being constructed by means of a scaffolding, and that Matthews was the undertaker in respect thereof. He accordingly made an award in favour of the applicant of 15s. a week during incapacity.

Matthews appealed.

Minton-Senhouse, for the employer.—A temporary wooden structure such as this crane platform cannot be a "building" within the meaning of section 7, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. Building there means a permanent building. This structure was only put up for the purpose of erecting a permanent building. The county court judge was therefore wrong.

He referred to McNicholas v. Dawson, 47 W. R. 500, [1899] 1 Q. B. 773; McCabe v. Jopling, 52 W. R. 358, [1904] 1 K. B. 222.

John O'Connor, for the applicant.—The county court judge was entitled to find that this crane platform was a "building" within section 7 of the Act. It was a separate building sixty-two feet high, and it was being erected by means of a separate scaffolding. It is a question of fact whether a particular structure is a "building" within the Act. The decision was therefore right.

Minton-Senhouse replied.

COLLINS, M.R.—The ground of this appeal is that the county court judge has wrongly found as a fact that a certain wooden structure, which was itself being constructed by means of a scaffolding, was a "building" within section 7, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The object of the structure when completed was to form the platform on which a steam crane should be placed, the steam crane to be used in connection with the erection of a permanent building. The evidence showed that the temporary scaffolding by means of which the structure was being constructed would be removed when the structure was completed. The finding of the judge on a question of fact is conclusive, unless we can say as a matter of law that a wooden structure sixty-two feet in height such as the present one cannot be a "building" within the Act. At first it required some reflection before I could accept the proposition that a temporary wooden platform such as the present one, to be erected as a platform for a crane which was to be used for raising materials for the erection of a permanent building, was itself a "building." But we are dealing with an Act in which we cannot find any principles upon which its provisions are to be interpreted, and we have to ascertain the interpretation of the Act as best we can from the language used and from the objects aimed at in the Act. The Act deals (inter alia) with accidents to workmen when they are employed on or in or about a building which exceeds thirty feet in height, and which is being constructed by means of a scaffolding. The elements of an accident which exist in such a case are the dropping of tools or other articles upon the head of a workman below, or a workman falling off the scaffolding. Those elements exist quite as much in the case of a wooden structure like the present one as in the case of a permanent brick structure of the same height. So far as any incident can be contemplated as likely to arise from the use of a scaffolding, that incident can be contemplated as likely to arise in the present case. It is a question of fact whether the structure is a "building," and we are not in a position to say that the county court judge was bound to hold as a matter of law that this structure could not be a "building" within the meaning of the Act. Numerous cases of wooden structures which are buildings might be put. For instance, in Norway churches are frequently built of wood. How can we say as a matter of law that a temporary wooden structure erected for the purpose of carrying a crane is not a "building"? Suppose that a structure was built of brick or stone for the purpose of carrying a crane, it could not be said that such a structure was not a "building" within the Act. The only difference between the two structures is that one is constructed of wood and the other of brick or stone. In my opinion it cannot be said as a matter of law that because the structure is made of wood it is not a building. The structure here was capable of being a "building," and the appeal accordingly fails.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The argument on behalf of the appellant points to this, that a structure, to come within the word "building" in the Act, must be made of brick or stone. The Act does not, in my opinion, contemplate any such limitation upon the meaning of the word. The structure here was built up very carefully in order to carry a steam crane to be used in the erection of the permanent building. It is said that such a structure ceases to be a "building" if made of wood. It seems to me to be the same whether it is constructed of wood or of brick or stone, and that the structure may be a "building" within the Act though it is only a temporary wooden structure.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the applicant, S. A. Clench & Co.

Solicitor for the employers, H. B. Sewell.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Nov. 28, 29.

In re WHITING'S SETTLEMENT. WHITING v. DE RUTZEN. (a.)

Settlement — Condition — Marriage with consent — No limitation as to time — Gift over — Forfeiture — Validity of condition.

A condition imposing a partial restraint on marriage, by requiring the marriage to be with consent, with a gift over in the event of marriage without the required consent, is valid and enforceable, notwithstanding that it is not limited as to time but operates during the whole life of the beneficiary, provided that any of the persons whose consent is required survives.

Dashwood v. Lord Bulkeley, 10 Ves. 230, and Lloyd v. Branton, 3 Mer. 108, followed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Warrington, J.

By a voluntary settlement dated the 22nd of January, 1886, Henry Whiting declared that securities of the value of about £30,000 should be held by the trustees thereof upon trust to pay the income thereof to himself for his life and then upon trust (subject to the proviso as to marriage thereinafter contained) to pay the income to his daughter, Juliette Whiting for her life after she should have attained the age of twenty-six years, or been married under that age with such consent as thereinafter was required, for her sole and separate use without power of anticipation, and after her death to hold the funds in trust for her issue, if any, as she should appoint, and in default of appointment for her children. If she had no children £5,000 was to be paid out of the trust funds to the magistrates or magistrate for the time being of the police-court at Bow-street, to be invested by them, with power to them to distribute the income in the same manner as that of the Police Relief Fund, which had been established by the settlor, was distributed. The residue of the trust fund was to be held in trust for the testator's sons, H. P. Whiting and M. N. Whiting in equal shares. Clause 9 provided that if Juliette Whiting should marry under the age of twenty-six years without the consent of the settlor during his life and after his death of his wife during her widowhood, and after her second marriage or death without the consent of the trustees, or if his daughter should either before or after the age of twenty-six marry a person other than a person born of English, Welsh, or Scotch, or of Greek parents, then or in either of these events the trusts declared of the trust fund and the income thereof after the death of the settlor should, subject as next thereinafter mentioned, cease and determine as from the date of such marriage. (Clause 10.) "And then, subject to the life interest of the said Henry Whiting in the said trust fund, and to any interest therein or in the income thereof that may then by virtue of these presents have been acquired by any previous issue of the said Juliette Whiting, the trustees shall stand possessed of the sum of £5,000 sterling to be raised out of such portion of the trust fund as shall consist of pure personal estate in trust to pay the same to the said magistrates or magistrate" upon the trust mentioned above. And (by clause 11) the residue was to go to the settlor's said two sons in equal shares.

By clause 12 the daughter was, until she should attain twenty-six or should marry with such consent such a person as before mentioned, to receive out of the income after the death of the settlor £100 a year for pocket-money.

The deed contained a proviso that it should be lawful for the settlor at any time or times by deed or will wholly or partially to revoke or to alter or to vary the settlement.

By a deed-poll dated the 29th of March, 1887, the settlor made some alterations in the settlement, the only one which it is material to mention being the striking out of the words "or of Greek" from clauses 9 and 12. In other respects the settlor confirmed the settlement. A similar power of revocation and alteration was reserved, applying to both the deed-poll and the original settlement.

By another deed-poll dated the 22nd of May, 1891, the settlor altered the original settlement by revoking clause 9 and substituting the following clause for it: "That if the said Juliette Whiting shall marry without the consent in writing of the said Henry Whiting during his life, or shall after his death and during the lives of Juliette Antoinette Whiting (the wife of the said Henry Whiting) and the said Henry Paul Whiting and Matthew Noel Whiting, marry without the united consent of all three while living, or without the joint consent of the two survivors, or without the consent of the last survivor of them, marry without their or her or his consent in writing [sic], then and in either of these cases the trusts of the principal indenture declared of the trust fund and the income thereof after the death of the said Henry Whiting shall, subject as next hereinafter (meaning thereby clause 10 of the principal indenture) mentioned, cease and determine as from the date of such marriage." By this deed-poll the following declaration was introduced into the original settlement: "That the consents or consent by the principal indenture as varied by these presents required to the marriage of the said Juliette Whiting shall apply to every marriage contracted by her during the life of the said Henry Whiting, and after his death during the lives of the said Juliette Antoinette Whiting, Henry Paul Whiting, and Matthew Noel Whiting, and the lives of the survivors and the life of the survivor of them. And, in so far the principal indenture and the said deed-poll are not revoked, altered, or varied by these presents, the said Henry Whiting doth hereby confirm the same."

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By this deed-poll power to revoke or vary was again reserved.

By a deed-poll dated the 29th of December, 1893, the trust of the residue for the settlor's two sons was revoked, and there was substituted for it a gift of the residue to the magistrates at Bow-street upon the same trusts as had been declared of the £5,000 given to them by the settlement.

In August, 1893, the settlor made a will by which he made no provision for his daughter, but he confirmed the settlement of 1886 as varied by the deeds-poll and subject to his power of thereafter revoking the same. He died on the 8th of December, 1894, without again having exercised his power of revocation.

On the 18th of September, 1897, Matthew Noel Whiting died.

In March, 1902, the daughter, who was then more than twenty-six years of age, became engaged to be married to General Sir Alfred Turner, K.C.B. Her mother approved of and consented to the marriage, but the brother, Henry Paul Whiting, refused to give his consent.

The mother died on the 16th of June, 1902, and on the 23rd of August, 1902, the daughter, being then of the age of thirty-four, was married to Sir A. Turner without the consent of her brother, Henry Paul Whiting.

The trustees of the settlement and deeds-poll took out a summons to determine the question whether the condition as to the daughter's marriage was valid, and whether by her marriage without her brother's consent her interest and that of any issue which she might have, had been forfeited, and whether the trust funds ought to be transferred to the magistrates of the Bow-street police-court.

Warrington, J., held that the condition was valid, and that, Lady Turner having married without her brother's consent, the gift over took effect.

Lady Turner appealed.

Sir E. Clarke, K.C., and Manby, for the appellant.—If this condition is a condition imposing a restraint upon marriage at any time during the daughter's life, we submit that it is an unreasonable condition. It is the policy of the law to discourage restraints on marriage. Warrington, J., held that he was bound by Lloyd v. Branton, 3 Mer. 108. But this point was not really discussed in that case. Lloyd v. Branton really decided that, having regard to Dashwood v. Lord Bulkeley, 10 Ves. 230, it was too late to discuss the question, and in Dashwood v. Lord Bulkeley Lord Eldon does not specifically deal with this question at all. We also submit that, if the condition is valid, on the construction of these documents it is imposed only in the case of the daughter's marriage under twenty-six. She did not marry till after that age, and so no forfeiture has taken place. Further, there is no effectual gift over here, the fund not being required for the purpose mentioned by the settlor.

They cited Scott v. Tyler, 2 Dick. 712, W. & T. (7th ed.) vol. 1, p. 535; Allen v. Jackson, 24 W. R. 306, 1 Ch. D. 399; Stackpoole v. Beaumont, 3 Ves. 89; Garrett v. Pritty, 2 Vern. 293; Stratton v. Grymes, 2 Vern. 357; Underwood v. Morris, 2 Atk. 184; Morley v. Richardson, 2 Hare 570; Chauncey v. Graydon, 2 Atk. 616; Crommelin v. Crommelin, 3 Ves. 227; Marples v. Bainbridge, 1 Madd. 590; Bellairs v. Bellairs, 22 W. R. 942, 18 Eq. 510; Knapp v. Noyes, Amb. 662; Desbody v. Boyville, 2 P. Wms. 547; Duggan v. Kelly, 10 Ir. Eq. Rep. 473.

Mulligan, K.C., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the trustees of the settlement, representing possible unborn issue of Lady Turner.—Lloyd v. Branton seems to be the first case in which it was held that the forfeiture of a mother's interest involved the forfeiture of the children's interest in remainder. It does not appear whether the children were represented in that case, and the judgment only deals with the mother's rights. This is a clause in restraint of marriage, and as such will be discouraged: Cooke v. Turner, 15 M. & W. 727.

Rowden, K.C., and Marsham, for the magistrates.—The restraint on marriage is only partial and, there being a gift over, the condition is valid: Theobald on Wills (5th ed.), p. 544. Lloyd v. Branton exactly applies to the present case. That decision was founded on earlier decisions, and it has stood so long that it will not now be overruled.

They cited Daley v. Desbouverie, 3 Mer. 108; Aston v. Aston, 2 Vern. 452; Cleaver v. Spurling, 2 P. Wms. 526.

R. J. Parker, for the Attorney-General.

Sir E. Clarke, K.C., in reply, cited Reynish v. Martin, 3 Atk. 330.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This branch of the law is one with which it is not very satisfactory to deal, and I cannot say that I think the mode in which it has been dealt with is very easy to weld into one consistent whole. We are told that the law on this point has been partially imported into our system of law from the Roman law, and that this was done through the ecclesiastical courts. And then we are told that the Court of Chancery did not entirely adopt the view of the law adopted by the ecclesiastical courts, just as the ecclesiastical courts did not adopt in its entirety the Roman law. And eventually, as a matter of history, we find ourselves face to face with this state of things—that the Court of Chancery had to administer rules of law which they did not think very fair or very just, and that they were constantly straining the rules by which they yet declared that they were bound in order to escape from them. By the time at which Lord Eldon was Lord Chancellor the rules of law which had to be applied when the question was raised whether a particular disposition, in either a will or a deed inter vivos, was such as would be enforced by the law, as not being inconsistent with the interests of the public or the policy of the law, or the rules which had been laid down with regard to the policy of the law, had come to be tolerably well ascertained. Under the circumstances I think that, if we find decisions of that date based upon the assumption that the law had been settled up to that time, we ought not to depart from them, unless there is reason to suppose either that they have been questioned in subsequent cases, or that they have not been accepted by conveyancers and by the profession generally as being sound decisions which could be safely acted upon. Speaking for myself, I cannot regard the present state of the law as very satisfactory. I do not suppose any one would say that it is desirable in the interests of the community that gifts should be treated as valid which distinctly encourage celibacy and discourage marriage. On the other hand, I do not suppose that any one would say that every partial restraint of marriage is an injury to society and ought to be treated as null and void. Possibly, some middle line should be drawn, and it might be said that in each case we have to consider whether the particular condition in partial restraint of marriage is a reasonable one looking at matters from the point of view of the community. But, in my opinion, we are not really in a position to deal with such matters according to our own view of what might or might not be desirable for the community. I think we are bound to follow the decisions of Lord Eldon in Dashwood v. Lord Bulkeley, and Sir William Grant in Lloyd v. Branton. If I had to consider the question whether it is in the interest of the community to allow a restraint upon a woman's freedom of marriage to be continued during the whole of her life, unless her marriage were with the consent of a named person, I might perhaps come to the conclusion that this would not be to the interest of the public. But, as I have said, I think I am not entitled to consider any such question, and the only matter which I have to consider is whether the cases which I have mentioned do lay down the law in such a way that the condition in the present settlement is valid according to law, and can be enforced. I have come to the conclusion that those decisions do show that this condition is valid, and can be enforced, and that we are bound to give our decision accordingly.

I will deal first with Lloyd v. Branton. There can be no doubt that in the result it was held in that case that, there being a condition under which the marriage of a lady without consent was to operate as a forfeiture of her interest, there being also a gift over in the event of forfeiture, it was a valid condition, and that the forfeiture must take effect, although the consent would have to be obtained after she had attained the age of twenty-one. That being the result of Lloyd v. Branton, let us see what is the real ground upon which we are asked to reverse the decision of Warrington, J. As it seems to me, the outcome of it is this: It is said that if we construe the clause as meaning that the consent required is to be necessary during the whole life of the daughter, now Lady Turner, the condition would be an unreasonable one, and although the restraint on marriage is partial, not general, and there is a gift over, yet the court ought to say that this provision for forfeiture is inconsistent with the freedom of marriage and must be treated as null and void. It seems to me that that contention is rendered impossible by the decisions in Lloyd v. Branton and Dashwood v. Lord Bulkeley. I will not deal at length with the other points which have been made. It is said that we ought not to construe the deeds as showing that the settlor intended that the conditions of obtaining the required consents to the marriage of the daughter should extend beyond her age of twenty-six. We have heard the arguments upon that point, and I think we have all come clearly to the conclusion that we cannot put such a construction upon the deeds. It may be quite true, and I think it is true, that in several of the cases which have been cited there was a great straining by the court of the words of the instrument then in question in order to avoid a forfeiture. But we have come to the conclusion that there is nothing in the words of these successive deeds which would justify us in saying that the necessity for consent was to come to an end as soon as the daughter had arrived at the age of twenty-six. Then it was said that in this case there is no gift over. If there was no gift over I agree that there would be great difficulty in supporting this condition, and the forfeiture which is based upon the breach of it. But to my mind it is perfectly clear that there is a gift over, and, as was pointed out in the course of the argument, it is to take effect not only in the case of the breach of the condition with respect to marriage with consent, but also in the event of Lady Turner dying without issue. Under these circumstances it seems to me plainly impossible to say that there is no gift over.

That leads us to the result, first, that there is a condition necessitating the consent of the settlor's widow and the two brothers or the survivors or survivor of them to any marriage of the daughter, and that this condition remains in force during the whole life of the daughter provided that the persons who are to give the consent or any of them are living; and secondly, that there is a plain gift over. That being so, the question arises whether the law had been so definitely settled by Lloyd v. Branton and Dashwood v. Lord Bulkeley that we are bound by those decisions. In my opinion the law has been thus definitely settled. As regards Lloyd v. Branton it was not suggested that the facts were not such that the decision by implication involved a decision of this point adverse to the appellants. Neither was it said that the question was not raised in argument. But it was said, and was accurately said, that Sir William Grant, M.R., did not in terms deal with this question. Let us see how that really stands. The question had been raised, and the Master of the Rolls was obviously extremely anxious if he could to support the settlement so as to prevent the forfeiture taking effect. The Master of the Rolls said: "It is now too late to raise a doubt on the legality of the condition on which Mrs. Barnard's right to the bequests given her by the will is made to cease." Now the condition to which the Master of the Rolls was referring was that if Mrs. Barnard should marry without the consent of specified persons her interest under the will should be forfeited, and the condition was not limited to her infancy or any specific time. Then the Master of the Rolls continued: "In the modern case of Dashwood v. Lord Bulkeley, the validity of such a condition does not seem to have been considered as at all open to controversy, although it was not confined to marriage under twenty-one." The latter words show that the question whether it was essential to the validity of the condition that it should be confined to marriage under twenty-one was distinctly before the Master of the Rolls. The only objection that counsel for the appellant was able to take to Lloyd v. Branton was that the decision was not justified by Dashwood v. Lord Bulkeley. I think I may say that it was admitted that Lloyd v. Branton was conclusive unless we accepted the appellant's view of the construction of the successive deeds, and that the only way to get rid of Lloyd v. Branton was by saying that it was based upon Dashwood v. Lord Bulkeley, and that Dashwood v. Lord Bulkeley did not really determine the point which Sir William Grant assumed that it did.

I will now say a few words about Dashwood v. Lord Bulkeley. The report shows that in the first instance there was a decree of Lord Rosslyn which is set out on p. 236. By the decree pronounced by Lord Rosslyn on the 25th of April, 1796, it was declared that the plaintiff, Elizabeth Dashwood, was entitled to a sum of £400 a year under the will. That is, she was entitled to the reduced sum only which was to come to her in the event of her marrying without the required consent. Then, the report goes on, after the death of Mr. Dashwood, a petition of re-hearing was presented by his widow, insisting that she did not by her marriage under the circumstances forfeit any of the bequests under the will. Then there is the argument of the case. It is quite true that the point as to the validity of the conditions was not the only point made. There was also an argument whether there had been any breach of the condition. When the Lord Chancellor gave his judgment it is quite true, as was pointed out, that he did not actually deal with the point whether a condition requiring consent to marriage during the whole life was valid or not, but at the same time it is plain from the account of the argument that the point was raised before him, and raised in the most specific way. Then the Lord Chancellor at the end of his judgment: "Upon the whole, I cannot reverse this decree without some principle that will stand the test of general application, and though I seriously wish I could I dare not say I have found such a principle." It is impossible to read that report without seeing that the very question whether a condition requiring consent to marriage, not only up to the age of twenty-one, but during the whole life of the lady, was a valid condition which could be enforced in law was present to Lord Eldon, that point having been brought prominently before him by the fact and by the argument. When, then, we find Lord Eldon anxious if he can to avoid a forfeiture, and winding up his judgment with the words which I have just read, is it possible to avoid the conclusion that he deliberately meant to say that he could not accept the principle that a condition providing for a forfeiture upon marriage without consent was void unless the necessity for that consent was limited to the infancy of the man or the woman, as the case might be? Under these circumstances I have no hesitation in saying that those two cases are directly in point and that they are binding on us. Both Lord Eldon and Sir William Grant treated the point, not as a new one, but as one which had been settled before, and our attention was called to a decision of Lord Hardwicke, which it was said was probably the case to which Lord Eldon referred when he treated the law on this point as being already settled. That may be quite right, but it was not necessary to refer to that particular case as being the only one in which the point had been decided, for it was decided by Lord Keeper Wright in Aston v. Aston, 2 Vern. 452, in 1703. The third proposition stated by the Lord Keeper was this, "that in case of marriage without consent, although but a condition subsequent, the court cannot relieve against the forfeiture by reason of the devise over, although it be a hard condition, no time being limited, but goes to a marriage at any time, even after the age of twenty-one." This being so, I think it is not easy for us to quarrel with the historical accuracy of this view of Lord Eldon and Sir William Grant, that in their days it was too late to say that the extension of the necessity of the consent to a period after infancy had come to an end renders the condition for the forfeiture of the property void in a case in which there is a gift over.

I think, therefore, there is really nothing more for us to decide in the present case than, first, that, according to the true construction of these successive deeds, there is a condition which operates, not only until the age of twenty-six by the daughter, but extends to the whole of her life, provided that any of the persons whose consent is required survives, and that there is a gift over. And inasmuch as Lady Turner has married without the consent of the survivor of those persons, I think we are bound by the decisions in Lloyd v. Branton and Dashwood v. Lord Bulkeley to hold that her interest and the interests of her possible children under the settlement have been forfeited. I should have been very glad if we could have decided otherwise.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. First, on the question of the construction of the deed of settlement as varied by the deeds-poll, I can only say that I agree with the view which was taken by the learned judge in the court below. I cannot see my way to limit clause 9 as altered by the deed-poll of the 22nd of May, 1891, so as to confine the gift over to a marriage under the age of twenty-six years. Moreover there is to my mind a clear gift over, and there is therefore no ground for the argument that the condition was imposed merely in terrorem. That being so, the only remaining question is whether the gift over, on the marriage of this lady without the consent of her mother and the two brothers, or of the survivors or survivor of them, can be held to be void as being in restraint of marriage. It is to be observed that it is not in general restraint of marriage, it is in partial restraint only, and there are many cases in which conditions subsequent imposing partial restraints of marriage have been held good. As regards the form of condition which we have here, a limited restraint of marriage with a gift over in the event of marriage without the required consent, there are, as my lord has pointed out, two clear decisions of Lord Eldon and Sir William Grant, which show that such a condition is valid. My lord has so fully dealt with those cases that I need not refer to them at any length. It is to be noticed that in Dashwood v. Lord Bulkeley, Lord Eldon was anxious if he could to find any principle upon which he could hold that the gift over did not take effect. He commenced his judgment by saying: "I have looked through all the cases upon this subject with a very anxious wish to find a principle for reversing this decree which I dare trust as a principle to govern future cases; and though a review of the authorities has brought back to my mind many considerations that formerly affected it in this case, I dare not say this case will come within any such principle as the court has acted upon hitherto." It is impossible to suppose that Lord Eldon in considering the case did not consider the more general question whether such a condition as that which he had before him was void. He did not specifically deal with that question in his judgment, obviously because he thought that at this time it could not be satisfactorily raised. And it is equally clear when you read Sir William Grant's judgment on the similar point which he had before him, that he regarded it as too late in the day to raise the question of the invalidity of such a condition. That being so, how much more impossible is it for this court, after a lapse of nearly a century since the decision in Lloyd v. Branton, to take upon itself to reverse in principle those two decisions, not to mention the earlier decision, Aston v. Aston. And that difficulty is increased by this fact, that, though the counsel for the appellant have obviously exercised great care in searching for authorities, there is apparently not a single case to be found in the books which militates against the principle of those two decisions of Lord Eldon and Sir William Grant. Not a single recorded case which would justify the contention for the appellant. Moreover, I cannot help thinking that after this long lapse of time those decisions must have been acted upon in many settlements and wills; and it would, in my opinion, be lamentable, after such judgments as those having been for so long acquiesced in and acted upon, if dealings on the footing of their being good law should now be upset by us. Under these circumstances it seems to me impossible for us sitting here to accede to the views of the appellant's counsel, and I think the appeal must be dismissed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. I will not add anything on the question of the construction of these deeds which seems to me reasonably plain. I think it is also reasonably clear that there is a perfectly good gift over. Suppose that Lady Turner had died a spinster or had, after marrying with consent, died without issue, would there in that event have been a good gift over, or would the legacy have fallen into the residue? It seems to me perfectly plain that there would have been a good gift over for a charitable purpose and that is the very same gift over which, assuming the condition to be valid, is to operate on breach of the condition. The real point of substance is that of the validity of this condition. Now, in my view this point was settled 200 years ago, in 1703, in Aston v. Aston. The Lord Keeper, Sir Nathan Wright treated it as clear that a condition in partial restraint of marriage, providing for a forfeit upon marriage without consent either before or after twenty-one, was a valid condition. In 1738 in Daley v. Desbouverie Lord Hardwicke assumed that proposition because he went into a very elaborate discussion as to whether a condition requiring consent to marriage not limited to the age of twenty-one had been got rid of on the ground that the evidence proved that the consent had in fact been given. That discussion would have been needless had he not adopted the view expressed by Sir Nathan Wright in 1703. Again, in 1768 Lord Camden in Knapp v. Noyes does not seem to have felt any doubt that such a condition not limited to minority, but extending over a daughter's whole life, might be valid, although he said it was not a condition likely to be found in a will, and on the construction of the will then before him he held that that was not the true effect of it. Then we come in 1788 to the great case of Scott v. Tyler, and as I read Lord Thurlow's judgment, he again treated this proposition as settled. He said: "Therefore an injunction to ask the consent, as I have said before, is a lawful condition as not restraining marriage generally." No trace is to be found there of any limitation to marriage under twenty-one. I may remark in passing that Lord Eldon was one of the counsel who argued Scott v. Tyler. Then we come to 1804, just 100 years ago, to Dashwood v. Lord Bulkeley, a case which was argued by Sir Samuel Romilly and decided by Lord Eldon, and neither counsel in arguing the case nor the Lord Chancellor in deciding it, although he was most anxious to help the lady, treated the question as an open one. Then we come to 1817, to Lloyd v. Branton, in which Sir William Grant in express terms said that it was too late to raise a doubt as to the legality of such a condition. Under these circumstances I think it is impossible for us to differ from the decision of Warrington, J., unless we are prepared (which I certainly am not) to overrule this long series of decisions extending over two centuries. I will only add that, although our attention has not been called to any case in which the rule has been applied to a deed as distinct from a will I can see no ground for drawing any distinction between the two.

Solicitors, Boxall & Boxall; Frere, Cholmeley, & Co.; Solicitor to the Treasury.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Farwell, J. } Jan. 31; Feb. 1, 8.

In re NESBITT AND POTTS' CONTRACT AND In re THE VENDOR AND PURCHASER ACT, 1874. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Specific performance—Title—Possessory title — Restrictive covenant — Notice — Purchaser for value—Real Property Limitation Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27), s. 34.

Freehold land held by virtue of a statutory title based on adverse possession for twelve years is not thereby freed from restrictive negative covenants. Such covenants are analogous to an equitable charge, and the land can only be freed from them (1) by showing abandonment, or (2) by the plea of purchaser of the legal estate for value without notice, the person advancing such plea being bound to show that he accepted nothing less than a full title of forty years, and that this title did not disclose the restrictions in question.

Summons.

By a contract in writing dated the 1st of January, 1903, a vendor, F. V. Nesbitt, agreed to sell to a purchaser, S. L. Potts, a piece of land at Leytonstone for £3,200.

The contract provided that the title should begin with a conveyance of the 11th of August, 1890, "in which indenture it is stated that Thomas Headde and his father had at that date been in possession of the said property for thirteen years and upwards."

It was admitted for the purpose of getting a decision on the point at issue—namely, whether the vendor could give a good title to the land freed from certain restrictive covenants: (1) That T. Headde had acquired a possessory title in 1890. (2) That there was in existence a deed dated in 1872 containing restrictive negative covenants affecting the land to be sold or a material part of it. (3) That neither the present vendor, when he bought in 1901, nor the purchaser under the conveyance made in 1890, had made any inquiry as to the title prior to 1878, the date when adverse possession began.

Jenkins, K.C., and Romer Macklin, for the vendor, contended that the land was not subject to restrictive covenants in his hands, on the ground that neither Headde nor the purchaser from him in 1890 nor the present vendor had any notice of the existence of the covenants, and that there was nothing which would enable the court to bind their consciences to give effect to them. Headde was not bound (1) because he acquired title by possession under the statute and had nothing to do with the title of anyone prior to him, and (2) because section 34 of the Real Property Limitation Act protected him whether he had notice or not; and if this were so, it was immaterial whether subsequent purchasers from him had notice or not. Failing that, it was argued (3) that the two subsequent purchasers from him were not bound unless they were affected with notice.

Jessel, for the purchaser.

FARWELL, J., in a considered judgment, after stating the facts, said: Covenants restricting the enjoyment of land, except, of course, as between the contracting parties and those privy to the contract, are not enforceable by anything in the nature of action or suit founded on contract. Such actions and suits alike depend on privity of contract (Cox v. Bishop, 8 D. M. & G. 815), and no possession of the land coupled with notice of the covenants can avail to create such privity (ibid.). But if the covenant be negative so as to restrict the mode of use and enjoyment of the land, then there is called into existence an equity attached to the property of such a nature that it is annexed to and runs with it in equity: Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Ph. 774. This equity, although created by covenant or contract, cannot be sued on as such, but stands on the same footing and is completely analogous to an equitable charge on real estate created by some predecessor in title of the present owner of the land charged. Such a charge was created in its inception by contract between A. and B., the lender and the borrower, but when B. has sold the land charged to C., A. cannot sue C. on the contract to repay, but can only enforce the charge upon the land. This is the basis of the decision of the Court of Appeal in Haywood v. Brunswick Building Society, 30 W. R. 299, 8 Q. B. D. 403, where it was held that, where land had been granted in fee in consideration of a rent-charge and a covenant to lay out money in building and repairing, the assignee of the grantee of the land was not liable on the covenant to repair, because, as Cotton, L.J., put it, "the covenant to repair can only be enforced by making the owner put his hand in his pocket, and there is nothing which would justify us in going that length." In other words, effect is given to the negative covenant by means of the land itself. But the land cannot spend money on improving itself, and there is no personal liability on the owner of the land for the time being, because there is no privity of contract on which he can be sued in contract. So in Mander v. Falcke, 40 W. R. 31, [1891] 2 Ch. 554, a mere occupation of land was held to be within that principle. In London and South-Western Railway Co. v. Gomm, 30 W. R. 620, 20 Ch. D. 583, Sir George Jessel states that in his view the doctrine is either an extension in equity of Spencer's case to another line of cases or of the doctrine of negative easements, but that, whatever it was, "the purchaser took the estate subject to the equitable burden, with the qualification that if he acquired the legal estate for value without notice he was freed from the burden. That qualification, however, did not affect the nature of the burden. The notice was required merely to avoid the effect of the legal estate, and did not create the right, and if the purchaser took only an equitable estate, he took subject to the burden whether he had notice or not." He says also, at p. 580, "If it binds the land, it creates an equitable interest in the land." These passages are cited as correct in the considered judgment of the Court of Appeal in Rogers v. Hosegood, 48 W. R. 659, [1900] 2 Ch. 405. It is clear therefore that the person entitled to the benefit of a restrictive negative covenant over Blackacre has an equitable interest in Blackacre, and that such interest has the same nature and qualities as any other equitable interest in land in respect of priority, notice, and the like; but that notice forms no part of the cause of action in respect of such equitable interest. The plaintiff's claim depends on the validity and priority of his own charge, not on any notice, unless and until the owner of the land sets up as a defence the plea of purchaser for value without notice and with the legal estate. The fact that the usual contest in such cases is whether the landowner had notice or not, has doubtless made it usual to speak of notice as an essential part of the plaintiff's case in order to enable the court to bind the defendant's conscience; but it is quite clear that the equitable charge is created and exists independently of notice, and that no question of binding the defendant's conscience arises until he sets up the legal estate. It was suggested that the Privy Council in Maclean v. Mackay, 29 W. R. 798, took the view that the person to be bound by the covenant must derive title from the covenantor; but the passage merely purports to state the effect of Tulk v. Moxhay, and cannot fairly be read as deciding anything on the point.

(a.) Reported by C. H. CARDEN NOAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It has not been, and could not, of course, be, contended that Headde, who was a trespasser until he acquired a title under the Statute of Limitations, was a purchaser for value. He could not, therefore, have set up any want of notice as an effectual defence to an action to enforce the restrictive covenants against him, and I am of opinion, therefore, that the land in his hands was bound by these covenants.

The next point is the plea of the Statute of Limitations. Section 34 is as follows: "That at the determination of the period limited by this Act to any person for making an entry or distress, or bringing any writ of quare impedit or other action or suit, the right and title of such person to the land, rent, or advowson, for the recovery whereof such entry, distress, action, or suit respectively might have been made or brought within such period shall be extinguished." It is now settled that the effect of this section is to extinguish the title of the dispossessed owner, not to transfer it to the statutory owner (see Tichborne v. Weir, 67 L. T. Rep. 735, where it was accordingly held that the statutory owner who had ousted a lessee did not become liable to the payment of rent and performance of covenants to which such lessee was liable), and it is argued from this, that Headde acquired a title free from all burdens attaching to the former owner's estate. But that decision is no authority for such a contention. The lessee's covenants and liabilities were incident to and part of the lessee's estate, and that estate was extinguished. The burden of these restrictive covenants is not incident but paramount to the estate of the dispossessed owner, and all that the Act extinguishes is the right and title of the person who fails to make an entry or bring an action for the recovery of the land in question. The right to enforce these covenants was no part of his title, nor is such right within the Act at all, for it is obvious that the person entitled to enforce them cannot do so by making any entry or distress or bringing any action to recover land. On the contrary, his action proceeds on the assumption that the land is and will remain in the possession of the defendant. The real analogy is not to a lessee's covenants, but to rights of way and similar easements. If a trespasser acquires a statutory title to land over which such easements exist he cannot plead the Statute of Limitations to persons seeking to enforce them, but must show abandonment like any other landowner. The Statute of Limitations therefore is no answer.

The third point is this. The vendor says that both he and the purchaser in 1890 were purchasers for value without notice. The present purchaser says that they had constructive notice. It is assumed that there was no actual notice, nor that form of constructive notice which arises from wilful abstention to inquire. Now it is well settled that a purchaser is bound to inquire into the title to the land offered to him by his vendor, and will be affected with notice of all that he would have ascertained if he had made proper inquiries, whether his abstention from inquiry is due to voluntary waiver or waiver under contract: Wilson v. Hart, 14 W. R. 748, 1 Ch. App. 467, and Patman v. Harland, 29 W. R. 707, 17 Ch. D. 353. The law is now declared by section 3 of the Conveyancing Act, 1882: "A purchaser shall not be prejudicially affected by notice of any instrument, fact, or thing, unless (1) it . . . would have come to his own knowledge if such inquiries and inspection had been made as ought reasonably to have been made by him." Sir George Jessel answers the question, "What is reasonable inquiry?" thus (29 W. R. 708): "It has been held that he is to require the usual title whatever the usual title may be." Now the usual title is forty years: In re Cox and Neve, 39 W. R. 412, [1891] 2 Ch. 109. In an ordinary case it is generally easy to show what would have been discovered if the full title had been shown, by producing that title. But here it is said that the paper title, prior to the twelve years' possession was not the title that the vendor should produce. But however plausible this reason for not producing more than twenty years' title may have seemed, the purchaser was not bound to accept it. If authority is needed for this, the recent case of Jacobs v. Revell, 49 W. R. 109, [1900] 2 Ch. 859, affords it. But it is obvious that such a title as the vendor in 1890 or 1901 had to offer was open to serious objections and risks, and that no court would have compelled specific performance of an open contract to purchase land held under such a title. It is true that there are cases in which a title depending on the Statute of Limitations has been forced on a purchaser, but they are cases in which a particular objection, apparent on the face of the title as shown, has been held to be covered by possession for the statutory period. But the court in these cases adjudicated upon the existence of the suggested title; it did not compel the purchaser to take a leap in the dark. It follows, therefore, that inasmuch as the present vendor and the purchaser in 1890 accepted a title that they could not have been compelled to take, they waived their right to the production of the full title on which they might have insisted, and must be liable for the consequences.

Then it is said that there is nothing to show that such title would have disclosed the deed of 1872. But the plea of purchaser for value without notice is one single plea, to be proved by the person pleading it; it is not to be regarded as a plea of purchaser for value, to be met by a reply of notice. The plea of a purchase without notice is one which ought to be specifically alleged, as well as proved, by those who rely on it. It is therefore for the vendor to prove that he had no notice from the prior deeds, and he can only do this by producing such deeds. I see no hardship in this, but it would indeed be strange if the vendor, whose title is deficient in that it lacks the proper evidences for forty years, could give a better title than the man whose muniment room is filled with the proper equipment of deeds, and not the less strange because the deficiency of title results from the fact that part of the title results from a successful trespass. The statutory title is due to the demerits of the owner, who was careless enough to allow himself to be dispossessed for twelve years, not to any merits of the trespasser, who was a mere wrongdoer up to the last day of the twelve years. The latter is entitled to what the statute gives him, but no more, and those who purchase from him must take the risk of suffering for the infirmity of his title. The result is that a title is not shown at present.

Solicitors for the vendor, Harris, Chetham, & Cohen.

Solicitors for the purchaser, Granville Smith, Coleman, Betts, & Co.

Chan. Div. } Jan. 17.
Buckley, J. }

In re DUNCAN & CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Gaming and wagering contract — Money deposited as security — Stockbroking transactions — Interest upon deposits—Company in liquidation—Surplus assets—Gaming Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 109), s. 18.

A claim to the return of moneys deposited as security for the observance of a contract void under the Gaming Act, 1845, is a claim under contract, and therefore, if there is a contract express or implied between the parties that interest shall be paid upon this money, such interest is recoverable by the depositor.

A company carried on stock and share transactions, which were illegal as wagering transactions, for customers who deposited money as "cover" for these transactions. The company was wound up, but proved solvent, its creditors being paid 20s. in the £ upon their admitted proofs, and there were surplus assets. The course of dealing between the parties was for the company to pay interest to the customer upon the amount of "cover" in the company's hands.

Held, that the customers were entitled to interest as from the date of the winding up, in addition to the sums proved for.

Dictum of Rigby, L.J., in Strachan v. Universal Stock Exchange Co. (Limited), 43 W. R. 611, [1895] 2 Q. B., at p. 335, followed.

Summons.

In this case a question arose whether interest could be claimed upon sums deposited with stockbrokers as cover for transactions which were illegal under the Gaming Act, 1845.

The above company carried on business as stockbrokers, although not members of the Stock Exchange, and their course of business was to receive from their customers on deposit sums of money as "cover" for the transactions which was intended. They then entered into transactions of buying and selling stocks and shares for or with their customers which were admitted to be illegal, as being gaming and wagering contracts.

In May, 1901, the company was ordered to be wound up. Notice was given by the liquidator in September, 1903, of a first, and in June, 1904, of a final, dividend of 10s. in the pound (payable on the 4th of July, 1904), making up the whole 20s. in the pound.

There would still be a surplus of assets in the hands of the liquidator after payment of the final dividend, and certain of the creditors thereupon claimed interest on their admitted debts at 4 per cent. per annum, in addition to the final dividend, as from the commencement of the winding up of the company.

The liquidator divided the creditors of the company into six classes, but no question arose as to the three first classes. The three last classes were as follows: Class D were creditors who had claimed no interest on their principal; class E were creditors, whose claims as customers had been admitted in part, and several of whom had claimed interest up to the date of the liquidation; class F were creditors whose claims had been compromised under an order of the court and as such admitted. All these claims were in respect of unexhausted "cover" in the hands of the company. These creditors claimed interest upon their admitted proofs upon the ground that interest had been paid upon sums deposited by them with the company in the course of their dealings with the company.

The liquidator took out the summons for the directions of the court upon the claims for interest.

J. R. Atkin, for the liquidator.—The general rule is that interest is not payable, but where the debt is an interest-bearing debt, and the company is solvent, interest after the date of the winding up is payable: Warrant Finance Co.'s case, 17 W. R. 780, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 643. The question is whether these admitted claims for the "cover" are claims for interest-bearing debts.

Hon. Frank Russell, for creditors D. and E.—Interest upon these deposits has been paid in the course of dealing between the company and its customers. Their claims are therefore for interest-bearing debts: see the cases mentioned in Seton, vol. 2, p. 1386. The customers are therefore entitled to interest upon their claims since the date of the winding up in addition to the sums they have proved for. The arrangement as to these deposits was not part of the wagering contract (Universal Stock Exchange Co. v. Strachan, 44 W. R. 497, [1896] A. C. 166), and the implied contract as to payment of interest is binding and legal.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

C. L. Attenborough, for creditor F.

Sargant, for the contributories.—The whole contract is illegal and void. The customers get back their deposits as money had and received to their use, and not under any contract express or implied which the court will recognize or enforce. As regards the F class of customers, their proofs were admitted as compromises, and they cannot claim anything more.

BUCKLEY, J.—I think that it is made out that by reason of the course of dealing between the company and its customers there was a contract that the company would pay interest to the customers on the amount of their "cover." The result of the winding-up is that happily there has been enough to pay the creditors 20s. in the pound, and the only question I have to determine is whether the customers are entitled to interest in addition. For the purposes of my judgment I do not not think that there is any difference between the classes D, E, and F, with which I have to deal, subject to one point with which Mr. Sargant has pressed me as to Class F., which I will consider separately.

In Universal Stock Exchange v. Strachan, 44 W. R. 497, [1896] A. C. 166, it was held that the Gaming Act, 1845, does not apply to money deposited as "cover" for differences arising on gambling transaction, in stocks and shares. In the Court of Appeal, [1895] 2 Q. B., p. 335, Rigby, L.J., said: "The claim"—that is, the claim to get back the valuables—"may be called a claim in trover or detinue, or it may be called, and I rather lean to that point of view myself, redemption. Here is a man who claims to be mortgagee." It is the company here. "Directly the transactions are held to be gaming transactions, it follows as a matter of course that his claim in respect of them fails; and where from the nature of the transaction itself nothing can be due on the mortgage, the mortgagee must deliver up his security."

It is quite clear that the Lord Justice was dealing with it as a claim under contract. It was a contract between the parties, with the result that there is no mortgage debt in respect of which the mortgagee can hold his securities. Here the proof in the winding up is the form in which under the circumstances the customers assert their rights to work out the obligations arising under the contract, including, as it seems to me, their rights in respect of interest. I think that they are entitled to the interest which was payable to them upon their cover in the course of dealing. That disposes of classes D and E. With regard to class F, the proof of the creditors were for the amount of their debts at the commencement of the winding up. That has nothing to do with the question of interest after the winding up has commenced. There could be no proof for that. The compromises to prove for those amounts were not compromises as regards the right of the creditors to have the interest now claimed if the company turned out to be solvent.

I think that the interest claimed ought to be paid by the liquidator to all the three classes of creditors. Directions given accordingly.

Solicitors, Tyrrell Lewis, Lewis, & Broadbent; Emanuel & Co.; Attenborough & Sons; Nathaniel Reynolds.

K. B. Div. (Bray, J.) — Jan. 14.

AMBLER v. BISHOP OF LEEDS. (a.)

Light—Ancient lights—Prescription—Ordinary and extraordinary user—Nuisance—Damage—Construction.

To constitute an actionable obstruction of ancient lights there must be a substantial interference with the ordinary user of light, and if in respect of business premises, then with the ordinary user required for an ordinary business. In these expressions the word "ordinary" is used solely with reference to light, and an ordinary user or an ordinary business means a user or business which in fact requires only an ordinary amount of light. This is a question, not of law, but of fact.

There can be no prescription of an extraordinary user of light by user for twenty years, either with or without notice of the owner of the servient tenement.

Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores (Limited), ante, p. 30, [1904] A. C. 179, considered.

By a memorandum of agreement dated the 1st of December, 1902, the plaintiffs, Herbert Butler and William Fawcett, and the defendant, the Right Rev. William Gordon, D.D., Bishop of Leeds, agreed to submit their dispute and differences to arbitration. For the purposes of this report it is only material to set out part of paragraph 1 of the said memorandum—viz.: "All disputes and differences which have arisen or which shall hereafter arise as to the erection of the said cathedral with or without moderation of the plans already prepared for that purpose or as to the damage sustained . . . are hereby referred to the award and determination of . . ."

At the request of both parties, the umpire, Thomas Blashill, stated a special case for the opinion of the court dated the 20th of July, 1904, as follows: "Whether on the foregoing facts I am bound by the decision in the Home and Colonial Stores (Limited) v. Colls, ante, p. 30, [1904] A. C. 179, and therefore cannot award damages to the plaintiff, or whether I can award damages in respect of interference with such special user of light as aforesaid."

The following are the material facts and findings of the umpire as set forth in the special case stated:

"(1) Herbert Butler and William Fawcett, the plaintiffs, are the owners of 23, 25, 27, 29, 31, 33, and 37, on the west side of Cookridge-street, in Leeds. The defendant is the Right Rev. William Gordon, Bishop of Leeds, who is erecting a cathedral opposite the said premises, and the plaintiffs contend that the said cathedral has interfered with the light to which they are entitled and which has hitherto been enjoyed in connection with the said premises.

"(2) The upper parts of the buildings as to the rooms over No. 25 and 27 are used and have been used for upwards of twenty years past by the plaintiff Herbert Butler, an architect, for the purpose of his offices, including a drawing office on the first floor, for which a special amount of light is required, and at the north end they are occupied and have been occupied for upwards of twenty years past by a tenant of the plaintiff, a cloth merchant, who during such period has used a part of the first floor for the purpose of perching or examining and matching cloth, for which also a special amount of light is required.

"(3) All the lights are ancient, except as to the additional amount of light coming through the new shop fronts.

"(10) The plaintiffs claim that they are entitled to damages in respect of all the premises, and in particular in respect of damages in respect of the special user of parts of the first floor as before mentioned, as the rentals at present obtained, or at which the premises occupied by the said Herbert Ambler were estimated previous to the erecting of the cathedral, will not be obtainable again.

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"(11) The plaintiffs also claim that the agreement of reference constitutes a submission to arbitration for the purpose of assessing all damages sustained by them in respect of the interference with, or obstruction of, light to their premises, irrespective of whether or not such damage is sufficiently material or substantial to entitle the plaintiffs to an injunction in an action in this honourable court.

"I therefore award and find as follows: Notwithstanding the defendant's buildings, there remains sufficient light to the plaintiffs' premises for all purposes of ordinary user, and the plaintiffs are not entitled to damages for interference with such ordinary use, but if I am entitled to take into account damages which the plaintiffs have sustained in respect of loss of light to those parts of the said premises used for occupation in respect of which a special amount of light is required, then I award £600 damages to be paid by the defendant to the plaintiffs."

Eldon Bankes, K.C., and Longstaffe, for the plaintiffs.—The law applicable to nuisances is now applicable, it has been decided, to interference with light, except in so far as an exceptional amount of light is claimed. The question whether an extraordinary amount of light is required for a particular class of business is a question of law; here the arbitrator finds that a drawing office of an architect requires an extraordinary amount of light, which I submit is a finding of law, and is incorrect. Moreover, the question referred to the arbitrator was whether the plaintiffs had suffered damage in fact, not whether there was an actionable nuisance: see paragraph 1 of the agreement of reference.

They also referred to Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores (Limited), ante, p. 30, [1904] A. C. 179; Rushmer v. Polsue, Times, Jan. 14, 1905.

Waugh, K.C., with him Waddy, for the defendants.—The first question to be decided is to what quantum of light are the plaintiffs entitled, and, that being ascertained, then the amount of damage suffered can be arrived at. In paragraph 1 of the agreement of reference the obstruction of light is referred to, and by obstruction is, of course, meant legal obstruction. Now, the umpire has found that the plaintiffs are entitled to £600 damages, not in any event, but only if there has been a legal obstruction of their rights. If the umpire finds that the ground floor has sufficient light, but the floor above has more light, that is nothing but a finding of fact that that particular business carried on on the floor above requires an extraordinary amount of light. The umpire finds there is sufficient light for ordinary purposes, but if he is entitled to award damages for interference with an extraordinary amount of light, then he awards £600 damages. The Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71), s. 3, only refers to ordinary user: Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores (Limited). The fact that you have enjoyed for a time a greater user does not entitle you to acquire a right of greater user: vide p. 203 of above case. Again, something done by the owner of the dominant tenement cannot affect the quantum of user if the owner of the servient tenement has no notice. There can be no actionable nuisance unless the individual has been deprived of something to which the ordinary individual is entitled: Lanfranchi v. Mackenzie, 15 W. R. 614, L. R. 4 Eq. 421.

Eldon Bankes replied.

JAN. 20.—BRAY, J., read the following judgment: This is a special case stated by an umpire in his award. The plaintiffs were the owners of eight houses in Cookridge-street, Leeds. The defendant was the Bishop of Leeds, and was erecting a cathedral on a piece of land opposite, partly vacant and partly occupied by old buildings, and the plaintiffs complained that the erection of the cathedral interfered with their ancient lights. The matters in dispute were referred to arbitration by an agreement between the parties dated the 21st of December, 1902. Mr. Blashill was appointed umpire, and the reference proceeded before him. After the evidence was closed he was asked to defer making his award until the House of Lords had given their decision in Colls v. The Home and Colonial Stores, and subsequently to state his award in the form of a special case. This he did, and by his award, after stating certain facts, awarded and found as follows: "Notwithstanding the defendant's buildings, there remains sufficient light to the plaintiffs' premises for all purposes of ordinary use and the plaintiffs are not entitled to damages for interference with such ordinary user, but if I am entitled to take into account damages which the plaintiffs have sustained in respect of loss of light to those parts of the said premises used for occupations in respect of which a special amount of light is required, then I award six hundred pounds damages to be paid by the defendant to the plaintiffs," and he submitted to the court the following question: "Whether on the foregoing facts I am bound by the decision in Home and Colonial Stores v. Colls, and therefore cannot award damages to the plaintiffs, or whether I can award damages in respect of interference with such special user as aforesaid." This is the question I have to decide.

Mr. Bankes, on behalf of the plaintiffs, took three points. First, he said that the umpire had found that an architect's business was not an ordinary business, that this was wrong in law, that an architect's business was an ordinary business, and as he had found that the light was insufficient for this business, he had found that it was insufficient for an ordinary business, and, therefore, according to the law as laid down in Colls's case, there had been an actionable interference with the plaintiffs' ancient lights and the plaintiffs were entitled to the £600 damages. And as an alternative to this he contended that the question whether an architect's business was an ordinary business was a mixed question of law and fact and the umpire must have misdirected himself or misunderstood Colls's case, and that I ought to send the case back for him to state the facts more fully.

Secondly, he contended that the twenty years' enjoyment had given the plaintiffs a right to the special light.

Thirdly, he contended that by the agreement of reference the defendant had agreed to pay for actual damage sustained whether there was actionable interference or not.

I will examine these contentions. First, what is meant by the expressions which are to be found in the special case and in the judgment in Colls's case, "ordinary user" or "ordinary business" or "ordinary purposes." I think that the word "ordinary" is used solely with reference to light; and an ordinary user, or an ordinary business means a user or business which in fact requires only an ordinary amount of light. Is this a question of law or fact? In my opinion it is a question of fact. It must depend upon the evidence in each case, and it cannot be adjudicated as a matter of law whether an architect's business or any other business is an ordinary business. If I am right in this I have no power to interfere with the finding of the umpire. I do not think it is even mixed fact and law; but if it were, I feel quite unable to see where the umpire has misdirected himself or how he has misunderstood Colls's case. When I look at the facts as stated in paragraphs 4 to 7 of the case it seems to me that the plaintiffs here have a far weaker case than the Home and Colonial Stores had. The width of the street in Colls's case was about equal to the height of the defendant's buildings, viz., forty-one feet. Here the street averages sixty feet in width and the height of the main wall is only fifty feet. It is true that opposite some small parts of the plaintiffs' premises the angle is reduced to forty-four degrees or even less, but these are not the parts of the premises where the special light is required. It seems to me that the umpire would have been wrong even as regards the ground floor if he had found that there was an actionable interference, much more so as regards the first floor. If his findings are to be criticized, the observation I should be disposed to make is that an architect and a cloth merchant must require an extraordinary amount of light if damage to the extent of the £600 have been sustained by the erection of the cathedral. But however that may be, I accept the umpire's finding, and accepting it I am quite unable to see that the umpire has misdirected himself or misunderstood Colls's case. In truth the findings that the architect and cloth merchant require a special light, and that this light has been interfered with, are intended by the umpire to be findings in the plaintiffs' favour which will enable them to raise their second point.

Further, it seems to me that the umpire has not intended to state a special case to enable the plaintiffs to raise their first point or to dispute any of his findings of fact. The only point raised is whether "on the foregoing facts he is prevented from awarding damages," and I have no right to question the facts.

I come now to the second point, which does raise a question of law—viz., whether use or enjoyment of a special light for twenty years gives a right to that special light, and thus enlarges the easement and increases the burden of the servient tenement. It is important to observe that the umpire does not state as a fact that the owners of the servient tenement were aware that the premises were being used for businesses that required special light. It was said by the plaintiffs' counsel that no evidence was given at the hearing before the umpire about it, and that if it is a relevant fact I ought to send the case back to the umpire to find it. I do not agree with that contention. A plaintiff has to prove his case, and if he does not prove a necessary fact of his case he must fail. The only fact, therefore, that I have to deal with, is the use and enjoyment of the special light for twenty years. Does that give a right to it? Now, this most important point was not decided in Colls's case; it was much discussed, but as their lordships came to the conclusion that there was no sufficient evidence of twenty years' user it became unnecessary to decide it. It is, however, referred to in Lord Davey's judgment, which is also the judgment of Lord Robertson, and is touched upon in Lord Lindley's, but there is certainly nothing in either of these judgments which assists the plaintiffs' contention. On the contrary, the inclination of their opinion seems against it. There is a dictum in Malins, V.C.'s, judgment in Lanfranchi v. Mackenzie, L. R. 4 Eq. 421, at p. 430, distinctly opposed to the plaintiffs' contention if knowledge is not to be assumed, and Mr. Bankes was unable to point to any dictum in any case in his favour. Malins, V.C.'s, reasons for thinking that no right could be gained in the absence of knowledge seems to me to be unanswerable.

If the origin of the right to light is a supposed lost grant or covenant, as the cases seem to show, who would presume that the owner of the servient tenement intended to grant a special right beyond the ordinary right when he was ignorant of the special user or enjoyment? I am, however, prepared to go further and to hold that even twenty years' enjoyment to the knowledge of the owner of the servient tenement will not give a larger right. I think that the results of the judgments in Colls's case is to show that the test of the right is whether the obstruction complained of is a nuisance. If one turns to the nuisance cases, do we find any trace of a doctrine that a person in bad health or carrying on a delicate trade is entitled to more comfort or freedom from annoyance than ordinary people because for twenty years his neighbours have been aware of his state of health or the trade he was carrying on and have left him undisturbed. I am not aware of any decision that suggests it. Such a proposition sounds absurd. Again, I think in many of the judgments in Colls' case and in other cases, it is implied if not expressed that in measuring the quantum of light to which the owner of the dominant tenement is entitled the purpose for which he desires to use or uses the light should be disregarded, and does not either enlarge or diminish the easement which he has acquired; see especially the judgment of Lord Davey, where he says that it is agreed on all hands that a man does not lose or restrict his right to light by non-user of his ancient light or by not using the full measure of light which the law permits. If the actual user is not the test where the use falls below the standard of what may reasonably be required for the ordinary purposes of inhabitancy and business, why, it may be asked, should it be made a test where the use has been of special or extraordinary character in excess of that standard. So in Yates v. Jack, L. R. 4 Ch. 295, Lord Cranworth rejects the argument of the defendant that the plaintiff's present business did not require a strong light, and for this business there remained a sufficient light. So again in Courtauld v. Legh, L. R. 4 Ex. 126, 17 W. R. Dig. 101, and it was held that the right was acquired, although for a part of the twenty years the house was uninhabited and unfit for habitation.

It was well observed by Mr. Waugh in his argument for the defendant that the special user on which the claim is founded is a user on the dominant tenement and not on the servient tenement. The servient tenement is not in any way affected by it. If the true doctrine be that it is laid down in Colls's case that by twenty years' user all that is acquired is a right to prevent the defendant from building so as to interfere with the light previously enjoyed, so materially as to amount to a nuisance, I think it would not be logically consistent with this doctrine to hold that a larger right can be acquired. I think also to introduce the element of the quantum of user would work inconvenience and introduce uncertainty. If the only right capable of being acquired be the sufficient light for the ordinary user of inhabitancy and business, the owner of the servient tenement knows his exact position, he knows within reasonable limits how high he can raise his buildings, and whether during the twenty years it is worth his while to obstruct his neighbour's windows. If a right to special light be capable of acquisition without his knowledge he cannot know his position, and if he has notice of some special light being required for his neighbour's business he cannot measure the extent with any exactitude. It seems to me altogether unreasonable to presume that any man would have made a grant of such an indefinite easement. On the whole I think both reason and authority compel me to decide this point against the plaintiffs.

The last point seems to depend entirely upon the true construction of the agreement of the 1st of December, 1902. Has the defendant by the agreement agreed to pay for actual damages sustained whether there was an actionable interference or not? Reliance was chiefly placed in the recital and in clause 1. It was said that the recital states that the agreement was a "compromise" which implies concession on both sides, and that if the defendant had not made this concession he had made none. Mr. Waugh pointed out that clause 9 was a concession, and I think he is right. I think the power was given in lieu of the power to grant an injunction. The real question, however, depends on clause 1. Does "interference with or obstruction of light" mean legal or actionable interference or obstruction, or in other words is it interference with or obstruction of light to which the plaintiff was entitled. This was the claim of the plaintiffs as appears by the recital. The recital implies that this was disputed, and this, I think, was the dispute referred to arbitration. I cannot draw from the words of the agreement any inference that the defendant intended to give up any legal defence. I think the dispute was whether the plaintiffs had sustained legal damage for which any action would lie against the defendant.

It remains, therefore, to look again at the findings of the umpire. He has found that sufficient light remained for all purposes of ordinary user. I think that finding was substantially the same as the finding of Joyce, J., in Colls's case, and the House of Lords having held that on that finding no action lay either for an injunction or for damages, I must hold that the plaintiffs are entitled to no damages here and must direct judgment to be entered for the defendant with costs so far as I have any jurisdiction to deal with costs.

Judgment for the defendants.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Pitman & Sons, for H. Denison, Leeds.

Solicitors for the defendants, Johnson, Weatherall, & Stuart, for Watkins, York.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy and Ridley, JJ.) Dec. 20.

YORKSHIRE (WOOLLEN DISTRICT) ELECTRIC TRAMWAYS v. ELLIS. (a.)

Tramway — Light railway — "Hackney carriage" — "Omnibus"—Tramcars run on rails laid in street and worked by electric energy—Town Police Clauses Act, 1847 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 89), ss. 37, 45—Town Police Clauses Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 89), ss. 3, 6—Light Railways Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 48)—Spen Valley Light Railway Order, 1901.

The appellants were a light railway company formed under provisional orders made in accordance with the Light Railways Act, 1896, who had been summoned and convicted for allowing one of their cars to ply for hire in the borough without a licence, contrary to the provisions of the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, as extended by the Town Police Clauses Act, 1889.

Held, that the appellants had been wrongly convicted, since the provisions in the Town Police Clauses Act, 1889, which enlarged the definition of hackney carriage in the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, so as to include omnibuses, did not apply to a car plying for hire on a street railway or tram line constructed and worked under an order made under the Light Railways Act, 1896, for such car was not a hackney carriage within the meaning of the Town Police Acts.

Case stated by the justices of the peace in and for the borough of Dewsbury, on an information preferred by the respondent, the town clerk of Dewsbury, against the appellants for permitting one of their tramcars to be used as a hackney carriage plying for hire within the said borough without having obtained a licence from the corporation for such carriage to ply for hire, as required by section 37 of the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847.

The justices held the offence proved, and fined the appellants 2s. 6d.

The case set out the following facts as admitted or proved before the justices:

(a) That the appellants were the proprietors of the carriage intended to be referred to in the information.

(b) That such carriage was similar to a tramcar worked by electrical energy, and was constructed for and used by the appellants to run over their light railways under and by virtue of the provisions of the Spen Valley Light Railway Order, 1901, and the Spen Valley Light Railway Extensions Order, 1901, both orders being made under the Light Railways Act, 1896, and formed part of the rolling stock equipment for the railways authorized to be provided therefor by the said orders and Act.

(c) That such light railway was similar in all respects to a tramway and ran through the public streets of Dewsbury and the adjoining districts.

(d) That on the 10th of May, 1904, the said carriage was used by the appellants to carry passengers at separate fares within the borough of Dewsbury.

(e) That the carriage had not been licensed by the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Dewsbury, and that no application for any such licence had been made.

4. The respondent contended that such carriage was an omnibus within the meaning of the Town Police Clauses Act, 1889, that it must therefore be deemed to be included within the term "hackney carriage" in sections 37 and 45 of the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, and that the appellants permitted the same to be used as a hackney carriage plying for hire within the borough contrary to the provisions of the last-mentioned section.

5. The appellants contended:

(a) That such carriage was in any event not an "omnibus" within the meaning of the Town Police Clauses Act, 1889, nor a "hackney carriage" within the meaning of the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847; and

(b) That by reason of the Light Railways Act, 1896, and the Spen Valley Light Railway Orders, the provisions of the said Town Police Clauses Acts did not apply to such carriage, and in any case no such licence as was referred to in the information was required therefor; and

(c) That the said carriage was not only licensed to be used by the said light railway orders, but was required to be so used; and

(d) That the said carriage did not ply for hire within the meaning of the Acts.

6. At the hearing the appellants cited the following cases: City and South London Railway Co. v. London County Council, [1891] 2 Q. B. 513, 39 W. R. Dig. 191, and Surrey Commercial Dock Co. v. Bermondsey Corporation, 52 W. R. 446, [1904] 1 K. B. 474.

7. The justices (by a majority of three to one) were of opinion that the said carriage was an omnibus within the meaning of the Town Police Clauses Act, 1889, and therefore a hackney carriage within the meaning of sections 37 and 45 of the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847; that the provisions of these Acts applied to such carriage and were not overriden by the Spen Valley Light Railway Order, 1901; and that the appellants had been guilty of an offence under section 45 of the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, in permitting such carriage to be used as a hackney carriage plying for hire within the borough of Dewsbury without having obtained a licence for the same.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

8. The question for the opinion of the court was whether upon the above statement of facts the justices had come to the correct determination in point of law, and if not, what should be done in the premises.

By sections 37 and 45 of the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 89), as incorporated with the Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), by section 171 of that Act, the proprietor of any carriage used as a hackney carriage without first being licensed by the urban authority is liable to a penalty. By the Town Police Clauses Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 14), which is to be deemed to be incorporated with section 171 of the Public Health Act, 1875, the above-mentioned provisions of the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, among others, are extended to omnibuses, and by section 3 of that Act the term "omnibus" when used in this Act shall include "every omnibus, char-a-banc, wagonette, brake, stage coach, and other carriage plying or standing for hire by or used to carry passengers at separate fares to, from, or in any part of the prescribed distance; but shall not include any tramcar or tram carriage duly licensed under the provisions of the Tramways Act, 1870, or of any Provisional Order made thereunder and confirmed by Parliament or under the provisions of any local Act of Parliament . . ."

The Spen Valley Light Railway Order, 1901, was an order of the Light Railway Commissioners of the ordinary form, authorizing the construction of a street railway in the nature of a tramcar, and containing provisions authorizing the Board of Trade to make regulations with regard to the use of mechanical power on the line and giving the local authority power to make bye-laws for the running of the cars, advertisements, and so forth.

Danckwerts, K.C. (Llewellyn Davies with him), for the appellants.—The justices' decision here that a carriage run upon a light railway was a hackney carriage carries with it this absurdity, that a light railway must get a licence from every local authority through whose district the line runs—and there might be a great many. Consequently, although the railway company was bound to run such a number of cars as was necessary to meet the public requirements, each of the local authorities would have the discretion of saying how many of these carriages there must be run within their district. [After referring to sections 11, 12, and 28 of the Light Railways Act, 1896, he was stopped.]

Macmorran, K.C., and C. Fleetwood Pritchard, for the respondent.—The licence to be granted by the urban authority under section 37 of the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, was only extended to omnibuses after the Town Police Clauses Act, 1889, came into force. Therefore tramcars would not have come within the section without special legislation when they were first authorized by the Tramways Act, 1870. We find that there was such a special provision in section 48 of the Act of 1870 referring to the licensing tramcars and the drivers and conductors. The Legislature deeming licences necessary in the case of tramways authorized under the Act of 1870 intended those provisions to extend to those tramways which are termed light railways and authorized by Light Railways Act, the carriages being indistinguishable for all practicable purposes from those used on a tramway. These street trains are not real railways stopping only at stations, but stop where required within certain restrictions to pick up or set down passengers. The definitions of hackney carriage in the Act of 1847 by the Act of 1889 is extended to omnibuses, and tramways are expressly excluded from its operation because provision already existed for the licensing of tramcars under the Act of 1870. The inference therefore is that the Legislature intended that the definition of omnibus in the Act should include a tramcar running on lines authorized by the Light Railways Act. The vehicles now in question are tramcars for all practical purposes, and therefore must be licensed under the Act of 1847 as extended to omnibuses by the Act of 1889.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—It seems to me that the point argued does the greatest credit to the ingenuity of the persons who have raised it, because no one with experience of parallel lines of legislation could possibly have come to the conclusion that that which is for all effective purposes a railway, was to be subject to the provisions of the Town Police Clauses Acts in the matter of the licensing of carriages. The licensing sections are those of the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, and it is sufficient for this purpose to say that by section 37 the local authority may from time to time licence to ply for hire such number of hackney carriages as they shall think fit. The control given to the local authority by the Act is not only in the matter of vehicles, but in the matter of drivers, and in the matter of the general conduct, and the way in which the carriages are to be conducted. Then came the Act of 1889, which actually enables the local authority to determine what badges were to be worn, what numbers are to be put on omnibuses, the number of people to be carried, and as to the fitness of the horses and so on, and the carrying and lighting of proper lamps upon the vehicles; and, I suppose, it being thought by some ingenious person that it might be well that tramways should not come by implication into that Act, they are expressly excluded, it being the fact that they were already dealt with for certain purposes with regard to the local authority under section 48 of the Tramways Act, 1870. It has been most ingeniously suggested that it was because there had been special legislation for tramways that they were excluded from the Act of 1889, and that everything else of this character not expressly excluded comes within the definition of "omnibus." What is the right and proper view? Over a long period of years there was legislation with regard to hackney carriages, culminating in the combined section of these two Acts of Parliament of 1847 and 1889. There was in 1870 a subject-matter called into existence, somewhat resembling hackney carriages—namely, tramcars—which at any rate in shape come somewhat near to omnibuses; and it was thought desirable that they should be under the jurisdiction of the local authority for this purpose, and accordingly there is an express enactment with regard to the powers of the local authority. A few years later a number of Acts of Parliament were passed with regard to light railways, all directed, so far as I know, to make the light railways, railways in the sense of being subject to the same provisions as ordinary railways were under the previous statutes, and there was no suggestion that the light railways were to be subject in this respect to the local authority.

In the Light Railways Act, 1896, and the orders thereunder, there is not a trace of any intention of subjecting the light railways or their vehicles to the local authorities in this respect, but on the contrary there are a number of sections indicating that what is going to be constructed under the powers of that Act is to be subject to what I may call railway legislation. Then came the order of the Light Railway Commissioners providing that the Board of Trade shall have jurisdiction with regard to many of the things as to which the local authority have jurisdiction in the matter of hackney carriages, and expressly giving the local authority power to make bye-laws, with reference to the portion of the railway in their district, with regard to the speed, the distances at which carriages shall follow one another, stopping on the route, the traffic on the road, advertisements upon the carriages which would be unsafe or unsightly, overcrowding, and the hours for conducting goods traffic. These are matters which are in pari materia, to a very large extent, with those enumerated in section 6 of the Town Police Clauses Act, 1889. I think it is quite impossible to come to the conclusion that if the Legislature really meant to give the powers which are contained in section 6 of that Act to the local authority, they would have cut down the rights of the local authority in respect to the particular matters enumerated.

Some ingenious person persuaded the majority of magistrates that the circular route by which Mr. Macmorran seeks to make the carriages of the light railway subject to the Act of 1889, was a route that they could safely travel, and thereupon they gave the decision, which is now under consideration by us, that every carriage of a light railway, though it is run under circumstances to a large extent entirely different from those under which it was contemplated when the Tramway Act, 1870, was passed, that tramcars would run, must be licensed; and, I suppose, the driver and conductor licensed. The absurdity would be too great. We have given very full consideration to the matter, and our attention has been been directed to many of the sections, but all pointing in the direction that a light railway carriage is a railway carriage. It is not a hackney carriage, and it is not a tramway car. Therefore the appeal must succeed. I have no doubt whatever about it.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree.

RIDLEY, J.—I agree.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the appellants, Sydney Morse.

Solicitors for the respondent, Sharpe, Parker, & Co., for H. Ellis, Town Clerk, Dewsbury.

Privy Council.

(On appeal from the Supreme Court of Canada.)

Nov. 11.

McARTHUR v. DOMINION CARTRIDGE CO. (a.)

Negligence—Damage by explosion—Absence of exact proof.

Where the precise cause of an accident is not known, there still may be sufficient evidence to render the defendant liable, as when an explosion occurs and the jury acting as reasonable men find under the whole circumstances that there was negligence on the defendants' part, although of the exact cause there is no evidence, or it is unascertainable.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada. The facts are given in their lordships' judgment.

R. C. Smith, K.C., and R. A. Greenshields, K.C., for the appellants.

C. A. Russell, K.C., and A. Falconer, for the respondents.

The judgment of their lordships (Lords MACNAGHTEN, DAVEY, ROBERTSON, LINDLEY, and Sir ARTHUR WILSON) was delivered by Lord MACNAGHTEN.—This is an appeal in formâ pauperis from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, setting aside the verdict of a special jury in favour of the appellant. The verdict was unanimous. And it had been upheld by the unanimous judgment of the Court of Review for the District of Montreal, and also by the unanimous judgment of the Court of King's Bench for the Province of Quebec. In the Supreme Court, Taschereau, J., dissented from his four colleagues.

The facts of the case may be stated very briefly: On the 10th of June, 1898, the appellant, who was in the service of the respondent company and then about 18 years of age, was seriously injured by an explosion at the company's works. There is no direct evidence to show how the explosion occurred. It seems to have originated in an automatic machine used for filling shells or cartridges with powder and shot. The appellant and another boy of about the same age who was his superior, were minding the machine at the time. It was the appellant's duty to keep the shells with which the machine was fed supplied with shot and wads. The explosion was instantaneous. The flash communicated through a supply pipe with a powder box fixed on the outside of the wall of the room in which the machine stood. The box was placed there so that in the event of an accident the explosion might spend itself in the open air. However, for some reason or other, the box had been strengthened externally, and the force of the explosion took effect inwards. The wall was blown in, the machine knocked to pieces, and the room entirely wrecked.

On the 9th of June, 1899, this action was brought in the name and on behalf of the appellant, then a minor, by his tutor. The case on behalf of the plaintiff was that the explosion was owing to the fault of the company. The company, on the other hand, denied responsibility, and alleged that the mishap was caused by the negligence of the plaintiff himself.

The jury found that the explosion occurred through the fault and neglect of the company "by their neglect to supply suitable machinery" and "by their neglect to take proper precautions to prevent an explosion." They also found that the injury of which the plaintiff complained was not "in any way caused by his own fault, neglect, or negligence." And they assessed the damages at 5,000 dollars.

The learned judge who presided at the trial reserved the case, as he was authorized to do by the Civil Procedure Code, for the consideration of the Court of Review. That court dismissed with costs a motion on behalf of the company for judgment or a new trial, and confirmed the verdict in favour of the plaintiff. No complaint was made of the learned judge's summing up or the way in which the questions were left to the jury.

In Quebec when an unsuccessful party after verdict moves for judgment or a new trial, the function of the court under the Civil Procedure Code is the same as the function of a Court of Appeal in this country in similar circumstances. It is not the province of the court to re-try the question. The court is not a court of review for that purpose. The verdict must stand if it is one which the jury as reasonable men having regard to the evidence before them might have found, even though a different result would have been more satisfactory in the opinion of the trial judge and the Court of Appeal.

That there was evidence to justify the verdict in the present case can hardly be disputed. The automatic machine which had been in use for rather over a year was designed in the works of the company. The designer himself, who was the company's superintendent, and apparently a clever and skilled mechanic, and the man who made the machine under his instructions and direction, spoke of it in terms of the highest praise. But no independent expert was called to echo their encomium or confirm their view of its suitability for the purpose in hand. It was not patented, but still it does not seem to have been adopted in any other works of the sort. In the judgment of the majority of the learned judges of the Supreme Court, delivered by Girouard, J., it is stated that it was "proved that the machine was perfect, and worked regularly and properly." But the company's witnesses did not go so far as that. They admitted that there was room for improvement, and that improvements were to be introduced in a machine that was then being constructed to take its place. The principal fault or defect of the machine seems to have been in the mechanism used in the last stage of the process. When cartridges are charged they have to be "crimped," that is, the edges have to be turned down so as to hold the charge firmly in its place. The design was that each cartridge, when and as it was loaded, should be clutched by automatic fingers and carried off to another part of the machine and there presented, sitting upright on the inside edge of a hollowed cup, to receive the blow or punch which would complete the operation. But these automatic fingers, occasionally at any rate, acted in an uncertain, not to say an erratic manner. Up to the time of the explosion, though no doubt less frequently at the last than at first, cartridges were now and then presented in a wrong posture, and the blow or punch fell sometimes on the side of the cartridge and sometimes on the metal end in which the "primer" or percussion cap had been inserted. The evidence was that a considerable number of these failures occurred from time to time, and that the injured cartridges were collected and sent away to be "scrapped," or broken up. It seems to be not an unreasonable inference from the facts proved that in one of these blows that failed a percussion cap was ignited and so caused the explosion. There was no other reasonable explanation of the mishap when once it was established to the satisfaction of the jury that the injury was not owing to any negligence or carelessness on the part of the operator. The wonder really is, not that the explosion happened as and when it did, but that things went on so long without an explosion. Then, too, the jury may have reasonably thought that the explosion would, or might have been comparatively harmless if the powder box on the outside had been properly constructed.

The learned judges in the Supreme Court appear to have been much influenced by some decisions in France which are stated by Girouard, J., to be "unanimous in exacting proof of a fault which certainly caused the injury." The learned judge had previously observed that "as to the cause of this explosion . . . we are left entirely in the dark." As recent French decisions, though entitled to the highest respect, and valuable as illustrations, are not of binding authority in Quebec, the learned counsel at the bar very properly abstained from examining in detail the cases referred to by Girouard, J. It is enough to say that although the proposition for which they were cited may be reasonable in the circumstances of a particular case, it can hardly be applicable when the accident causing the injury is the work of a moment, and the eye is incapable of detecting its origin or following its course. It cannot be of universal application, or utter destruction would carry with it complete immunity—for the employer.

Their lordships will humbly advise his Majesty that the appeal ought to be allowed, the judgment of the Supreme Court reversed with costs, and the judgment of the Court of King's Bench restored. The respondents will pay the costs of the appeal as in pauper appeals.

Solicitors, Blake & Redden; Simpson, Rushworth, & Co.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Feb. 8, 9, 10.

EMBIRICOS v. ANGLO-AUSTRIAN BANK. (a.)

Banker—Cheque—Stolen cheque—Forged indorsement—Foreign law—Conflict of law—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), ss. 24, 72.

Where a foreign bank cashes a cheque, drawn in a foreign country on a bank in England, the indorsement of which cheque is forged, the foreign bank acquires a good title which is passed to an English bank obtaining payment of the cheque from the bank on which it is drawn, if the foreign law identifies, as proprietor of the cheque and entitled to the proceeds thereof, a holder who has bought it bonâ fide and without gross negligence, notwithstanding the cheque has been stolen and its indorsement forged. The general rule of international law which applies to moveables is applicable to negotiable instruments, and any question of title arising out of the transfer of the cheque must be determined by the foreign and not the English law.

Judgment of Walton, J. (ante, p. 92), affirmed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Walton, J., at the trial of the action (reported ante, p. 92).

The plaintiffs were the payees of a cheque drawn in Roumania by a native bank on a London bank. The cheque was indorsed over by the plaintiffs to a London firm, and placed in an envelope addressed to that firm. The plaintiffs' clerk, however, stole the cheque, forged the special indorsement, and the cheque was then cashed by a bank in Vienna, who forwarded it in due course to the defendants in London. It appeared that the Vienna bank had acted bonâ fide and without gross negligence, and were holders for value.

Under the law of Austria, the Vienna bank obtained a good title to the cheque, notwithstanding it was cashed with them by the thief or by one in concert with him, though under English law the defendants had no defence. The action was brought for damages for wrongful conversion of the cheque.

Walton, J., decided that the title acquired in Vienna, good according to Austrian law, was a good title in England, and gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

(a.) Reported by HENRY STEPHEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Cohen, K.C., and Maurice Hill, for the appellants.—The general rule that a transfer of ordinary chattels valid according to foreign law is valid in this country, is not applicable to bills or cheques. When the cheque was stolen the property in it was not divested from the plaintiffs. The general rule of law does not apply further than is expressly mentioned in the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882.

They referred to Kleinwort v. Comptoir National D'Escompte de Paris, [1894] 2 Q. B. 157, and La Cave v. Credit Lyonnais, [1897] 1 Q. B. 148.

Eldon Bankes, K.C., and De Gruyther, for the respondents.—This is a case of a chattel stolen in a market overt; we claim title from a person who had a good title in a foreign country. The foreign law governs the case; there is no distinction between a bill or cheque and another chattel personal.

They referred to Arnold v. Cheque Bank, 1 C. P. D. 578; Cammell v. Sewell, 8 W. R. 639, 29 L. J. Ex. 350; Castrique v. Imrie, 19 W. R. 1; Alcock v. Smith, [1892] 1 Ch. 238, 40 W. R. Dig. 24; Hooper v. Gumm, 15 W. R. 464; Sturtevant v. Ford, 4 M. & G. 101.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This action was brought by Messrs. L. & M. Embiricos against the Anglo-Austrian Bank to recover damages for the wrongful conversion of a cheque. The action was tried before Walton, J., without a jury, and he gave judgment for the defendants. The appeal is against that judgment. On the 6th of March, 1903, a Roumanian bank drew a cheque on a London bank payable to the order of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs at Braila, in Roumania, indorsed the cheque to G. Embiricos & Co., and wrote to them in London enclosing the cheque. The cheque was, however, stolen from the envelope by a clerk of the plaintiffs. On the 9th of March, 1903, the cheque was presented at the bank of Messrs. Schelhammer & Schatterer, in Vienna, by a person who desired that it might be cashed. It then bore the special indorsement G. Embiricos & Co., in addition to the indorsement by the plaintiffs. The indorsements were apparently regular and in order, but the indorsement of G. Embiricos & Co. was in fact a forgery. Messrs. Schelhammer & Schatterer cashed the cheque, and on the same day indorsed it to the defendants, and posted it to them in London, where they cashed it at the bank on which it was drawn. According to an affidavit made as to the Austrian law by a doctor of law of the University of Vienna, "The holder of a cheque which he has bought bonâ fide without gross negligence and for value is identified as the proprietor of the cheque and entitled to the proceeds thereof against all the world, notwithstanding that the cheque has been previously stolen and notwithstanding that the indorsement has been forged." Walton, J., decided the case in favour of the defendants on the ground that by the transfer of the cheque to the Vienna bank a good title to the cheque which the English court was bound to recognize passed to the Vienna bank and that that bank gave an equally good title to the defendants who, when they presented the cheque for payment to the bank on which it was drawn, were dealing with their own property and not with the plaintiffs' property at all. He points out that the only question in this action is between the original payees of the cheque and the subsequent holder of the cheque, who derived his title to the cheque through an indorsement which had been forged; and that, inasmuch as under the English law no title could be made under a forged indorsement, but under the Austrian law the bonâ fide holder of a cheque for which he has given value in ignorance of any flaw in the title of the transferor, is entitled to the cheque, although it has been previously stolen and the indorsements upon it have been forged, it became necessary to decide whether the validity of the transfer of this cheque ought to be governed by Austrian or English law. Walton, J., decided that the question of the validity of the transfer ought to be governed by Austrian law, first, because it has been decided by Romer, J., and on appeal by the Court of Appeal in Alcock v. Smith, [1892] 1 Ch. 238, 40 W. R. Dig. 24, that the ordinary rule as to the transfer of chattels as stated by Mr. Dicey in his Conflict of Laws, at page 140, that "An assignment of a movable which can be touched (goods) giving a good title thereto according to the law of the country where the movable is situate at the time of the assignment (lex situs) is valid," applies to a bill of exchange, and, I suppose, any negotiable instrument. Walton, J., also seemed to be of opinion that his judgment could be justified by the words of section 72 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, which provides that "Where a bill drawn in one country is negotiated, accepted, or payable in another, the rights, duties, and liabilities of the parties thereto are determined as follows: (1) The validity of a bill as regards requisites in form is determined by the law of the place of issue, and the validity as regards requisities in form of the supervening contracts, such as acceptance, or indorsement, or acceptance supra protest, is determined by the law of the place where such contract was made, Provided that (b) where a bill, issued out of the United Kingdom, conforms, as regards requisites in form, to the law of the United Kingdom, it may, for the purpose of enforcing payment thereof, be treated as valid as between all persons who negotiate, hold, or become partners to it in the United Kingdom. (2) Subject to the provisions of this Act, the interpretation of the drawing, indorsement, acceptance, or acceptance supra protest of a bill, is determined by the law of the place where such contract is made. Provided that where an inland bill is indorsed in a foreign country the indorsement shall, as regards the payer, be interpreted according to the law of the United Kingdom." For the learned judge says that if the interpretation of the "indorsement" means the legal effect of the transfer by indorsement it would cover this case. I think that the view taken by Walton, J., of the effect of the decisions in Alcock v. Smith, that the rule that the validity of the transfer of chattels must be governed by the law of the country in which the transfer takes place, applies to a bill or a cheque, and applies to the transfer of bills or cheques in cases where the transfer is by indorsement, is right; although in the case of Alcock v. Smith the transfer was not by indorsement, but by process of law in the shape of a judicial arrestment. This conclusion seems sufficient to negative the cause of action in the present case, which is an action by payee against an indorsee, who claims under a forged indorsement giving the indorsee a good title in the country where the indorsement was made. But it would manifestly be an unsatisfactory state of the law if the legal result is that the indorsement is effective to give the indorsee a good title as against the payee, but not effective according to English law to give such indorsee a good title against the drawer of the cheque or the acceptor. And it would be convenient, as well from a legal as from a commercial point of view, that it should be established that the title by such indorsement is good as against the original parties to a negotiable instrument having regard to the contractual liability incurred by them thereby. I do not think that Alcock v. Smith decides this question; on the contrary, it seems to me that the judgments of Romer, J., and the Court of Appeal both disclaim so doing, and, further, it seems to me that the law as laid down by Pearson, J., in Smallpage and Brandon's case, 30 Ch. D. 598, 34 W. R. Dig. 19, and by Lush, J., in Lebel v. Tucker, L. R. 3 Q. B. 77, 83, is, in effect, authority to the contrary. At all events, it has never been decided that the liability of an acceptor in England of a bill drawn abroad or of the drawer of a cheque payable in England amounts to a contract to pay on a forged indorsement valid by the foreign law, but invalid by the law of England. It may, however, be that the contract of the drawer or acceptor is to pay on any indorsement recognized by the law of England, even though such indorsement be invalid according to what I will call for convenience the local law of England. I am disposed to think that this is the true contract. If the contract of the drawer of a cheque or acceptor of a bill were limited to payment on indorsements valid by the English local law an argument might be raised that, even though the indorsement abroad was valid to legalize the possession by the indorsee claiming under the foreign indorsement, yet he would be guilty of a conversion if he used a negotiable instrument to the possession of which he was entitled, for the purpose of obtaining, and did obtain, payment from an original party to the negotiable instrument from whom he could not have recovered by process of law. User of a chattel by a person entitled to possession in such a manner would perhaps give a right of action for money had and received. I, however, have come to the conclusion that as between the payee and this indorsee there is no cause of action for conversion, and that the judgment of Walton, J., must be affirmed. It is to be observed that our decision in this case does not increase the liability of the bank upon which the cheque was drawn and which paid the cheque. I wish to add that I am not satisfied that, having regard to the terms of sub-section 2 of section 72 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, such section is conclusive of the present case. I wish also to add that I do not think that section 24 governs the case of an indorsement abroad.

ROMER, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion. The only question is one of conversion. Was the property of the plaintiffs converted by the defendants? If the plaintiffs, when they brought the action, had no title to the cheque, the action must fail. If the foreign law applies, the defendants have acquired a good title as against the plaintiffs. Does the foreign law apply? It has been contended that bills of exchange and cheques are wholly outside the general rule of international law which applies to movable chattels. In my opinion that contention is wrong, for the reasons that I gave in Alcock v. Smith. I can see no reason for departing from what I then said. No subsequent case has, in my opinion, thrown any doubt on the correctness of my decision. It may, of course, be that by reason of some special English law the English courts may be unable to recognize that rule of international law in special cases. But I know of no such English enactment. Section 72 of the Bills of Exchange Act certainly has not that effect, and the general principle is recognized in sub-section 2. The proviso to that sub-section does not touch the present case. Section 24 is only a statement of the general English law, which is local for the purposes of the present case, and it has not the effect of controlling the general rule of international law.

STIRLING, L.J.—I concur. I agree with what was said by Walton, J., and by my brothers, but desire to reserve my opinion about section 72, to which I am inclined to attribute more weight than they do. As regards the case of La Cave v. Crédit Lyonnais, [1897] 1 Q. B. 148, 45 W. R. Dig. 8, it does not appear to me to apply to the present case, because the cheque there did not come into the hands of a purchaser for value.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Bircham & Co.

Solicitors for the appellees, Downing, Handcock, Middleton & Lewis.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Jan. 19.

FITCH v. BERMONDSEY GUARDIANS. (a.)

Lunacy—Asylum—Charges for maintenance of pauper lunatics not settled within the county or borough to which the asylum belongs—Limit of such charges—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 5), s. 283, sub-sections 1 and 3.

The weekly charge to be fixed by the visiting committee under section 283 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, for the expenses of maintenance and other expenses of pauper lunatics in an asylum must not exceed 14*s. for each pauper lunatic, even though the pauper lunatic in respect of whom the charge is made is sent from or settled in a parish or place outside the county or borough to which the asylum belongs.*

Decision of the Divisional Court (ante, p. 153) affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy and Phillimore, JJ.) (reported ante, p. 153, [1904] 2 K. B. 709).

The action was brought by the City of London Lunatic Asylum against the Guardians of the Poor of the Parish of Bermondsey to recover from them the sum of £11 15s. in respect of the lodging and maintenance in the asylum from the 30th of December, 1903, to the 30th of March, 1904, of a pauper lunatic whose legal settlement was in the parish of Bermondsey.

The visiting committee of the asylum, acting under the power conferred by section 283, sub-section 1, of the Lunacy Act, 1890, which provides that "every visiting committee shall fix a weekly sum not exceeding fourteen shillings for the expenses of maintenance and other expenses of each pauper lunatic in the asylum . . . and such weekly sum may from time to time be altered," had previously to February, 1904, fixed such weekly sum at 12s. 3d. in respect of pauper lunatics chargeable to the Union of the City of London.

On the 4th of February, 1904, the visiting committee, acting under the power conferred by sub-section 3 of the above section, raised the weekly charge for the maintenance and expenses in the asylum of pauper lunatics chargeable to unions outside the City of London to twenty-one shillings, and they gave the defendants notice of such increase.

Sub-section 3 provides: "A committee may fix a greater weekly sum not exceeding 14s., to be charged in respect of pauper lunatics other than those sent from or settled in a parish or place within the county or borough to which the asylum belongs."

The committee, suing in the name of their clerk, claimed for £11 15s. for lodging and maintenance, such sum being made up as follows: Forty-five days' lodging and maintenance from the 1st of January, 1904, to the 15th of February, at the rate of 14s. per week, and forty-five days' lodging and maintenance, from the 15th of February to the 30th of March, at the rate of 21s. per week.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendants contended that they were only liable at the rate of 14s. for the whole period, and they accordingly paid £9 into court.

The Asylum proceeded with their action for the balance.

The learned county court judge gave judgment for the defendants.

The committee appealed to the Divisional Court, who confirmed the judgment of the county court judge, and the present appeal was from this decision of the Divisional Court.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Neilson, for the appellants.—We submit that on the true construction of section 283 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, the "greater weekly sum not exceeding 14s." referred to in sub-section 3 refers to additional expenses that can be legally incurred over and above the 14s. a week referred to in sub-section 1, so that the justices can make an order up to 28s. a week, if necessary, in the case of out-union patients. The Act of 1890 is a consolidating Act, which was not intended to alter the law. By section 54 of the Lunacy Act, 1853, the weekly sum included the expenses of lodging as well as maintenance. This sum was not in that Act limited to 14s. Then in the case of lunatics from outside the district, the committee were empowered to fix a greater weekly sum, which was not to exceed 14s. a week. It is plain, therefore, that under that Act the committee could first fix a weekly charge for pauper lunatics from within the county or borough, and then fix a greater sum up to 14s. in excess of that charge for the maintenance of lunatics from outside the borough. The practice has invariably been in accordance with this view, and we submit that it was not the intention of the Legislature to effect any alteration by the Act of 1890.

C. A. Russell, K.C., and R. C. Glen, for the respondents, were not called upon to argue.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I quite feel the force of the arguments of counsel for the appellants. It may well be that the difference which has been pointed out between the legislation of 1890 and that of 1853 was accidental and not intended by the draughtsman. But we have to do with the Act of Parliament as it is drawn, and the words are so strong that we cannot adopt the contention of the appellants. In my opinion the decision of the Divisional Court was quite right. I have only to add that when I spoke of an accidental slip by those who had to draft the Act, I did not wish to speak in any way contemptuously. Whenever I have to deal with consolidating legislation I am always struck by the enormous difficulty imposed upon the draughtsman, and I congratulate myself that I am not responsible for the task.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree.

STIRLING, L.J.—I also agree. I have only to add that I am not quite satisfied as to the correctness of the construction of section 54 of the Lunacy Act, 1853, which has been submitted to us by the appellants; but even assuming that in their favour, I agree with the decision of the Divisional Court and of Vaughan Williams, L.J.

Solicitors, City Solicitor; Arkcoll, Cockell, & Chadwick.

Appeal.
(Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Jan. 16.

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY CO. v. DAWSON. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation — "Earnings" — Railway servant's uniform—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), Schedule I. (1) (a) (i).

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, in respect of the death of a railway guard, it appeared that the deceased was provided by the railway company with a uniform, which he was required to wear when on duty, but which remained the property of the company, and which by the rules and regulations of the company he would be bound to deliver up on leaving the service of the company.

Held, that the value to the deceased of the right to wear the uniform ought to be taken into consideration in calculating his earnings during the three years preceding the injury.

Appeal from an award of the judge of the St. Albans County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The request for arbitration was made by the employers, the Great Northern Railway Co. The matter to be determined was the amount of compensation payable by the company to the widow and children of John Henry Dawson, a goods guard in the employment of the company, whose death resulted from accidental injury arising out of and in the course of his employment. The widow and children claimed compensation as dependants of the deceased man, and the company admitted their liability to pay £193 10s. 2d. The defendants considered that the value of a uniform supplied by the railway company to the deceased man for his use during his service should be added to his earnings for the purpose of calculating the amount of compensation payable by the company. The uniform consisted of a complete suit and an extra pair of trousers supplied every year, and a mackintosh and a pair of leggings supplied every third year. The defendants claimed that the sum of £7, the value of the uniform, should be added to the sum of £193 10s. 2d., which was the amount of the deceased man's earnings paid to him in money during the three years preceding the injury.

The rules and regulations of the company contained the following: "(4) Every servant receiving uniform must, when on duty, appear in it clean and neat, with the number and badge perfect; and if any article provided by the company be damaged by improper use it must be made good by the servant using it. No servant is allowed to convert to his own use any article the property of the company. . . . (14) When a person leaves the service he must immediately deliver up his uniform and all other articles belonging to the company. Any money that may be due for wages to any person leaving the service will not be paid until the clothing, book of rules, lamps, flags, tools, detonators, and all other articles the property of the company which may have been supplied to him and of which he cannot give a satisfactory account, shall have been delivered up in accordance with the company's regulations. If not delivered up, or if any articles be missing or be damaged by improper use, the cost of such article or of the repair of such damage shall be a debt from the man to the company, and may be deducted from any pay then due, or, if such pay be found insufficient to meet the claim, will become a debt recoverable at law."

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The county court judge was of opinion that it was clear that the uniform supplied to the guard was not his own property, but that he merely had use of it, just as he had the use of lamps, flags, tools, detonators, &c., for use in his work. On this ground he held that the value of the uniform ought not to be included as part of the earnings of the deceased man, and he made an award for £193 10s. 2d.

The defendants appealed.

S. T. Evans, K.C., and P. T. Blackwell, for the defendants.—The value of the uniform ought to be taken into consideration as part of the deceased man's earnings. The county court judge merely found that the uniform remained the property of the company; he did not find that it was a thing the value of which could not be estimated.

They referred to Noel v. Redruth Foundry Co., 44 W. R. 407, [1896] 1 Q. B. 453; Pomphrey v. The Southwark Press, [1901] 1 Q. B. 86, 49 W. R. Dig. 113; Houghton v. Sutton Heath and Lea Green Collieries Co. (Limited), 49 W. R. 196, [1901] 1 Q. B. 93; Midland Railway Co. v. Sharpe, ante, p. 114, [1904] A. C. 349.

Basil Watson (Montague Lush, K.C., with him), for the employers.—A uniform supplied to a railway servant cannot reasonably be said to be part of his wages. The value of the uniform to him is a thing so vague that it cannot be estimated. Neither is there anything in the Workmen's Compensation Act which makes its necessary to take into consideration the value of the uniform in calculating a railway servant's earnings.

COLLINS, M.R.—The question in this case is as to the amount of compensation to which the dependants of a deceased railway guard are entitled under the Workmen's Compensation Act. It is not disputed that compensation must be paid to the extent of £193 10s. 2d., the aggregate amount of the wages received by the deceased in money during the three years preceding the injury. But it is said on the part of the dependants that the deceased in addition to that received from the railway company during the three years certain articles of clothing of the value of £7. The county court judge has rejected the value of this clothing as a factor in calculating the deceased man's wages, having regard to the rule of the company by which the property in the clothing did not pass to the deceased man. In my opinion that is not an adequate ground for excluding it. If a man receives as part of the emoluments of his service certain articles of clothing, the value of the clothing which he so receives is part of his earnings. The privilege of wearing a uniform might be nothing, because the wearing of it might be so disagreeable that a man would rather be without it. But such a consideration does not enter into the discussion here. We are dealing with a case in which a man did in fact work for his employers for three years or more, and during that time did wear their uniform, and wore it under such circumstances as to show that it was an emolument in addition to the money wages received by him in return for his services. This lets in the principle that it must be treated as part of his wages. It is not necessary in this case to consider the difference between the privilege of wearing the uniform and the property in the uniform itself. Strictly speaking, the measure of the value of the uniform as part of his wages is the value to him of the right to wear it, and not the value of the clothes themselves. But in the present case there is probably no distinction between the two things. The appeal must therefore be allowed, and the dependants must be held to be entitled to the extra £7 which they claim.

MATHEW and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the defendants, Kingsford, Dorman, & Co., for H. B. Hartley, Peterborough.

Solicitor for the employers, R. Hill Dawe.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Jan. 12, 13

FRASER v. FRASER. (a.)

Practice—Appeal—Action referred to master—Right of appeal from master—Ord. 14, r. 7.

Where an order is made under ord. 14, r. 7, referring an action to a master for trial, an appeal lies from his decision to a Divisional Court.

Decision of the Divisional Court (ante, p. 47, [1904] 2 K. B. 245) reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Kennedy, JJ.).

The action, which was brought to recover commission on the sale of shares, was, under ord. 14, r. 7, ordered to be referred to a master for decision, and the master directed judgment to be entered for the plaintiff.

Against this decision the defendant appealed to the Court of Appeal (52 W. R. 147, [1904] 1 K. B. 56), but it was held by Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ., that no appeal lay to that court, the question whether there was a right of appeal to a Divisional Court being left open.

The defendant next appealed to the Divisional Court on the ground that the master's finding was against the weight of evidence, but the court held that no appeal lay from the master's decision. The defendant then brought the present appeal.

Ord. 14, r. 7, is as follows: "Upon the hearing of the application, with the consent of the parties, an order may be made referring the action to a master, or the action may be finally disposed of without appeal in a summary manner."

Hume Williams, K.C., and McCarthy, for the defendant, argued that if the framers of the rules had intended to take away the right of appeal they would have expressly said so. There was nothing to exclude the provisions of the Arbitration Act, 1889. Since that Act the distinction is that if the parties have chosen their arbitrator before coming into court, they have chosen their forum and have no appeal, but when they bring their disputes before the court the second part of the Arbitration Act applies, and it admits of appeal.

They referred to sections 14 and 15 (1) (2) of the Arbitration Act, 1889, and cited Gower v. Tobitt, 39 W. R. 193, and Wynne-Finch v. Chaytor, 52 W. R. 24, [1903] 2 Ch. 475.

Frampton, for the plaintiff.—There is no appeal where the arbitration is by consent. The object of the rule is to give summary judgment and save unnecessary litigation. If there is an appeal from every decision of an officer of the court why should the right be expressly mentioned in some cases—e.g., in ord. 35, r. 9, and ord. 59, r. 3? Section 15 (2) of the Arbitration Act, which makes the report or award equivalent to the verdict of a jury, shows that if there is an appeal it is not to a Divisional Court.

(a.) Reported by R. HILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

He cited Clark v. Sonnenschein, 38 W. R. 717, 25 Q. B. D. 226, and referred to the judgments in the Court of Appeal in Fraser v. Fraser, 52 W. R. 147, [1904] 1 K. B. 56.

Trevor Lloyd, for parties who were garnishees of the judgment, submitted that the whole object of the rule was to avoid a multiplicity of appeals.

McCarthy, in reply, submitted, in answer to the court, that ord. 59, r. 3 was no longer in force. It was a rule made under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, and was only intended to apply to compulsory references under that Act. The rule must have escaped notice when sections 3 to 17 of the Act were repealed by the Arbitration Act.

Cur. adv. vult.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The question for our decision is the one left undecided by the Court of Appeal when this case was before them in 1904—namely, whether there is any appeal against the decision of a master where an order has been made under ord. 14, r. 7 referring an action to him.

On the former occasion referred to there was an attempt to appeal from the master direct to the Court of Appeal, and the court only held that an appeal did not lie to the Court of Appeal, but left open the question whether an appeal would lie to the Divisional Court. An appeal has now been carried to the Divisional Court, and that court has held that where an order is made under the rule named, referring an action to the master, no appeal lies from his decision. We have now to consider whether the Divisional Court is right.

The question depends on the construction of ord. 14, r. 7, and particularly on the words "referring the action to a master." The Divisional Court have held that these words mean "referring the action to a master as arbitrator," and that therefore there is no appeal. I agree that primâ facie the words have that meaning, though it is to be observed that the appeal here is from a judgment, but I am not sure I quite understand the reasoning upon which the conclusion is based that therefore there is no appeal. It seems to me that, having regard to the terms of sections 14 and 15 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, there are some cases of references under an order of court made by consent which fall within the operation of section 15, and in which, according to my view, there is plainly a right of review. I think, therefore, that the judgment of the Divisional Court must mean that the order of reference made under rule 7 of order 14 is an order of reference made by consent by a judge's order in the sense in which such orders were made independently of the Common Law Procedure Acts and the Judicature Act. It is common knowledge that quite independently of any such Act orders of reference by consent were made by order of nisi prius, or by rule of court, or by judge's order, but that such orders could only be made where an action was pending, and could only be made by consent. Such orders were in fact submissions to arbitration embodied by consent in orders of the court. The Divisional Court has, I understand, based their decision upon the ground that, according to the true construction of rule 7 of order 14, the reference to arbitration referred to in that rule is a reference of this character.

I hesitate to come to this conclusion. It is plain that not every reference consequent upon an order made by consent is a reference of this character—is a common law reference by consent by virtue of a submission embodied in an order—for it is plain that clause (a) of section 14 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, covers orders of reference made by consent, and it is also plain from the latter part of that section that it covers orders, by consent, of reference to an official referee or officer of the court, and officer of the court includes, in my opinion, a master of the court. Moreover, the case of Gower v. Tobitt, a decision of the Court of Appeal, shows that the decision of an official referee, and, I think, of a master of the court, on a reference under an order made pursuant to section 14 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, may be reviewed by a motion for a new trial made to a Divisional Court, and in my opinion this decision of the Court of Appeal covers equally the case of a decision under a reference of an action to a master, and the decision in Wynne-Finch v. Chaytor seems to me to involve the same conclusion.

Now, if the view which I have expressed is right, why should the court construe the words of rule 7 of order 14 as if the reference therein referred to was a reference to a common law arbitrator embodied in an order made under the general power of the court embodying a submission to arbitration, rather than construe it as authorizing an order referring the whole cause to be tried by an officer of the court? Why, in other words, should we treat the rule as authorizing an order embodying a submission rather than as an order providing a mode of trial? If we treat rule 7 as authorizing a mode of trial, then it is plain that rules 6 and 6*a* of order 40 apply, and that a motion to set aside the judgment will lie. This is the conclusion at which I have arrived, and with unfeigned deference to the opinions of the judges of the King's Bench Division, I think I ought to give effect to my opinion, and hold that the decision of the Divisional Court was wrong. I may add that I think the omission of the words "without appeal" in the first limb of the rule goes to confirm my view.

ROMER and STIRLING, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Neville, Fisher, & Co.; R. Barnes; Gerald & Arthur Marshall.

Appeal.
(Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Jan. 12.

ELLIS v. JOSEPH ELLIS & CO.
(ROBERTS AND TAYLOR, SURVIVING PARTNERS). (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation — Workman — Partnership — Partner employed as workman—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 1, sub-section 1; s. 7, sub-section 2.

By an arrangement between three persons who had entered into a partnership for the purpose of working a mine, one of them worked in the mine as an ordinary workman and received weekly wages out of the profits of the business, independently of what he received as a partner. On his death, in consequence of an accidental injury sustained by him while working in the mine, his widow claimed compensation from the two surviving partners under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

Held, that the deceased man was not a workman within the Act, as the Act contemplated two opposite parties, an employer and a workman, and did not apply to cases where the same person was both employer and employed.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from an award of the judge of the Flintshire County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant for compensation was the widow and personal representative of Joseph Ellis, whose death had resulted from accidental injury sustained by him while working in a mine.

In 1898 the deceased man obtained a licence to work the mine for the term of twenty-one years, and in July, 1903, he entered into a deed of partnership with two persons, named John Taylor and Thomas Roberts, for the purpose of working the mine, by which it was provided that the profits and losses of the undertaking should be divided between the three partners in equal shares. A short time afterwards they arranged among themselves that if any of the partners should work in the mine he should be paid as an ordinary workman. The deceased man was accustomed to the work of a miner or quarryman, but neither of the other partners had any knowledge of it, Taylor being a potter and Roberts a draper. The deceased man accordingly performed manual labour about the works, sometimes on the surface and sometimes below the surface. Practically he managed the whole business and acted as a working foreman. He gave the other men employed in the pit the immediate orders as to their work, engaging them as a rule and arranging their wages, though it appeared that in some instances the other partners were consulted. He was also constantly employed in doing manual labour himself, for which he drew weekly wages out of the profits of the business independently of anything he might be entitled to as a partner.

On the 14th of October, 1903, he gave notice to his partners that he would give up his employment in a fortnight's time, but this notice was not acted upon, and he continued working in the same manner as before.

On the 15th of November, 1903, he went down the pit to relay metals, and while so engaged he met with the accident which caused his death.

During the period of his employment as a workman he had received weekly wages averaging 33s. per week.

The applicant addressed her claim for compensation to "Joseph Ellis & Co. (John Taylor and Thomas Roberts, surviving partners)."

At the hearing of the arbitration it was contended on the part of Taylor and Roberts that the deceased man was not a "workman" within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act.

The county court judge was of opinion that the deceased was a workman within the Act, and he made an award of compensation in favour of the applicant.

Taylor and Roberts appealed.

Arthur Powell, K.C., and Ellis Griffith, for Taylor and Roberts.—The deceased man was not a workman, and the surviving partners of the firm were not his employers. In order that a case may be brought within the Workmen's Compensation Act the relation of master and servant is necessary; the Act only applies to workmen who are engaged as servants of an employer: McGregor v. Dansken, 1 F. 536; Vamplew v. Parkgate Iron and Steel Co. (Limited), 51 W. R. 691, [1903] 1 K. B. 851.

C. A. Russell, K.C., and H. C. Davenport, for the applicant.—The deceased man was in an employment to which the Act applies, and he received workman's wages, which were something quite independent of the share of the profits to which he was entitled as a partner. There is nothing in the definition of "workman" in the Act to exclude such a case as this. It is possible for a person to occupy a dual position and to be at the same time employer and workman.

COLLINS, M.R.—The question is whether in the circumstances of this case the deceased man was a person in respect of whose death the benefit of the Workmen's Compensation Act can be claimed. He appears to have belonged to what are called the working classes. But finding an opportunity of getting a licence for working a mine for twenty-one years he entered into a partnership with two other persons for the purpose of the undertaking. Being a skilled workman he worked in the mine, by an arrangement with his partners, for a workman's wages, which he received out of the profits of the business. While engaged in such work he met with an accident which resulted in his death, and thereupon his representative made a claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act. The question is whether he can be treated as a workman and the firm as employers within the meaning of the Act. In my opinion the intention of the Act was to exclude cases in which the same person occupied the position of both employer and employed. It seems to contemplate the existence of a relationship between two opposite parties, the one being a workman and the other an employer. When the position of the deceased man in the present case is analyzed, I do not think it shows that any relation of employer and employed had been created. He was himself one of the partners in the firm for which he was working, and he cannot properly be said to have been employed by them. The arrangement under which he worked was a mode of arranging how the partnership assets should be distributed in favour of a partner who worked as a miner. Having regard to section 1, sub-section 1, of the Act, it seems to me that a person in the position of the deceased cannot be held to be a workman within the meaning of the Act. In the circumstances of the case, therefore, I think the learned county court judge arrived at a wrong decision, and the appeal must be allowed.

MATHEW and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the applicant, Royds & Rawstorne, for E. S. Giles, Chester.

Solicitors for Taylor and Roberts, Treadwell & Aylwin, for Keene, Son, & Kelly, Mold.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Joyce, J. } Dec. 14, 15, 16.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. STAFFORDSHIRE COUNTY COUNCIL. (a.)

Local government — Highway — Repairs — Mandatory injunction — Retaining and supporting walls — Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), s. 11.

Where certain walls adjoining a highway, which was vested in a county council as the highway authority for purposes of maintenance and repairs, were allowed to become out of repair,

Held, that the court would not interfere with the discretion of the highway authority by making a declaration that such authority was liable to repair the walls on the ground that their becoming dilapidated might cause an obstruction in the highway.

(a.) Reported by H. WOLCOTT WARNER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Sandgate Urban District Council v. Kent County Council, 79 L. T. 425, 47 W. R. Dig. 106, followed.

Action.

This was an action by the Attorney-General at the relation of the trustees of Lord Macclesfield's settled estates, against the defendant council in respect of the repair and maintenance of a portion of the Leek and Macclesfield highway, situate in the county of Stafford, and running through land forming part of Lord Macclesfield's estate.

The said road was in certain places cut out of a hillside, the adjoining land being on one side of the road higher, and the other side lower, than the level of the road. Where this occurred the land on the high side was kept from falling on the road by a retaining wall, and on the low side the roadway was kept up by a supporting wall.

The plaintiffs alleged that the said walls were out of repair and constituted a nuisance, and asked for (1) a declaration that the defendants were liable to repair and maintain the said walls, and (2) an order that the defendants should forthwith repair such of the walls as were in need of repair.

The defendant council admitted that the said highway was a "main road" within the meaning of the Highway and Locomotives Act, 1878, and that under the Local Government Act, 1888, s. 11, they, the defendant council, were liable to repair and maintain the said road, but they denied any liability as to the repairing and maintaining of the said walls.

It appeared from the evidence that the said road had been a turnpike road up to the passing of the Highway and Locomotives Act, 1878, when it became a "main road" within the meaning of that statute, and that it had always been maintained by the highway authority for the time being until the passing of the Local Government Act, 1888, when by that Act the said road became vested in the defendant council.

Hughes, K.C., and Glen, for the plaintiffs.—The defendant council is liable, under section 11 of the Local Government Act, 1888, to keep the walls in repair, and if they become ruinous or a danger to the users of the highway the council is responsible, and if their obligation to repair is not fulfilled there is a right of action: Baron v. Portslade Urban District Council, 48 W. R. 191, [1900], 2 Q. B. 588.

Attorney-General v. Shrewsbury Bridge Co., 30 W. R. 916, 21 Ch. D. 752; Attorney-General v. Wimbledon House Estate Co. (Limited), 52 W. R. Dig. 174, [1904] 2 Ch. 34; and Regina v. Watson, 2 Raym. 856, were also cited.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Leslie, for the defendants.—This action is misconceived. The only duty of a county council to repair and maintain is under section 11 of the Local Government Act, 1888, and the courts have always held with regard to repairs and maintenance that a certain result must be arrived at, but have never interfered with the discretion of the highway authorities: Sandgate Urban District Council v. Kent County Council, 79 L. T. 425, 47 W. R. Dig. 106; Regina v. The Inhabitants of Claxby, 3 W. R. 451, 24 L. J. Q. B. 223, and Stockport Highway Board v. Grant, 46 L. T. 388, 30 W. R. Dig. 71.

Hughes, K.C., replied.

JOYCE, J., in giving judgment, said: This is ostensibly an action to compel the defendants to perform the statutory duty imposed on them by section 11 of the Local Government Act, 1888, of maintaining and repairing a certain "main road," and it is alleged that they have committed default by failing to keep in repair certain retaining walls. In my opinion the real object of this action is to compel the defendants to keep up the retaining walls on Lord Macclesfield's estate where the level of the adjacent land is higher than that of the road. The plaintiffs seek to attain their object in this way: they say that section 11 of the Act of 1888 imposes on the defendants a statutory liability to maintain and repair the road. They next say the defendants are therefore bound to keep in repair everything necessary for the maintenance of the road, and that these walls are necessary; so that the defendants are bound to maintain and repair these walls and, as I suppose, keep them in perfect condition. It seems to me impossible to impose such a liability on a county council without in effect adding a new clause to the statute.

The plaintiffs claim a declaration that the defendants are liable to maintain and repair the walls, and "that the defendants be ordered forthwith to repair such of the said embankments and walls as are in need of repair." In my opinion no such mandatory order as is asked for could properly be made; it is a necessary requisite of every mandatory injunction that it should be certain and definite in its terms, and it ought to be clear what the person enjoined has got to do. A mandatory order cannot be made to repair; the court will not supervise work. No doubt the realization of this difficulty by the plaintiffs has led them to abandon their claim for such an order.

I am asked, then, to make a declaration that the defendants are liable to repair certain walls, without anything being said as to the height or length to be repaired or the time at which the work is to be completed or anything of that sort. How can I possibly say that these particular walls are necessary for the maintenance and repair of this main road? On the evidence it is impossible to say so. In the case of Sandgate Urban District Council v. Kent County Council, in the House of Lords, all the facts were found, and the question was, In what proportion the cost of the works was to be contributed by the two authorities? But even in that case Lord Davey said: "There is no liability upon the road authorities which could be enforced, either by indictment or otherwise, to do any particular work. Their liability either at common law or by statute is general, to repair and maintain the highway, leaving it to them to find out the best, or at any rate adequate, means of discharging that liability." There has been no case cited in which the court has taken upon itself to say what the local authority has to do. I do not hesitate to say that I am unable to do so, and I decline to prescribe what particular works or repairs are necessary for the maintenance of this road.

It is clear no mandamus would lie against a local authority to do any particular work. If the road were allowed to get out of repair the local authority would be liable to the proper legal proceedings. But here the road is not out of repair, nor was it proved that there was a public nuisance or anything of that sort.

In my opinion this action has been misconceived, and fails on the merits, and must be dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Lawrence, Graham, & Co.

Solicitor for the defendants, Herbert M. Davis.

Chan. Div.
Swinfen Eady, J. } Jan. 11, 12; Feb. 3.

In re DOD'S CHARITY. (a.)

Charity—Petition—Certificate of Charity Commissioners—Charitable Trusts Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 137), s. 62.

By a will lands were given and bequeathed to the six clerks or petty canons in Chester Cathedral. The dean and chapter were not directly interested in the lands settled by the will, but under an Act of Parliament and Order in Council they were required to provide that the stipends of the minor canons should not be less than £150 each.

Held, that such an interest was not sufficient to bring the case within the exception contained in the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, s. 62. The exception of "any cathedral or collegiate church" cannot be interpreted so as to exclude from the operation of the Act every endowment in which any minister or officer of the cathedral is interested. The exception does not extend to an endowment over which the dean and chapter have not any control, and which does not form portion of their capitular estates, and is not held by them upon any trusts.

In re Meyrick's Charity, 3 W. R. 435, considered.

Petition.

This was a petition by the Dean and Chapter of Chester Cathedral, which raised the question whether the petitioners were trustees under the will of Barbara Dod, and asked that in case, on the construction of the will, they were not, that the court should constitute them trustees, and that a scheme should be directed for the administration of the said charity under the will of Barbara Dod.

The testatrix by her will, dated the 2nd of May, 1703, made the following disposition: "I give and bequeath unto Dean Fogg Mr. Wright and Mr. Langford Prebendarys of the Cathedrall Church in Chester all of the County of Chester and their heires or such persons as shall succeed them in that Cathedrall Church as Dean and Prebendarys All my lands in the County of Cheshire except the land here after named devised In trust for the use and benefitt of the several persons I shall nominate (that is to say) I doe for ever give and bequeath All my lands in Boughton and Childer Thornton in the County of Chester to the six Clerks or Petty Cannons or Singing men what other names you distinguish them by that doe officiate in the Cathedrall Church in the City of Chester dureing their natural life and continuing to officiate in that Cathedrall Church and to their successors that are thought fitt persons to officiate in that place that is to say my will and desire is that these six ministers that doe officiate in this place shall have paid them by equall shares and proportions the growing rents and yearly profitt of these my lands lying in Boughton and Childer Thornton aforessid always provided that the persons chose in these severall places be in priests' Orders."

Eve, K.C., and Franey, for the dean and chapter, contended that the gift was in effect a gift for the cathedral, and came within the exception in section 62 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, and that, the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners being excluded, their consent to the presentation of the petition was unnecessary.

Macnaghten, K.C., and MacSwinney, for the minor canons.

R. J. Parker, for the Attorney-General, referred to In re Duncan 15 W. R. 526, L. R. 2 Ch., p. 359.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

SWINFEN EADY, J., in giving judgment, said: The first question arising on this petition is whether, according to the true construction of the will of the testatrix, the Dean and Chapter of Chester Cathedral take any estate or interest in her real estate, which is the subject of this application. In my opinion the dean and chapter are not thereby constituted trustees of the real estate at Boughton and Childer Thornton. Assuming that the language of the will—namely, "I give and bequeath unto Dean Fogg, Mr. Wright, and Mr. Langford, Prebendarys of the Cathedrall Church in Chester, all of the county of Chester, and their heires or such persons as shall succeed them in that Cathedrall Church as Dean and Prebendarys"—is a sufficient description of the dean and chapter, the lands thereafter named (and which are the subject of this petition) are excepted from the devise to the dean and chapter, and are given and bequeathed "to the Six Clerks or Petty Cannons or Singing Men, what other names you distinguish them by, that doe officiate in the Cathedrall Church in the city of Chester, dureing their natural life and continuing to officiate in that Cathedral Church, and to their successors that are thought fitt persons to officiate in that place." These singing men, or minor canons, are not a corporation, and there are no words of limitation in the will, so that they took only an estate for life, and on their death the legal estate was vested in the heir-at-law of the testatrix. The dean and chapter take no estate or interest in it.

The next question raised before me is whether the dean and chapter are entitled to present this petition without first obtaining the certificate of the Charity Commissioners—that is to say, whether the charity constituted by the will of Barbara Dod is exempted from the operation of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, by the provision in section 62 of that Act—namely, "This Act shall not extend to . . . any cathedral or collegiate church." The petition has been served on the four minor canons, and they contend that they are the persons acting in the administration of the charity and the beneficiaries thereof, and that they are entitled to apply to the Charity Commissioners for a scheme, and that the dean and chapter, who are not trustees, and who are not entitled to interfere in the management of the charity, cannot present this petition to the court without the consent of the Charity Commissioners. The Attorney-General, who has been served with the petition, also contended that the certificate of the Charity Commissioners was necessary. Although the dean and chapter are not directly interested in the lands settled by the will of Barbara Dod, they are indirectly interested in the following way. Under and by virtue of the statute 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, and an Order in Council pursuant thereto, dated the 15th of January, 1842, they are required to provide that the stipends of the minor canons shall not be less than £150 each per annum, so that a total annual sum of £600 is required for this purpose. The minor canons have not any source of income other than the said charity, and any deficiency is made good out of the capitular revenues. If the income from the land in question can by judicious management and by granting building leases be raised to £600 a year or upwards (and the petitioners allege that a larger income than £600 can eventually be obtained), the result may be to relieve the dean and chapter altogether from any financial burden with regard to the stipends of the minor canons. In this manner and to this extent the dean and chapter are interested, but is an interest of this kind sufficient to bring the case within the exception contained in section 62? In my opinion it is not. It was contended on behalf of the petitioners that, wherever a charity exists for the benefit of any class of ministers or officers within a cathedral church, such a charity is within the exception; and for this proposition reliance was placed on a passage in Kindersley, V.C.'s. judgment in the report of Re Meyrick's Charity, in 25 L. T. O. S. 92. In that case the objection taken was that, as the funds which were the subject of the petition did not wholly belong to Jesus College, but another charity was or might be interested therein, the case was not within the exception. The Vice-Chancellor is reported to have said: "The purpose of that exemption (in section 62) is that, so far as relates to an application to the court in respect of any charity in which the universities or colleges are interested, it shall be unnecessary, so far as regards such universities or colleges, to go before the commissioners. The object of the present petition, though it may affect funds in which another charity is interested, is in effect one in which Jesus College is alone concerned." This report differs from the report of the same case in 1 Jurist N. S., 438, which is as follows: "The purpose (of the exemption) was that, so far as related to the application to the court with respect to any charitable purpose of which the colleges or universities were the object, it should not be necessary to go before the commissioners. Now, here the object of the petition, though it may affect another charity, is in effect an end of which the college alone is the object. . . . If it is to affect matters of which the college is the object, then you need not go before the commissioners; but if it is to affect an end of which another charity is the object, then it would be necessary to go before the commissioners." It is this latter report which was cited with approval by Hall, V.C. in Attorney-General v. Dean and Canons of Manchester, 18 Ch. D. 596, 611, 29 W. R. Dig. 36, and, if any cathedral or collegiate church is the object of a charity, an application to the court may be made with reference thereto, without any application to the Charity Commissioners.

The petitioners, however, are in effect seeking to extend this rule to all cases in which a minister or officer of a cathedral or collegiate church is interested in a charitable endowment. As was said by Lord Lindley in In re Stockport Ragged, &c., Schools, 47 W. R. 166, [1898] 2 Ch., at p. 695, section 62 is a very obscure section; and, as Lord Davey pointed out in In re Clergy Orphan Corporation, 43 W. R. 150, [1894] 3 Ch., at p. 154, it is for those claiming that they are exempt from its provisions to make out the exemption. In my judgment the petitioners have failed to do so. The exception of "any cathedral or collegiate church" cannot be interpreted so as to exclude from the operation of the Act every endowment in which any minister or officer of the cathedral is interested, nor so as to exclude from the operation of the Act this particular endowment of the minor canons. By 29 & 30 Vict. c. 111, s. 18, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners are empowered under certain circumstances to make provision out of certain income "for securing adequate stipends and allowances to the minor canons, schoolmasters, organists, vicars choral, lay clerks, officers, choristers, bedesmen, servants, and other members of the cathedral or collegiate church." A large class of persons is here designated, and the argument of the petitioners is that, if a charity be established for any of these persons, such charity is outside the Charitable Trusts Act, although not within the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, unless the persons entitled constitute a corporation, when statutory powers are given of transferring the property to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners on terms. I cannot construe the exception of "any cathedral or collegiate church" as extending to an endowment over which the dean and chapter have not any control, and which does not form a portion of their capitular estates and is not held by them upon any trusts. I therefore direct the petition to stand over until further order, giving leave to the respondents to apply, in the event of the certificate of the Charity Commissioners not being obtained within a reasonable time.

Solicitors, Tatham & Proctor, for Barker & Rogerson, Chester; Woosam & Smith, for Boydell & Taylor, Chester; Treasury Solicitor.

Chan. Div.
Swinfen Eady, J. } Dec. 13, 14.

In re COHEN & COHEN. (a.)

Solicitor — Costs — Taxation — Third party — Master's certificate — Objections — Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 38.

Under section 38 of the Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 23), where a third party obtains an order to tax a bill, this taxation is one as between solicitor and client, and not between the solicitor and the third party. Any items unnecessarily incurred cannot be imposed on a third party.

In re Brown, 15 W. R. 1030, L. R. 4 Eq. 464; In re Negus, 43 W. R. 68, [1895] 1 Ch. 73; In re Gray, 49 W. R. 298, [1901] 1 Ch. 239; and In re Longbotham, 52 W. R. 660, [1904] 2 Ch. 152, followed.

Adjourned summons to review taxation.

This was a summons taken out by a third party to discharge or vary a certificate of taxation of the master, filed the 13th of July, 1904, on the ground that the taxation had proceeded on a wrong principle, and that the taxation might be reviewed in respect of the items mentioned in the objections.

Certain litigation had been pending between a lady and a theatrical manager, the third party, which ultimately culminated in an agreement dated the 12th of January, 1904, whereby two actions, one a common law action and the other in the Chancery Division, were stayed, the third party agreeing to pay the lady's costs as between solicitor and client relating to the matters in dispute in the two actions, such costs to be agreed or taxed. The solicitors duly delivered their bill of costs, which came to £486. In it were numerous items which the master subsequently disallowed, such as the employment of an eminent King's counsel and well-known junior to settle the statement of claim, a special copy of the pleadings, &c., and which had been incurred on the lady's express instructions. A petition was later presented on the usual third party order for the taxation of the bill of costs of the above-named solicitors who had acted for the lady, when the master, on the 2nd of March, 1904, taxed the bill as between solicitor and client in the presence of the opposing solicitors. Upon objections being carried in the master suggested that they should apply for an order to tax under section 38 of the Solicitors Act, 1843. This they accordingly did, when the master by an order dated the 2nd of May, 1904, disallowed many items which he had previously allowed. By this order he disallowed various items to the amount of £111 as being too unreasonable, and allowed £375. The solicitors then carried in objections, saying that the agreement was for an indemnity. The master on the 6th of July, 1904, made the note, referred to in the judgment, replying to the objections; and on the 13th of July replied formally, dealing very fully with the various objections. After stating that he had followed the principle in In re Gray, 49 W. R. 298, [1901] 1 Ch. 239, and referring to In re Negus, 43 W. R. 68, [1895] 1 Ch. 73; In re Abbott, 4 L. T. N. S. 576, 9 W. R. Dig. 85; In re Morecroft, 29 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 471; In re Holliday and Godlee, 58 L. T. N. S. 301, 36 W. R. Dig. 56; and In re Longbotham, 52 W. R. 660, [1904] 2 Ch. 152, he continued: "I have followed the practice in the taxing office on taxations under this section, and I have taxed apart from the order as between the solicitor and the party liable to pay, and I have disallowed several items which did not come, in my opinion, within the scope of the said agreement, and the third party did not contract to pay all these costs, only specified charges which I have carefully allowed item by item." The solicitors at once took out this summons to vary and discharge, and for review of taxation.

(a.) Reported by A. R. TAYLOUR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Hon. E. C. Macnaghten, K.C., and H. Greenwood, for the solicitors.—The agreement must be construed as it stands. If the decision in In re Holliday and Godley is correct, it covers my case. [SWINFEN EADY, J.—Is not the correct view this, that where a third party applies for an order he does not render himself liable to pay any other item but as between solicitor and client?] Yes, partly. No objection can be taken here under section 38 for the settling of the statement of claim, if it was an item properly charged for, though undoubtedly her employing two counsel was expensive.

They cited In re Holliday and Godlee, In re Gray, In re H. L. Longbotham, In re Abbott, In re Brown, In re Morecroft, and In re Negus.

Peterson, for the third party.—The taxing-master is right, and it is in accordance with the practice in In re Longbotham. Ord. 65, r. 27, sub-rule 29, regulates the master's duty.

He referred to In re Ermen, 51 W. R. 475, [1903] 2 Ch. 156.

Hon. E. C. Macnaghten, K.C., replied.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—In this case I have communicated with the taxing-master, and I am not satisfied that he has proceeded upon a wrong principle, but his certificate is, I think, open to the criticism that has been addressed to it. There is no difficulty in regard to the practice in ascertaining exactly what should have been done. The difficulty I had was in appreciating exactly what had been done, having regard to the language of the certificate and to the note to the objections and the answers carried in. In the answer to the first objection there is a note of the master, dated the 6th day of July: "By consent these objections are disallowed en bloc, and need not be answered by me in detail, the question for the court being on what principle these costs are to be taxed on an indemnity as between the solicitor and his own client, or what is fair and proper for a third party to pay." That note was dated the 6th of July, and I think that is in effect superseded by the answers which were ultimately signed on the 13th of July. The note was made while the matter was still before the master. Now, in the master's answers to objections, he says: "I have followed the practice in the taxing office in taxation under this section, and I have taxed apart from the order as between the solicitor and the party liable to pay"; and it is upon the language of this part of the certificate that the difficulty has arisen. It is quite clear from the decision in In re Gray, the principle of which was affirmed by the Court of Appeal in In re Longbotham, that where a third party obtains an order to tax that does not alter the nature or enlarge the scope of his liability. Cozens-Hardy, L.J. (then Cozens-Hardy, J.), stated that in terms, and all the Lords Justices in In re Longbotham affirmed that decision, and Vaughan Williams, L.J., says: "I think all that it is necessary for the court to do in its present judgment is to affirm the principle of those two decisions"—that is, In re Negus, before Chitty, L.J., and In re Gray. At the same time it is equally clear from In re Gray that a taxation on the application of a third party is a taxation that must proceed on the condition of the third party paying what is due to the solicitor from his own client, which may be more than the client, if he had paid it, could have recovered over from the third party. Romer, L.J., in In re Longbotham (at p. 156) says the same: "It is clear, both from the wording of the section itself and the authorities, that the taxation must be on the footing of a taxation between the solicitor and the client"; that is to say, that the bill must be taxed between the solicitor and the client, and not as between the solicitor and the third party. Now, I think it is quite clear that this is not an indemnity taxation. The cases of In re Gray and In re Longbotham followed older authorities, as was pointed out both by Romer and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ., in the Court of Appeal. In the case of In re Brown Lord Romilly was dealing with a taxation on the application of a third party, a cestui que trust, taxing a solicitor's bill which had been paid. The solicitor had charged and the trustee had paid the bill, but on the application of the cestui que trust to tax, the taxing-master disallowed a considerable number of items, "in particular charges for certain attendances upon the trustee and for letters written to him or to third parties by his direction." That affords a very good illustration of the rule that there may be a considerable number of items for which the client may be liable to the solicitor as having been items incurred on express instructions of the client for instance, but yet that the third party may not be liable to pay. That is quite consistent with the rule that when once the items, for which the third party is liable, are ascertained the taxation of those items for which he is liable must proceed upon the footing of a taxation as between the solicitor and the party chargeable, and not as between the solicitor and the third party. The case of In re Negus before Chitty, L.J., is another illustration of the same thing. There it was held that the lessee was not liable to pay for the costs of the counterpart lease; but it did not at all follow that the solicitor was not entitled to recover them from his client, the lessor, for whom he had acted. It was an item for which the third party, the lessee, was not liable to pay, but which, nevertheless, the party chargeable was liable to pay to his solicitor; and Chitty, L.J., dealing with the point, says: "This is a third party taxation, and the general rule is that a third party stands, as between himself and the solicitor whose bill he is taxing, in the position of the party chargeable," that is to say, as regards the taxation. Then he goes on: "But that rule does not prevent the taxing-master from considering the question of the liability of the third party," that is to say, from considering for what items the third party is properly liable.

Under these circumstances I am of opinion that the practice as laid down by all the four cases to which I have referred is clear, but I am not satisfied with the language of the master's certificate, and if he has followed that practice, in my opinion he has not stated that he did so, and his certificate is open, certainly as a matter of language, to the criticism which counsel for the applicants addressed to it. He does not say that he has taxed as between the solicitor and the party chargeable, but as between the solicitor and the party liable.

Under these circumstances I do not think it would be satisfactory to allow the matter to stand in its present position, and the matter should be sent back to the master. It will be for the master to consider whether the slip made has been in the language of his certificate, or in the principle upon which he has in fact taxed the bill. Under the agreement, the third party is liable to pay the costs of the lady as between solicitor and client "with relation to the matter in dispute in the said two actions," and it is those costs that have to be taxed; but in my opinion this is not an indemnity taxation, and it does not follow that because on this taxation there are disallowed items for which the third party is not liable, those items have not been authorized by the client. It may well be that the solicitor will be entitled to recover them over against his client, but the liability of the third party is not enlarged or increased by reason of his having obtained the third party order. Under these circumstances I think the proper order will be to send the matter back to the master to review, and he will amend the certificate. Whether the ultimate result of the taxation will be altered will depend upon whether he has in fact proceeded upon the principles I have indicated. If he has, it may be that the result will be the same, but the language of the certificate must be altered.

In conclusion I think I should say that the master appears to have followed the language of the certificate given by the taxing-masters to Kekewich, J., as set out in the report in In re Longbotham. The taxing-masters appear to have been of opinion that In re Gray had altered the practice, and they stated that "since that case the practice in the taxing office in taxations under this section has been to tax apart from the order as between the solicitor and the party or estate liable to pay." The matter was put as clearly as possible by Romer, L.J., when he said that the taxation must be on the footing of a taxation between the solicitor and the client.

Solicitors, Cohen & Cohen; Slark, Edwards, & Co.

Chan. Div. Warrington, J. } Nov. 3.

In re HORNE.

WILSON v. COX-SINCLAIR. (a.)

Trustee and cestui que trust—Administration—Tenants for life—Overpayments—Adjustment—Trustee also a beneficiary—Right to impound.

Where a trustee, who was himself one of the beneficiaries, had inadvertently overpaid the other beneficiaries their shares of income, and died before any adjustment had been made.

Held, that the executors of the deceased trustee were not entitled to recover from the other beneficiaries the amounts so overpaid, or to have accrued or future income impounded till the shares were equalized, by reason of the fact that their testator was, as trustee, himself the person responsible for the mistake that had been made.

Adjourned summons.

The question raised by this application was whether the executors of a beneficiary, who had been underpaid his share of the income of a trust fund, were prevented from recovering the amount from the other beneficiaries by the fact that their testator was also the trustee who had made the overpayments.

Swithin Horne, by his will, gave and bequeathed a number of leasehold messuages to his trustees upon trust to pay the residue, after certain other payments, of the net rents and profits unto and amongst his three sons, Richard, William, and Edwin, as tenants in common. The testator, who died in August, 1886, appointed his son Richard one of the executors and trustees of his will.

Richard Horne was the acting trustee of the will; he personally managed the estate, receiving the rents and keeping an account of the trusts down to the time of his death in August, 1903, making payments out of the net income to his brothers every year for or on account of their respective shares, retaining a portion for himself.

After Richard Horne's death it was discovered that he had been in the habit of making payments to his brothers in round sums which were not exact thirds of the income received. One brother appeared to have received a small payment monthly, and the other a larger sum, approximately corresponding in total amount, once or twice a year, while Richard Horne had only appropriated for himself various sums at irregular intervals, with the result that during the seventeen years since the testator's death William Horne and Edwin Horne had been overpaid to the extent of £99 3s. 4d. and £83 3s. 4d. respectively, so that Richard Horne had altogether underpaid himself to the extent of £182 6s. 8d. It was admitted that Richard Horne as trustee had made no mistake of fact with regard to these payments.

The executors of Richard Horne claimed this sum of £182 6s. 8d. as part of the estate of their testator, and asked for an adjustment.

The plaintiff, as the surviving trustee of the will of Swithin Horne, still held leasehold messuages and a sum representing net rents, part of which had accrued prior to the death of Richard Horne.

The plaintiff accordingly took out an originating summons against the executors of Richard Horne and against Edwin Horne for the determination of the question whether he ought to pay or allow to the executors of Richard Horne the sum of £182 6s. 8d., and, if so, whether out of capital or income.

H. C. Bickmore, for the surviving trustee of the will.

E. S. Cox-Sinclair, for the executors of Richard Horne.—Any member of a family who has obtained possession of any portion of a trust fund to which he is not entitled can be compelled to repay it at the suit of another cestui que trust: Harris v. Harris, 9 W. R. 444, (1861) 29 Beav. 110.

Forder Lampard, for Edwin Horne.—There was no mistake of fact with regard to the payments; the trustee appears to have been careless and inaccurate only. It is clear, therefore, that Richard Horne could not have recovered these overpayments from his brothers during his lifetime, and his representatives cannot be in any better position than their testator. [WARRINGTON, J.—You must admit that if Richard had not been a trustee, but merely one of the beneficiaries, these overpayments would have to be adjusted.] Certainly, but the fact that Richard was the trustee who made the overpayments differentiates this case from the authorities cited.

Cox-Sinclair, in reply.—The fact that Richard was a trustee as well as a beneficiary ought not to be allowed to deprive him of his right in his capacity of beneficiary to recover these overpayments. Mere laches as trustee ought not to deprive Richard as one of the beneficiaries of his right to an adjustment. The inconvenience to beneficiaries who have been overpaid is just the same whether their income is stopped at the suit of a beneficiary or at the instance of a trustee. Inconvenience, therefore, is no ground for refusing relief.

(a.) Reported by PERCY H. WINFIELD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

WARRINGTON, J.—The exact point I have to decide does not seem to be covered by any of the authorities cited. If Richard Horne had not himself been a trustee, but only one of the beneficiaries, the case would be plainly covered by authority, and it would now have been the duty of the plaintiff, as the surviving trustee of this will, in administering the trusts of it for the future, to equalize the payments which have been made out of income. That proposition is established by the three cases of Harris v. Harris; Dibbs v. Goren, 11 Beav. 483; and Livesey v. Livesey, 3 Russ. 287—perhaps the point is most clearly put in Dibbs v. Goren; but in the present case we have the fact that the person claiming a readjustment is the trustee himself. This fact introduces into the case an element of an essential character which was absent in the authorities referred to. When a trustee comes to the court to have an account adjusted upon the ground that he, being also one of the beneficiaries, has paid himself too little, one must consider what will be the effect of the proposed adjustment upon the other beneficiaries, and particularly with reference to the great inconvenience that may be caused to them if the claim is allowed and their income has to be impounded to make good the deficiency to the trustee beneficiary. Here are the three beneficiaries, Richard, William, and Edwin; let me assume that Richard Horne, the trustee, is the first to die; Richard's executors after his death come and say to William and Edwin, "You have been receiving a great deal more income than you were entitled to; we, the representatives of Richard, who has paid you too much, must have your future income stopped until Richard's estate has been repaid what he has overpaid you." This would be very inconvenient, and a great hardship on the other legatees. The same inconvenience and hardship arises where an adjustment is thus made at the suit of a beneficiary, but in that case the beneficiary is not the person responsible for the mistake which causes the inconvenience. In the present case it is the trustee who claims an adjustment, and he is the person responsible for the mistake that has been made. Upon what principle is the trustee entitled to recover? I see none at all. Having regard to the circumstances and the mode of payment, it is clear that Richard Horne made no mistake. He seems to have made these payments without any exact reference to the actual amount of the income of these leaseholds, but there was no mistake of fact, and therefore he cannot recover them at law. Can he recover in equity? I am of opinion he has no such right. Any equity that he might have had in his character of beneficiary is displaced by the fact that he is himself responsible for the mistake which has been made.

As was said in Ridgway v. Newstead, 9 W. R. 31, (1861) 30 L. J. Ch. 889, the right of a creditor to make legatees refund may be affected by the course of conduct of that creditor, and in the present case I think that, not only has the trustee no equity to entitle him to the interference of the court, but that the course he has adopted makes it highly inequitable for the court to allow him to assert any right against these beneficiaries, who were themselves perfectly innocent, and were only receiving what was paid to them in good faith and under the belief that it was the amount to which they were entitled.

I must therefore make a declaration that the surviving trustee of the will of Swithin Horne ought not to repay or allow to the executors of Richard Horne the sum of £182 6s. 8d., being the amount appearing on the accounts to have been overpaid. This was quite a proper case for the opinion of the court; the plaintiff as trustee was bound to come and have this question decided; and therefore I shall direct that the costs of all parties as between solicitor and client may be paid out of the estate.

Solicitors, Walter A. Jennings; J. Arscott Bartrum.

K. B. Div. (Kennedy, J.) — Dec. 7.

POLENGHI BROTHERS v. DRIED MILK CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Sale of goods—Contract—Construction—Right to inspect bulk before or after payment—"Payment on arrival against shipping documents"—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 71), ss. 15 (2) (b), 27, 34 (1), 55.

Where a contract for the sale of goods provides that payment is to be made . . . on the arrival of the goods against shipping or railway documents, the purchaser on the arrival of the goods and on the production of the shipping or railway documents cannot inspect the bulk with the sample before payment.

The right to subsequently reject if the goods are not in accordance with the sample is not impaired by the payment.

Action tried in the Commercial Court.

A contract for the sale of certain shipments of dried milk powders contained the following clause: (9) "Prices . . . 6d. per lb. c.i.f. London. . . . Payment to be made in cash in London on the arrival of the powders against shipping or railway documents."

Subsequently the defendants refused to pay for any deliveries on the production of the shipping documents, demanding an opportunity of first inspecting the bulk to see whether it corresponded with the sample.

Chaytor, for the plaintiffs.—The defendants could not refuse to make the payment on production of the shipping documents on arrival of the goods. After payment, and when received by the defendants, the bulk could be compared with the sample, and the right to reject might then arise. The buyer had agreed to pay in advance. The arrival must be before delivery. The buyer is not excluded by payment from the right to inspect the goods. By the Sale of Goods Act implied terms are subjected to express terms made by the parties: Sanders v. Maclean, 31 W. R. 698, 11 Q. B. D. 327; Causton v. Chapman, L. R. 2 H. L. Sc. 250; Pettit v. Mitchell, 4 M. & G. 819; Tregelles v. Sewell, 7 H. & N. 574; Castle v. Playford, 20 W. R. 440, L. R. 7 Ex. 98; Sale of Goods Act, 1893, ss. 15 (2), 27, 34 (1), and 55.

Leck, for the defendants.—The contract was to sell and deliver, and not a c.i.f. contract, although the price was fixed on a c.i.f. basis. If the contract was regarded as one where the seller had to deliver to the buyer, the defendant had the right to inspect. Unless the clause excluded the right to inspect before payment the defendants were entitled to inspect before payment. The clause in effect meant the arrival and tender of delivery, and the opportunity of inspecting must then be given: Lorimer v. Smith, 1 B. & C. 1; Isherwood v. Whitmore, 11 M. & W. 347; Toulmin v. Hedley, 2 Car. & K. 157; Mody v. Gregson, 17 W. R. 176, L. R. 4 Ex. 49; Drummond v. Van Ingen, 36 W. R. 20, 12 App. Cas. 284; Chalmers' Sale of Goods Act, p. 111 (note); Benjamin on Sales (4th ed.), pp. 592, 709.

Ryan v. Ridley, 8 Com. Cas. 105, was also referred to.

(a.) Reported by W. T. TURTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

KENNEDY, J.—This case raises an interesting point of law. The point is a narrow one—whether on the construction of the contract the buyer is entitled, in respect of the goods contracted for, to insist on the provisions of section 15, sub-section 2 (b), of the Sale of Goods Act, and to have an opportunity of comparing the bulk with the sample before paying the price. The goods in question were manufactured abroad, and were sent, partly by sea and partly by rail, to London. The goods having arrived, the difficulty arises between the parties by the refusal of the buyer to pay the price until he has found out whether the goods correspond with the sample. The goods were arrived goods at the railway company's warehouse. They were goods in respect of which the sellers were in a position to tender to the buyer the shipping documents. The buyer refused payment until he had had an opportunity of satisfying himself that the goods were equal to sample. What is the reasonable meaning of clause 9 of the contract? Generally section 15 of the Sale of Goods Act applies, and gives the buyer a reasonable opportunity of inspecting the goods before payment. The contract contains these words: "Payment is to be made . . . in London on the arrival of the powders against shipping or railway documents." That is an express provision. With regard to payment there are two stipulations, and two only. The seller must (1) show that the goods are arrived goods; and (2) produce the shipping documents. Payment on delivery is excluded by express stipulation which provides for payment on arrival. The plain meaning of the contract is that on those two conditions being fulfilled payment is to be made. If the goods do not answer the description the buyer has a right to reject, which right is not impaired by the express condition in the contract that "payment is to be made . . . in London on arrival of the powders against shipping or railway documents."

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Solicitors for plaintiffs, M. Attenborough.

Solicitors for defendants, A. P. Stokes.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy and Ridley, JJ.) Dec. 20.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL v. PAYNE & CO. (a.)

Weights and measures—"False and unjust" scales—Paper bag placed under scale—Scales used in a particular way at request of customer—Absence of fraudulent intention—Weights and Measures Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 49), s. 25.

The respondents, who were wholesale tea merchants, with a view to expedite the weighing out of tea to certain of their customers—retail dealers who requested to be supplied with parcels of tea of such weight that each with its wrapper would be of some given weight, for instance, ¼lb.—made it their practice to temporarily adjust the scales while weighing a series of parcels for such a customer by placing a paper bag supplied by such customer under the goods scoop; special pains were taken to prevent the scales in that condition from being used for any other customer.

Held, that the scales were rendered "false or unjust" within the meaning of section 25 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, and that the respondents were liable to a penalty accordingly.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

London County Council v. Payne & Co., 52 W. R. 299, [1904] 1 K. B. 194, explained and followed.

Case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate, who had dismissed an information preferred on behalf of the appellants by an inspector of weights and measures against the respondents, wholesale tea dealers, carrying on business in Bermondsey, charging them with having used for trade purposes a beam scale which was "false or unjust" within the meaning of section 25 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878.

The case stated was as follows:

1. On the 17th of May, 1904, the respondents appeared before me at the Southwark police-court, to answer an information laid by John Abberly Hutchins on behalf of the appellants, which charged that the respondents on the 21st of March, 1904, at Boss-street, Tooley-street, in the metropolitan borough of Bermondsey, in the county of London, and within the metropolitan police district, did use for trade a weighing instrument, to wit, a beam scale, which was false or unjust (that is to say, underneath the goods scoop of the said beam scale was placed a paper bag) contrary to section 25 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878.

2. By section 25 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 49), it is provided as follows: "Every person who uses or has in his possession for use for trade any weight, measure, scale, balance, steelyard, or weighing machine which is false or unjust, shall be liable to a fine not exceeding five pounds, or in the case of a second offence ten pounds, and any contract, bargain, sale, or dealing made by the same shall be void and the weight, measure, scale, balance, or steelyard shall be liable to be forfeited."

3. Upon the hearing of the said information the following facts were either proved before me or admitted by both parties:

(a) The respondents were solely wholesale tea merchants, and occupied for the purposes of their business a warehouse in Boss-street, Tooley-street. Two adjoining rooms in this warehouse were used by the respondents for weighing out tea, and about eighty girls were employed in these two rooms under the superintendence of a forewoman and under the general supervision of the respondent's manager. The forewoman had an assistant, and such rooms had an opening between them.

(b) On the 21st of March, 1904, about 10.30 a.m., an inspector of weights and measures visited the above premises, and was taken round the said two rooms by the manager and inspected the weights and scales there. In the course of this inspection, one of the girls handed down to the inspector, from a shelf above her, a beam scale which had a folded paper bag under the scoop in which the tea to be weighed is placed. In that condition the scale would turn with 2½ drachms of tea less than the weight on the other side of the scale. The scale without the piece of paper was correct. The scale had been used that morning by the said girl to weigh out for a customer 50lbs. of tea into ¼lb. packets, that is to say, rather over 200 parcels of tea had been weighed out with it. When the inspector came up the girl had recently finished weighing out the 50lbs., and was sweeping her counter so as to be ready for another order.

(c) Tea was weighed out by the respondents in the manner and by the means above described for three or four of their customers, of whom one, being the customer above referred to, was a customer for considerable quantities of tea, and the others for comparatively small quantities. Tea was never so weighed out by the respondents, unless at the request of the customer for whom it was intended, and only in bags supplied by the customer, and of the kind exhibited. On some days of the week no such weighing out took place, but on other days several chests or bags were so weighed out.

(d) The girl who handed the scale down to the inspector was not called, but the respondent's manager and forewoman were both called, and they described the practice followed at the respondents' warehouse. From their description it appeared that a chest or bag containing, say, 50lbs. of tea would be put down by the girl's counter, and she would be given an order and directed by the forewoman to weigh out into packets of some given denomination, say ¼lbs., and one of the above-mentioned bags, which were supplied by the customer, would be given to the girl to fold up and place under the scoop of the scales. Having placed this bag under the scoop she would proceed to weigh out the tea, and when she had finished this she would place the scales on the shelf above her without removing the bag from under the scoop, and report to the forewoman that the weighing-out was finished. Shortly afterwards, that is to say, usually within three or four minutes, and always within ten or fifteen minutes, the forewoman would come round; the girl would then hand down the scales, and the forewoman would remove the bag and annex to it a paper tag having certain memoranda written upon it. No one would be allowed to, nor was it suggested that they did in fact, make use of the scale between the time of its being put up on the shelf and the time of its being handed down to the forewoman. The forewoman would afterwards place the bag and tag upon her desk, where it would probably remain three or four days and then be thrown away. One of these tags was produced before me, and I have initialled it for the purpose of identification. No two weighings-out with a bag were allowed to be consecutive, a full weight order being always interposed.

(e) The practice above described was followed in this and all cases. The substantial difference between this practice and the practice obtaining in the respondents' warehouse in November, 1902, as described in the special case of London County Council v. Payne & Co., 52 W. R. 299, [1904] 1 K. B. 194, was that under the present practice the paper bag was given for each operation by the forewoman, before it (the weighing) commenced, and was always removed by the forewoman when it was finished, whereas formerly it was left to the girl to remove it. The change was not made for commercial reasons, but with the object of complying with the Weights and Measures Acts.

(f) The respondents used the said beam scale with the bag under the scoop for trade, as and to the extent above described.

4. The appellants contended that the beam scale was false or unjust within the meaning of section 25 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, and they relied upon the case of Lane v. Rendell, 48 W. R. 153, [1899] 2 Q. B. 673, 69 L. J. Q. B. 8, and the respective judgments of Lawrance and Kennedy, JJ., in the said case of London County Council v. Payne & Co.

5. The respondents contended that the weighing-out of the chest or sack of tea in the manner and by the means above described was "a particular weighing operation" within the meaning of the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice in the case above referred to, and that the beam scale was therefore not false or unjust.

6. Inasmuch as the bag was temporarily placed under the scoop for a particular customer, and the condition of the scale was temporary and not permanent, and special pains were taken to prevent the scale in that condition from being used for any other customer, I was of opinion that the respondents had kept within the law as laid down by the Lord Chief Justice in the case of the London County Council v. Payne, and that the beam scale was therefore not false or unjust within the meaning of section 25 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878. I accordingly dismissed the information, subject to this case.

7. The question of law for the opinion of the court is whether upon the facts above stated the beam scale was false or unjust within the meaning of section 25 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878.

The London County Council appealed.

Dickens, K.C., and Daldy, for the appellants.—The decision in London County Council v. Payne & Co. really governs this case, for the difference relied on by the respondents is insufficient to distinguish the two cases in principle. The rule there laid down by Kennedy, J., in his judgment is thus reported in [1904] 1 K. B., at p. 202: "The weighing instrument itself must be such as in its condition when it is being used for trade gives a just and true—that is, an accurate result as regards the weight of the thing placed in the scales"; and "the trader renders himself liable, however honest his intention, if in fact he uses or employs an adjustment which is not an adjustment of the thing within the scale—that is, the thing to be weighed—but is an adjustment which reflects the truth and accuracy of the weighing machine itself." There is no allegation of fraud here. Under section 26 the consent of the purchaser is material, for under that section fraud has to be proved, but under section 25 the question of motive is wholly immaterial. It is no defence to show that care and supervision is exercised to see that the scales manipulated in one way or another to meet the wishes of a particular customer, are used only for executing the order of that customer.

Avory, K.C., and George Elliott, for the respondents.—It would be impossible to get through the weighing-out of a chest of tea into quarter-pound packets within a reasonable compass of time unless some method like the one adopted here was used to accurately allow for the weight of the wrapper into which the tea after being weighed was to be put up in. It is not on offence to sell a packet of tea of the net weight of say ¼lb. if it is sold with a statement that in that weight the weight of the paper is included. It is no offence to place the paper in the goods scoop first and then make up the weight with tea. If so, how can it be an offence to place the paper bag underneath the scoop instead of in it. The use of the bag is temporary. The scale is not for a moment rendered per se "false or unjust." Paragraph 3 (d) of the case shows that proper care and supervision was taken to guard against the scale being used for weighing tea for an ordinary customer, as the bag was at once removed when this particular order was executed. These scales, therefore, were found by the magistrate to be honest scales, and the respondents' method of weighing-out the tea comes within the words of the judgment of Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., in London County Council v. Payne & Co., where he says: "If I had come to the conclusion that a temporary adjustment was made solely for the time when these scales were being used for this particular purpose, and the condition in which these scales were found by the inspector was not their condition as ordinarily kept, I should have come to a different conclusion." This was an honest attempt by the respondents to conform with the requirement of the statute as laid down by the Lord Chief Justice. The test is the same as that applied in Lane v. Rendall, 48 W. R. 153, [1899]

2 Q. B. 673, 69 L. J. Q. B. 8, and the respondents ought not to be convicted, because the bag placed for the time being under the goods scoop is not part of the weighing machine, which is therefore not rendered "false and unjust," as it was held to be in the first prosecution, by the fixing on to the beam itself a detacheable disc.

Dickens, K.C., replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The effect of this, to me, most interesting discussion, has been rather to bring me to the conclusion that in London County Council v. Payne I was over anxious not to strain the statute, and that, perhaps, I have, by what I then expressed, and, I hope, expressed very carefully, quite innocently led persons to believe that the statute had a less wide effect and operation than I now think it has. I do not, however, see any reason to qualify or depart from anything I said in that case. It seems to me that we have to apply the statute to this particular set of facts. That the line must be drawn somewhere is perfectly plain. The fact that if the scales were right and something were put into one pan to make the tea weigh a particular weight as against the weight on the other side, shows that there may be what we have all called a temporary use of lawful scales to weigh a particular thing in a particular way; but I think that the necessity for public protection, and the fact that these packets really only representing a weight of paper and tea, when they get into the hands of other people, may be possibly used so that persons who buy may be misled by not getting what they think they are buying, may have led the Legislature to use this language advisedly, and that section 25, which, after all, is that on which we have to decide this point, in using the language "every person who uses . . . any scale . . . which is false or unjust," means the using for the weighing operation of a scale which, as a scale, is false or unjust. It may be, and it probably is, a safer view that what the statute means is—as the inspector only goes from time to time when he sees the scale empty, and tests it as an empty scale—that it shall be a just balance, that it shall hang, so to speak, true, and, if the inspector puts a pound weight in to test the weighing, the pound weight will weigh it down in the sense of balancing it, and if the scale when used is a scale which will not fulfil the test which I endeavoured to lay down, and which my brother Kennedy laid down, perhaps in better language than I did, that is, to weigh truly what is put into the other pan, it is an unjust balance. It is not disputed in this case—in fact it is very properly and fairly admitted and argued—that putting the bag underneath the scale for the purpose of weighing tea less paper on four or five hundred occasions would, within the judgment of this court in the previous case, have been a breach of the statute, if the bag had not been removed until the scale was used again for the same purpose, and the scale had been kept on a shelf in such a condition that it would only weigh truly paper and tea. It does not certainly seem to me, after weighing as carefully as I can what Mr. Avory has so forcibly and clearly set before us, that that ought to be a sufficient distinction to make what is done an offence in the one case, and not an offence in the other. I am not able satisfactorily in my own mind to exclude from the operation of section 25 a case in which the scales are rendered for the time being unjust, because a lawful operation is desired to be carried out. If those scales are kept in that condition for that purpose and with that object, and are never used for any other purpose, it seems almost impossible to say it would be outside the statute, if the only distinction is, that between the time of the two weighings the paper is temporarily removed.

While I agree with Mr. Avory that if it be taken as a fact, and to my mind rather a strange fact, that in order to secure the paper being taken out, they always in sales to other customers have the true weight of tea without the paper weighed in between the sales to these particular customers, it seems to me quite possible that, unless there be some supervision in that particular operation, the weighing to the ordinary and not the particular customer might take place with the paper underneath the scale. I therefore think it is safer to give the natural meaning to the language of the statute, and to say that if the person has used in the operation of weighing, and is found by the inspector to be using in the operation of weighing, an unjust balance in the sense that we have already described in London County Council v. Payne, it comes within the statute. Therefore, although I fully recognize the difficulty, and perhaps regret that the difficulty has been to a certain extent accentuated by my endeavouring not to strain the statute beyond that to which I thought it ought to apply, I have come to the conclusion that the statute does intend to prevent the using, in weighing, of a balance which is at the time, as a balance, unjust—which will not hang true when there is nothing in either pan, and which will not hang true when an equal weight is put into the goods pan on the one side and the weight pan on the other.

I therefore think, although I myself feel the difficulty of the case very much, that the appeal must be allowed, and that the magistrate in this case was not justified in differentiating, as he thought he could differentiate, the previous case of London County Council v. Payne.

KENNEDY, J.—The facts in this case do not appear to me to differ essentially from the facts with which this court had to deal in the previous case against the same company, and, therefore, I do not wish to add anything to the judgment my lord has just delivered.

RIDLEY, J.—I agree with the judgments that have been given, and I wish to say a very few words only. I do not think that this case is distinguishable from the former case, London County Council v. Payne, though there are indeed some differences in the facts. I recognize that it may be thought by some people that the court errs by giving too full a meaning to this statute, but I do not shrink from saying that the statute when it employs the words, "uses or has in his possession for use for trade any weight, measure, scale . . . or weighing machine which is false or unjust," it means that the trader ought not to have in his possession any scale which can be called at the time false or unjust. It is not necessary, in order to bring him within the statute, that he should actually be found to use it for any particular operation, for the inspector who comes round may probably come at a moment when it is not so being used. If he found it not being used, but in the condition in which I have described, then it is in possession for use. Under one or other of those expressions comes, as I think, this case, that is to say, although the inspector does not find it being used (he may not do so) still he finds it in possession for use. I do not find myself able to recognize the distinction founded on the intention of the orders, which were issued by Messrs. Payne, that the forewoman is to come round within a short interval of time and remove the paper bag. It is, no doubt, a thing which goes in the direction which has been pointed out by the Lord Chief Justice, but it is not sufficient, as it seems to me, to establish that that which has been done is outside the purview of the Act of Parliament. I agree with the judgments that have been pronounced.

Appeal allowed; case remitted.

Solicitor for the appellants, W. A. Blaxland.

Solicitors for the respondents, Lamb, Son, & Prance.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Stirling and Mathew, L.JJ.) — Dec. 15.

CHESHIRE v. BAILEY. (a.)

Bailment—Contract to supply carriage and driver to commercial traveller—Duty of driver to safeguard goods in carriage—Larceny of driver—Loss of goods.

The defendant, who was a jobmaster, agreed to let to the plaintiff, who was a wholesale silversmith, a commercial brougham, horse, and coachman for the use of the plaintiff's traveller when taking samples to customers. The defendant did not know the nature of the plaintiff's trade nor the character of the samples to be carried. While the brougham was being so used the traveller went to lunch, leaving the brougham with the samples in it in the charge of the coachman, when, with the connivance of the coachman, the samples were stolen. The coachman had always borne a good character. In an action to recover the value of the samples,

Held, that, though the defendant had undertaken by his coachman to use due care in safeguarding the samples in the brougham during the temporary absence of the traveller, and though he would therefore have been liable for the negligent act of the servant within the scope of his employment, he was not liable for the felony of his servant acting outside the scope of his employment.

Abraham v. Bullock, 50 W. R. 626, 86 L. T. 796, considered.

Judgment of Walton, J. (52 W. R. 631), reversed.

Appeal from the judgment of Walton, J. (52 W. R. 631).

The action was brought by a wholesale silversmith, carrying on business at Birmingham, to recover damages for the loss of certain goods. The defendant, who was a jobmaster carrying on business in London, let to the plaintiff a specially fitted commercial brougham, horse, and coachman for use by his traveller in London when taking round samples of his goods to customers and seeking orders. The defendant, though he did not know the plaintiff's trade, knew the purpose for which the brougham was required. The brougham was used for several months by one Gray, the plaintiff's traveller, for the purposes above-mentioned. On one occasion the brougham contained samples of silver goods to the value of about £1,000, and after visiting certain customers the traveller at midday went to get his lunch, leaving the brougham and its contents in charge of the coachman. The coachman thereupon, in the absence of the traveller, drove to a place agreed upon with certain confederates of his, who stole the brougham and its contents. The driver and his confederates were convicted of the offence at the Central Criminal Court. Some of the goods were subsequently recovered, and the plaintiff brought this action to recover the value of the goods that were lost. It appeared from the evidence that the defendant, when he took the coachman into his service, received a good character with him, and that the coachman bore a good character while he was in the defendant's service up to the time of committing the offence.

Walton, J., found as a fact that the brougham, with a horse and coachman, was supplied for the purpose of taking the plaintiff's commercial traveller and his samples round London to see his customers and transact his business. He further found as a fact that the defendant was not told that the traveller was in the service of a silversmith, but that he did know that samples of goods were to be carried about in the brougham—that was to say, samples of goods such as were dealt in by London tradesmen, which might, therefore, be of considerable value. He did not think that it could be said that there was anything extraordinary or unusual, having regard to the way in which broughams of this kind were used in London, in the nature or value of the goods carried. The defendant might have inquired as to the nature of the goods, had he wished to do so, and limited his liability. The defendant did not do so. He let the brougham to be used as a commercial brougham for the purpose of being taken about by a commercial traveller, and he (the learned judge) thought that the samples, such as were carried in the present case, might be within the contemplation of the parties. If that were so, the decision of the Court of Appeal in Abraham v. Bullock, 50 W. R. 626, 86 L. T. 796, applied to the present case, and therefore the contract involved an obligation upon the defendant that the driver he supplied should use ordinary care, not merely in driving, but in looking after the carriage when the traveller was away. That obligation embraced the obligation of taking reasonable care to safeguard the goods in the brougham in the absence of the traveller. He, therefore, upon the authority of that case, held that there was a contract by the defendant that the coachman should use ordinary and reasonable care to safeguard the goods in the brougham in the intervals of driving when the traveller was not in the brougham, but was engaged in calling upon customers or on other business, or when, as in the present case, he was taking his lunch in the middle of the day. That being the contract, it seemed to him that the coachman did not use reasonable care, but, on the contrary, he wilfully allowed the goods to be stolen, and there having been a failure on his part to use reasonable care to safeguard the goods in the brougham, it appeared to him (the learned judge) that there was a breach by the defendant of the contract between himself and the plaintiff, and that the failure to use such care was not any the less actionable, because what was done amounted to a criminal act. Different considerations would arise if it was a question of the master's liability to a stranger for something done by the servant, for in such cases the fact that the act of the servant was a criminal act might have an important bearing upon the question whether the servant was acting within the scope of his authority. He accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiff for £800.

The defendant appealed.

English Harrison, K.C., and Clavell Salter, K.C. (Thorn Drury with them), for the defendant.—The decision in Abraham v. Bullock, 86 L. T. 796, is not in point. That case merely decided that the duty of a jobmaster in such a case as the present is to provide a driver who will take reasonable care to safeguard the goods in the brougham during the temporary absence of the traveller. The jobmaster contracts that he, through his servant, will use due care. A negligent act of the servant within the scope of his employment is imputable to the master, but an independent felony by the servant cannot be so imputed. There is no implied obligation by a bailee, in the case of a bailment for reward, to be responsible for the crime of his servant unless his negligent act facilitated the crime: Finucane v. Small, 1 Esp. 315; Foster v. Essex Bank, 17 Mass. Rep. 478; Giblin v. McMullen, 17 W. R. 445, L. R. 2 P. C. 317; Jobson v Palmer, 41 W. R. 264, [1893] 1 Ch. 71; Story on Bailments (9th ed.), s. 88. It is no breach of the bailee's undertaking to use due care if the bailee's servant steals the goods entrusted to him. In Abraham v. Bullock the driver's negligence in safeguarding the goods within the scope of his employment was the cause of their loss, and no question of any felony arose. It was not in the contemplation of the defendant here when he entered into the contract that the brougham would be used for carrying about silver articles of great value which might be easily stolen. The judgment was therefore wrong.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

They also referred to Daniels v. Harris, 23 W. R. 86, L. R. 10 C. P. 1; The Moorcock, 37 W. R. 439, at p. 440, 14 P. D. 64, at p. 68; British Mutual Banking Co. v. Charnwood Forest Railway Co., 35 W. R. 590, 18 Q. B. D. 714; Coupé Co. v. Maddick, [1891] 2 Q. B. 413, at p. 416, 40 W. R. Dig. 11; Speight v. Gaunt, 32 W. R. 435, 9 App. Cas. 1.

C. A. Russell, K.C., and Sims Williams, for the plaintiff.—The question is, what was the contract between the parties? If it is as found by Walton, J., the cases cited have no bearing upon the point. The contract was to furnish a brougham, horse, and coachman, to drive the plaintiff's traveller about with samples in such circumstances that the samples would from time to time be in charge of the coachman. There is no distinction, so far as the contract is concerned, between this case and Abraham v. Bullock. An act may be a crime from one point of view and a negligent act from another: Osborn v. Gillett, 21 W. R. 409, L. R. 8 Ex. 88; Dyer v. Munday, 43 W. R. 440, [1895] 1 Q. B. 742. The contract here was that the coachman would take due care in safeguarding the samples, and not having done so, the defendant is liable: Ellis v. Turner, 8 T. R. 531; Clark v. Earnshaw, Gow 30. Giblin v. McMullen was a case of a gratuitous bailment apart from any special contract, and the bank did not contract for safe custody, but only for house room. Jobson v. Palmer was not a case of bailment. The property in the goods was in the trustee, and he would not have been liable if he had injured them by his negligence. Where one person contracts by his servant to do an act, he is liable if the servant deliberately or inadvertently fails to do that which his master has contracted to do. A servant's act may render his master liable, though it is not merely negligent, but fraudulent: Hamlyn v. Houston & Co., 51 W. R. 99, [1903] 1 K. B. 81; Citizens' Life Assurance Co. v. Brown, [1904] A. C. 423, 52 W. R. Dig. 87.

They also referred to Kettle v. Bromsall, Willes 118; Coggs v. Bernard, 1 Smith's L. C. (11th ed.), p. 173, at p. 184 (locatio operis faciendi); Liver Alkali Co. v. Johnson, L. R. 9 Ex. 338, 23 W. R. Dig. 39; Story on Bailments (9th ed.), s. 57.

English Harrison, K.C., in reply, referred to Sanderson v. Collins, 52 W. R. 354, [1904] 1 K. B. 628, where Coupé Co. v. Maddick was considered by the Court of Appeal.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 15.—COLLINS, M.R., read the following judgment: This is an appeal by the defendant from the decision of Walton, J., in favour of the plaintiff. The short facts are that the defendant, a jobmaster, let to the traveller of the plaintiff, a silversmith, what is known in the trade as a commercial brougham. The defendant, though he did not know the plaintiff's trade, had notice of the purposes for which the brougham was required—viz., that the plaintiff's traveller might be driven about in it by a coachman supplied by the defendant for the purpose of seeking orders and showing samples. He knew that this would involve carrying samples of some value in the brougham, and that the traveller would have to get out frequently for the purpose of visiting his customers or having refreshment. He agreed accordingly to supply a brougham specially fitted for the purpose, together with a horse and driver. The inferences of fact drawn by Walton, J., are not disputed by the appellant. The brougham had been used at intervals extending over several months by one Gray, the plaintiff's traveller, for the purposes described. On one occasion, when he had with him plate and other articles to the value of about £1,000, the driver, acting in concert with other persons, who as well as the driver were afterwards convicted at the Old Bailey, stole the greater part of the contents of the brougham during the traveller's absence at lunch. Thereupon the plaintiff brought this action claiming to recover from the defendant the value of the stolen goods.

Walton, J., being, as he conceived, bound by the decision of this court in the recent case of Abraham v. Bullock, gave judgment for the plaintiff for £800. Putting that case aside for a moment, I desire to consider whether on principle the decision of the learned judge can be supported. I have come to the conclusion that it cannot. There was no special contract in this case altering the ordinary rights of the parties as implied by law upon a bailment of this class. Technically it seems to come under the class described as locatio operis faciendi. The defendant, though not a common carrier, has come under the ordinary obligations of a person who undertakes for consideration to do the work of carrying the plaintiff's traveller and his goods to such destination as he shall direct. He is bound therefore to bring reasonable care to the execution of every part of the duty accepted. He may perform that duty by servants or personally, and if he employs servants he is as much responsible for all acts done by them within the scope of their employment as he is for his own. But he is not an insurer, and is not answerable for acts done by his servants outside the scope of their employment. Hence he is not responsible for the consequences of the crime committed by the driver in this case, which was clearly outside the scope of his employment, unless it can be shown that the happening of the crime was due to the defendant's negligence. It is a crime committed by a person who in committing it severed his connection with his master, and became a stranger, and as the circumstances under which it was committed are known it raises no presumption of negligence in the defendant. He took reasonable care to perform his duty in that he sent out a servant whom he reasonably supposed to be trustworthy to drive the brougham and watch its contents in the traveller's absence, and he was not bound to do more. That an ordinary contract of bailment of this class does not involve a warranty that the servant shall not turn thief, and so cease to exhibit reasonable care, where the master has devolved the duty of custody on the servant, is clear from the fact that no class of bailee except common carriers and innkeepers are now at common law deemed responsible for the theft of their servants unless such theft was attributable to the negligence of the master. This immunity rests on the combination of two well-established factors—(a) that such bailees are only bound to ordinary care; (b) that qua masters they are not responsible for acts done by their servants outside the scope of their employment. It is not necessary to refer to the authorities in detail which support these propositions. They will be found collected in Coggs v. Bernard, and the notes thereto in 1 Smith's Leading Cases (11th ed.), p. 173.

This being, in my view, the law clearly established as the result of many authorities, it remains to consider whether we are bound in this court to hold the contrary by reason of the case on which Walton, J., acted. I have carefully reconsidered that case, and am quite satisfied that the decision is right, and that it does not support the decision under appeal. The short facts there were that the driver of a commercial brougham, hired under similar circumstances, negligently left the brougham unguarded while the traveller was at lunch, and thus gave opportunity to thieves to steal its contents. The negligence of the servant in that case was clearly committed within the scope of his employment, and was, therefore, negligence for which the master was responsible just as much as if he had elected to watch himself instead of doing it by his servant and had then neglected it in the same manner. The case is only reported in the Law Times Reports, and I am there reported to have said, "I think that the defendant was under an obligation to use ordinary care in looking after the carriage in Cohen's"—that is, the traveller's—"absence, and that his servant failed in that respect." This seems to be substantially accurate. The proposition I was combating was that of the judge below, "that it was not in the scope of the driver's duty to protect the goods as the servant of the defendant, so that the latter was not liable for negligence in the performance of any duty owed by him," and I am reported to have said, "It is a reasonable and proper inference to draw from the contract and the circumstances under which it was made that the defendant undertook to supply a driver who would take ordinary care of the carriage when Cohen was obliged to leave it." Substitute for "who would" in the above sentence, "whose business it should be," and I think it would be verbally accurate. Again, lower down I say, "The very thing contemplated by the obligation on the defendants to take care of the carriage in Cohen's absence was the guarding against the possibility of a thief taking the jewels." I certainly did not intend to hold in that case that the defendant warranted that due care should be taken, though I did hold that he was responsible if his servant, acting in the scope of his employment, did not take it. I regret that any infelicity of language on my part should have misled Walton, J. I think that the appeal must be allowed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I agree. I think the implied obligation on the part of the jobmaster which was held by this court to exist in the case of Abraham v. Bullock ought, so far as regards the acts of the jobmaster's servants, to be restricted to acts done by them in the course of their employment. For the existence of such limitation the case of Sanderson v. Collins, appears to me to be an authority. The head-note is: "The defendant sent his carriage to be repaired by the plaintiff, who was a coachbuilder. The plaintiff lent a carriage of his own to the defendant for use while the repairs were going on. The coachman of the defendant, without his knowledge, took the plaintiff's carriage out for his own purpose, and while he was driving the carriage it was injured through his negligence. In an action to recover the cost of repairing it, held, that as the coachman at the time when the injury was done to the carriage was not acting in the course of his employment, the defendant was not liable." There are a few observations of Romer, L.J., which seem to me to apply to the present case. He says: "It is admitted that when the arrangement was made between the plaintiff and the defendant no special contract was made with regard to the obligations to be undertaken by the defendant. What, then, are the obligations that must be implied? Certainly the insurance of the safe return of the carriage is not one of them." That applies, with slight verbal alterations, here also. Then he proceeds: "The case is one of an ordinary bailment for mutual benefit and the defendant as bailee is under an obligation, now well settled in law, by which he was bound to take reasonable care of the chattel entrusted to him, but was not liable for loss or injury which might happen to it during the bailment unless caused by his negligence or that of his servants acting in the course of their employment." Here also the bailment, though of a slightly different nature, is one by which the defendant was bound to take only reasonable care of the chattel entrusted to him, and, in my opinion, was not liable for loss or injury except caused by his own negligence or that of his servant acting in the course of his employment. Here there was no evidence of any negligence on the part of the defendant, and as regards the acts of the coachman it seems to me that he ceased to be acting in the course of his employment when he drove away from the spot where the plaintiff's traveller had left the brougham and proceeded to meet his accomplices for the purpose of doing the wrong. I think, therefore, the appeal ought to be allowed.

MATHEW, L.J., read the following judgment: I see no reason to doubt that in a contract of this kind the jobmaster undertakes with the hirer that the coachman will take care to protect the goods in the brougham from damage or depredation. This was the decision of the court in Abraham v. Bullock. The object of the present action was to establish that the defendant had guaranteed the honesty of his servant, and was therefore responsible for the theft of which the coachman had been guilty. But I see no ground for the implication of any such undertaking on the part of the defendant. It was not shown that the plaintiff had informed the defendant that he insisted upon any such liability on the part of the defendant. If he had done so there seems little reason to doubt that the defendant would have declined to take upon himself without remuneration the obligation of an insurer. The coachman was not the class of person who would, in the ordinary course of business, have been entrusted for safe keeping with money or money's worth to the amount of many hundreds of pounds. The true inference from the facts would seem to be that the plaintiff relied for the protection of his property, not upon any contract with the defendant, but upon the strong arm of the criminal law, and the dread which is felt of being brought within its grasp. The plaintiff had no reason to assume that the coachman, in committing a crime, would be acting within the scope of the authority given him by his master, which must be measured by reference to the ordinary duties of a coachman. In the absence of any evidence of a contract the law applicable to the case would seem to be clear. Any departure by the servant for his own purposes from the discharge of his ordinary duties would relieve his master from responsibility, and from the time that the coachman drove the brougham to the public-house with the intention of assisting in the theft of the contents the master ceased to be liable for any loss or damage that followed. The contract between the plaintiff and the defendant must be regarded as having been made on this footing of this well-known rule of the law of master and servant. The defendant is no more liable than he would have been if the brougham and its contents, without negligence on the part of the coachman, had been carried away by a stranger. The authority relied upon by Walton, J., seems clearly distinguishable from the present case, and I agree that the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, G. F. Hudson, Matthews, & Co.

Solicitors for the defendant, H. Clifford Turner & Co.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Stirling and Mathew, L.JJ.) — Dec. 6.

UNDERGROUND ELECTRIC RAILWAYS CO. OF LONDON (LIMITED) v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE. (a.)

Inland revenue — Stamp — Conveyance on sale — Ad valorem duty—Purchase-money payable on contingency—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 56, sub-section 2.

A company agreed to sell its undertaking to a new company in consideration of a sum payable in cash and a further sum payable in shares. It was also agreed that the profits of the new company available for dividend in respect of each year should be applied, first, in payment of a cumulative dividend at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum on the amount for the time being paid up on any shares issued by the new company; and, secondly, in paying to the vendor company "as a further part of the consideration for the said sale such a sum as shall be equal to a dividend of 3 per cent. for such year on the amount for the time being paid up on such of the original ordinary share capital . . . in the new company as shall for the time being have been issued by the new company."

Held, that this latter part of the consideration, though payable on a contingency, was "money payable" within the meaning of section 56, sub-section 2, of the Stamp Act, 1891, and must therefore be brought into account for the purpose of assessing the ad valorem duty payable in respect of the consideration for the sale.

Judgment of Channell, J. (ante, p. 61, [1904] 2 K. B. 198), reversed.

Appeal by the Crown from the judgment of Channell, J., upon a case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue pursuant to section 13 of the Stamp Act, 1891. The case is reported ante, p. 61, [1904] 2 K. B. 198.

The facts and arguments are fully set out in the report below.

Sir Robert Finlay, A.G., and S. A. T. Rowlatt appeared for the Crown.

Roskill, K.C., and Austen-Cartmell appeared for the railway company.

The following cases were referred to: Mortimore v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, 2 H. & C. 838, 12 W. R. Dig. 126; Lord Canning v. Raper, 1 E. & B. 164, at pp. 176, 177; Inland Revenue Commissioners v. City of Glasgow Bank, 8 R. 389; Onslow v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, 39 W. R. 373, [1891] 1 Q. B. 239; Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, 45 W. R. 448, [1897] 1 Q. B. 786, [1897] 2 Q. B. 316, 46 W. R. Dig. 74; Rowell v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, [1897] 2 Q. B. 194, 45 W. R. Dig. 71; and Maxwell v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, 4 McPherson 1121.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the judgment of Channell, J., and it raises the question whether stamp duty is payable under section 56, sub-section 2, of the Stamp Act, 1891, on a sum of money the payment of which is provided for by the terms of an agreement of the 25th of June, 1902, between the Traction Co. and the Underground Electric Railways Co. Clause 3 is the material clause upon which the question arises. That clause provides that "the profits of the new company available for dividend in respect of each year shall be applied in the following order and manner, that is to say . . . (2) in paying to the Traction Co. or its assigns as a further part of the consideration for the said sale such a sum as shall be equal to a dividend of 3 per cent. for such year on the amount for the time being paid up on such of the original ordinary share capital of £5,000,000 in the new company as shall for the time being have been issued by the new company." As a matter of fact, at the date of the agreement a sum of £1,300,000 had been paid up upon the share capital in question, and a dividend of 3 per cent. upon that sum would amount to £39,000. That being part of the consideration, the question is whether the provisions of the Stamp Act, 1891, are sufficient to reach it. The provision relied upon is that contained in section 56, sub-section 2, which provides that "where the consideration, or any part of the consideration, for a conveyance on sale consists of money payable periodically for a definite period exceeding twenty years or in perpetuity, or for any indefinite period not terminable with life, the conveyance is to be charged in respect of that consideration with ad valorem duty on the total amount which will or may, according to the terms of sale, be payable during the period of twenty years next after the day of the date of the instrument." In the present case a part of the consideration for the sale unquestionably is, as provided in the above clause of the agreement, a sum of money payable periodically for an indefinite period not terminable with life, and therefore it seems so far that the sum of 3 per cent. on the amount for the time being paid up on the original share capital falls within the words of the section, and is chargeable with ad valorem duty, unless the respondents' contentions are correct. Their first contention is that the words "money payable" means money payable absolutely and not upon a contingency. They take a further point—namely, that there must be an ascertained sum in respect of which duty can be levied, and they say that the sum upon which the 3 per cent. is payable is an uncertain sum, inasmuch as the agreement contemplates that a great deal more capital will be paid up than was actually paid up at the date of the agreement. That objection does not press me, because I find that there is a fixed minimum already paid up at the date of the agreement, and the fact that that minimum may be increased does not, in my opinion, alter the fixity of that minimum below which the capital cannot fall upon which 3 per cent. is payable. Therefore the argument that a possible future increase of capital has rendered the sum so uncertain as to be incapable of being brought within the provisions of the Stamp Act, 1891, fails.

It is then said that the £1,300,000 is not such a minimum, because the company may at any time reduce its capital under the Companies Acts, and that in such a case the above minimum would go. The Attorney-General has, in my opinion, answered that by pointing out that the agreement provides for the payment of 3 per cent. on the amount paid up on the capital issued, and that this £1,300,000 has been paid up on the capital which has been issued, and that nothing which the company does afterwards can undo that fact, and that the court can only have regard to the sum actually paid up at the date of the agreement as the minimum.

With regard to the argument that the words "money payable" do not embrace money payable on a contingency, it seems to me in the first place, that if it is once taken that the money may be payable on a contingency we are not pressed by the fact that several uncertainties combine to make up the contingency. Therefore the question is narrowed down to this—Do those words embrace money payable on a contingency? I do not rely upon the use of the word "may" in the later part of the sub-section, because it seems to me that that word is well capable of the explanation given of it by the respondents. But I come to the conclusion that the words in question, "money payable," embrace money payable on a contingency, because I find that in the cases cited the words were equally absolute, and did not necessarily import payment on a contingency, and yet they were held to include money payable on a contingency. Mortimore v. Inland Revenue Commissioners was the case of a mortgage, and it was held that the word "debt" in the then existing Stamp Act included a contingent as well as an absolute debt. It seems to me that the reasons upon which the court in that case held that the word "debt" included money payable on a contingency apply equally to the words "money payable." I cannot see anything in the fact that the cases cited for the Crown are cases either of mortgage or of settlement. No doubt these different classes of instrument are dealt with in certain fasciculi of clauses in the Act, but I do not think that there is any particular significance in that fact. It seems to me that we can get an underlying principle from those cases. The principle is that the word "debt" means money payable either on a contingency or absolutely. That principle applies to the words "money payable" in this section. "Money payable periodically for an indefinite period" covers money which is payable on a contingency, and which may therefore never become payable unless the profits of the company are sufficiently large to admit of the payment of 3 per cent. on the paid-up capital after paying 5 per cent. on it. It is money which will become payable upon the happening of that event, and the Crown is therefore entitled to duty. The appeal must be allowed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question turns upon section 56, sub-section 2, of the Stamp Act, 1891. Part of the consideration for the sale in the present case, according to the agreement of sale, consists of a sum of money payable out of the profits of the company—namely, "such a sum as shall be equal to a dividend of 3 per cent. for such year on the amount for the time being paid up on such of the original ordinary share capital of £5,000,000 in the new company as shall for the time being have been issued by the new company." At the date of the agreement the whole of the £5,000,000 ordinary share capital of the company had been issued, and a certain amount had been paid up thereon, and the Inland Revenue Commissioners state that a dividend of 3 per cent. upon the amount so paid up amounts to £39,000, and they came to the conclusion that this sum constitutes money payable periodically either in perpetuity or for an indefinite period within the meaning of section 56, sub-section 2, of the Stamp Act, 1891. In my opinion that conclusion is right. We start with this, that the money must be payable periodically. It is urged that "money payable periodically" means money payable absolutely. It seems to me that the words include money payable either absolutely or on a contingency, just as the word "debt" in a former Stamp Act has been held to include a debt payable either absolutely or contingently. There is nothing in the subsequent language of the section which lends itself to the other view. The words "will or may," which were relied upon by the Crown, do not, at any rate, tend to negative the construction which the commissioners have placed upon the words of the section.

MATHEW, L.J.—I agree, for the reasons which have been given by my lord and my brother Stirling.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the Crown, Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

Solicitors for the railway company, Bircham & Co.

From K. B. Div. (Stirling and Mathew, L.JJ.) — Dec. 2.

GEEN v. HERRING. (a.)

Practice—Costs—Taxation—Action for recovery of land—Landlord and tenant—Costs occasioned by making all persons in possession defendants — Ord. 65, r. 27 (20).

The plaintiff was the holder of four leases for long terms comprising fifty-two houses. The plaintiff's predecessors in title had granted four sub-leases, each comprising a portion of the houses, all of which became vested in the defendant H. Both the leases and the sub-leases contained covenants to repair and conditions for re-entry on breach of covenant. H. let the houses to weekly tenants. The premises having got out of repair, the freeholder served notices under section 14 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, on the plaintiff. The plaintiff entered into a correspondence with H., from which it appeared that the plaintiff looked to H. as the proper person to do the repairs, and that H. was ready to meet any proceedings that might be taken for non-repair. The plaintiff commenced four actions to recover possession of the houses, the defendants named on the writs being the weekly tenants, who were 119 in number. H. obtained leave to defend the actions, and, having put the houses into repair, applied for relief against forfeiture. Four orders were made by consent, one in each action, granting the defendant H. relief against forfeiture, and directing him to pay the plaintiff's costs as between solicitor and client. On taxation the master taxed the costs of the four actions, and allowed the costs of serving the various defendants with notice of the writs in the respective actions.

Held, that the master ought, having regard to the object with which the actions were brought, to have disallowed all the costs occasioned by the weekly tenants having been made defendants, but that the form of the consent orders was a bar to the objection that only one action was necessary.

Appeal from the refusal of Bruce, J., to order a review of taxation of costs.

The costs in question were the plaintiff's costs in four actions brought for the recovery of possession of fifty-two houses.

The owner of the freehold had granted four leases for long terms, each lease comprising a certain number of the houses, and each of the four lessees had granted a sub-lease. The leases and sub-leases all contained the usual covenants to repair and conditions for re-entry on breach of covenant.

Before the year 1902 the leases became vested in the plaintiff, and the sub-leases became vested in the defendant Herring, who let the houses to weekly tenants and paid the rents reserved by the sub-leases to the plaintiff.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In 1902, the houses being out of repair, the freeholder served on the plaintiff, under section 14 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, notices specifying the breaches of covenant and requiring the plaintiff to remedy the same, and the plaintiff served similar notices on the defendant Herring.

A correspondence ensued between the plaintiff's agents and Herring's solicitor, which terminated in the two following letters:

On the 21st of April, 1903, the plaintiff's agents wrote to Herring's solicitor: "Dear Sir,—The time allowed by the notice attached to the schedule of dilapidations served upon this property has now expired, and unless we can have some satisfactory guarantee from you that the repairs will be completed at an early date, we must instruct the lawyers to start an action of ejectment. We will delay communicating with the lawyers until Friday next, which will give you sufficient time to let us have a reply to this letter."

On the 22nd of April Herring's solicitor wrote to the plaintiff's agents: "Dear Sirs,—I have received your letter of yesterday. You have already been informed that the builder is carrying out the repairs, and this is being done as fast as reasonably can be. If this does not satisfy you, you may take any course you choose, and I am prepared to accept service."

On the 6th of May, 1903, the plaintiff commenced the four actions above mentioned. The defendants named in the writs were the weekly tenants of the several houses, numbering altogether 119 persons. A copy of the writ in each action was served upon each of the defendants in the respective actions. Herring obtained leave under ord. 12, r. 25, to appear and defend as being in possession by his tenants, and he entered an appearance in the actions and delivered a statement of defence in each action. The other defendants did not enter any appearance.

Herring, having put the houses into repair, applied at chambers for relief against forfeiture, and the following order was made by consent in each action: "Upon hearing counsel for the defendant George Herring and for the plaintiff, and upon reading" certain affidavits, "and by consent, and the plaintiff accepting the statement of the said defendant that the freeholder is satisfied as to the repairs carried out by the said defendant, it is ordered that the said defendant George Herring be relieved from the forfeiture (if any) of the lease dated the 21st of March, 1862, and all further proceedings in this action be stayed (except for the purpose of enforcing this order), the said defendant George Herring paying to the plaintiff his costs as between solicitor and client in this action and the proceedings for relief and surveyor's fees in respect of the service of notice and preparation of the specification incurred before action brought, to be taxed."

The plaintiff accordingly carried in his bill of costs in each action for taxation, a charge of 1s. being made for making a copy of the writ in the case of each defendant, and a charge of 5s. for service thereof upon each defendant in the respective actions.

The taxing-master taxed the costs of the four actions, and allowed 1s. for the costs of making a copy of the writ in the case of each of the 119 defendants; but he refused to allow 5s. for the costs of serving a copy of the writ on each defendant, allowing what would have been the cost of serving notice of the writ upon each of the defendants—viz., 3s. for each notice.

The defendant Herring carried in objections to the taxation, contending that, as the plaintiff knew at the time of action brought that Herring was in possession of the property by his under-tenants, it was unnecessary to make the under-tenants defendants, and that Herring should have been the sole defendant, and that the items of the bill of costs resulting from the bringing of four actions instead of one, and from making persons other than Herring defendants, should be disallowed.

The taxing-master gave the following reasons in writing for allowing the items objected to: "This case raises a somewhat interesting point of practice. It has been suggested that the course taken by the plaintiff's solicitors was improper and an abuse of the court, but I am satisfied that they have acted bonâ fide throughout on the advice of their counsel, and in my opinion rightly. The Common Law Procedure Act enacts that in actions for ejectment all persons in possession shall be joined as defendants. This Act is repealed by the Judicature Act, 1873, except so far as no new practice is laid down by that Act (ord. 72, r. 2), and I understand that, notwithstanding the case of Minet v. Johnson, 63 L. T. 507, 39 W. R. Dig. 164, cited in these objections, and the provisions of ord. 12, r. 25, the practice has remained the same, and that it is still customary to join all persons in actual possession of the land to an action for ejectment. I asked for authority supporting the dictum of Lord Esher in the case referred to, that judgment against a lessee entitles the sheriff to eject anyone claiming under him; but counsel for the defendant stated he was not aware of any. It is suggested that ord. 12, r. 25, gives ample protection to any tenant, whether claiming under a person against whom judgment has been obtained or adversely to him, or that in any case all that is required is to serve the tenants with notice of the action. In the first place the plaintiff is, I submit, entitled to so constitute his action as to make it effective as soon as judgment has been obtained, and it would be embarrassing to him to be subject to a fresh defendant being brought in after, say, a lapse of twelve months, during which he had obtained judgment; and, in the second place, as personal service would presumably be necessary, the expense would be the same. An action for ejectment is highly technical, and in the absence of a direct authority for altering the practice it seems to me that a plaintiff would not be justified in doing so, and at any rate I should not be right in compelling him to do so. Whether, however, the practice I have referred to is right or wrong is not, I submit, necessary for me to decide here, inasmuch as I am taxing these costs as between solicitor and client, and it is my duty to allow all costs which are reasonably incurred; and I cannot say, under the circumstances, that the course taken here by the plaintiff, under the advice of his counsel, was the result of over-caution, and still less was it improper, and I accordingly overrule the objections. Objection has also been taken that four actions were unnecessary. No application was, however, made to consolidate, and I am taxing under four separate orders. Under the circumstances, moreover, apart from this, in my opinion, the plaintiff was not acting unreasonably in commencing four separate actions."

The defendant Herring applied to the judge at chambers to direct a review of taxation. Bruce, J., refused the application.

The defendant Herring appealed.

Montague Lush, K.C., and Herbert-Smith, for Herring.—There is no obligation on the plaintiff in an action of ejectment to make all the tenants in possession defendants. The plaintiff's only object was to get the repairs done, and it was therefore unnecessary to bring four actions or to make the tenants parties.

They referred to Minet v. Johnson; Guéret v. Young, W. N. 1883, p. 216; and Hume v. Somerton, 38 W. R. 748, 25 Q. B. D. 239.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Holman Gregory, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff followed the universal practice in suing and serving all the persons in possession: Cole on Ejectment, p. 83; Woodfall on Landlord and Tenant (16th ed.), p. 846. Herring having consented to an order being made in each of the four actions providing for the payment of costs, the taxing-master under these orders was bound to tax the costs of all four actions.

STIRLING, L.J., after stating the facts, and saying that the letters of the 21st and 22nd of April were important as showing that the plaintiff was looking to Herring as the proper person to do the repairs, and that Herring was ready to meet any proceedings that might be taken for non-repair, continued: It is contended that, the orders for relief against forfeiture having been made by consent, the court are bound by them and are precluded from going into these objections. So far as regards the objection that the costs of serving the weekly tenants were necessary, I do not think this contention is well founded. The orders no doubt provide that the costs of each action shall be taxed as between solicitor and client, but that does not preclude the master from disallowing, under ord. 65, r. 27 (20), any costs which appear to him to have been unnecessary or improper. In my opinion the costs of serving the weekly tenants either with copies of the writ or with notice of the writ were unnecessary and ought to be disallowed. It is said that these actions are in common form, and doubtless it is common practice in actions of ejectment to sue the tenants who are in occupation and not the landlord. But in every case regard must be had to the existing circumstances. It is not disputed that the action to recover these houses might have been well brought against Herring alone without joining anyone else, and, in my opinion, the object which the plaintiff had in view in bringing the actions—viz., to secure the execution of the repairs and not to recover possession of the houses—would have been obtained by issuing the writ against Herring alone, and not against the weekly tenants. I think, therefore, that the master was right in disallowing the costs of serving copies of the writs on the weekly tenants, and I think he ought to have gone farther and, having regard to the object of the action, he ought to have held that to serve the tenants at all was unnecessary. In my opinion the objections taken in each action to the allowance of these items, which were occasioned by the weekly tenants being made defendants, must prevail.

There remains the question as to the allowance of the costs of four actions. It follows logically that, if the weekly tenants were unnecessary parties, Herring ought to have been the sole defendant, and therefore only one action was necessary. But in my opinion the form of the consent orders is a bar to that objection. Herring saw fit to consent to an order to tax the costs of each action as between solicitor and client, and in face of that he cannot now insist that any of the actions were unnecessary. I regret the result, but I think Herring must pay these costs. The appeal, therefore, must be allowed to the extent which I have mentioned, but as to the rest it fails.

MATHEW, L.J., concurred.

Appeal allowed in part.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Surr, Gribble, & Oliver.

Solicitor for the defendant, Seaton F. Taylor.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Feb. 24; March 10.
Farwell, J. }

In re ASHFORTH.
ASHFORTH v. SIBLEY. (a.)

Will — Perpetuity — Real estate — Legal contingent remainders.

A devise of real estate was made to trustees upon trust for testatrix's children for life with benefit of survivorship, then to grandchildren born within twenty-one years of testatrix's death for life, with benefit of survivorship, remainder to last surviving grandchild in tail, remainder over.

The estate tail was held bad for remoteness, although, if good, it could have been determined within the prescribed period, and although it was a legal contingent remainder supported by a particular estate.

Doctrine of perpetuity and its applicability to legal contingent remainders discussed.

In re Hargreaves, 38 W. R. 470, 43 Ch. D. 401; Evans v. Walker, 25 W. R. 7, 3 Ch. D. 211; and Garland v. Brown, 10 L. T. Rep. 292, upheld.

In re Frost, 38 W. R. 264, 43 Ch. D. 246, discussed.

Adjourned summons.

The facts were as follows:

Martha Sarah Ashforth made her will on the 21st of February, 1863, and thereby devised her real estate to trustees and their heirs upon trust to receive the rent and profits and divide the same as soon as they conveniently could after Lady Day and Michaelmas Day in each year into three equal parts, and pay the same as therein mentioned to her three children and the survivors or survivor of them during their lives and the life of the survivor, and she then proceeded as follows: "And from and immediately after the decease of the longest liver of my said three children, John Morris Ashforth, George Morris Ashforth, and Martha Morris Ashforth, I direct my said trustees for the time being, subject nevertheless to the payment of the said annuity to Miss Eliza Robinson, if she should be then living, to pay and divide the said rents and profits of the said farm half-yearly, as soon as conveniently can be after the days hereinbefore appointed, unto and equally amongst all such of the children born in my lifetime, or within twenty-one years after my death, of the said John Morris Ashforth, George Morris Ashforth, and Martha Morris Ashforth who shall be living on the Lady Day or Michaelmas Day preceding such payment and division. And after the death of all such children of the said John Morris Ashforth, George Morris Ashforth, and Martha Morris Ashforth except one, I devise my said farm and all my said real estate to such surviving child and the heirs of his or her body in tail with remainder to the right heir of John Morris, son of my grandfather, Thomas Morris."

The testatrix died on the 7th of July, 1864.

Of her three children, George died in 1870, having had issue three children only, the present plaintiffs; Martha died without issue in 1877; and John died without issue in 1897.

The question for decision was whether the limitation in tail was or was not too remote.

Upjohn, K.C., and J. G. Wood, for the plaintiffs, the children of George Ashforth, argued that the estate tail given by the will was good for the following reasons: (1) The three plaintiffs could combine to release the right of survivorship and thus prevent the estate tail from being obnoxious to the rule against perpetuities as being too remote: Gooch v. Gooch, 3 De G. M. & G. 383. (2) A legal contingent remainder supported by a particular estate is not affected by the rule against perpetuity, not being a limitation to unborn persons for life with remainders to the issue of such unborn persons.

(a.) Reported by C. H. CARDEN NOAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Jenkins, K.C., and G. Henderson, for the heir-at-law, argued that the limitation in tail was void for remoteness.

Carr appeared for the trustees.

FARWELL, J., in a considered judgment, stated the facts as above, and continued: Property may be given to an unborn person for life or to several unborn persons successively for life, with remainders over, provided that such remainders be indefeasibly vested in persons ascertained or necessarily ascertainable within the limits prescribed by the rule against perpetuities: In re Hargreaves, 38 W. R. 470, 43 Ch. D. 401; Evans v. Walker, 25 W. R. 7, 3 Ch. D. 211. Mr. Wood did not dispute this, but argued that, inasmuch as one of the three plaintiffs must necessarily be the survivor, they could combine to release or destroy the right of survivorship and take the property at once. But this assumes the existence of a present estate after the life estates, which will remain when the obnoxious contingency is destroyed, and there is none such. The only estates of inheritance are contingent interests in remainder. The court has first to construe the will, and is driven to conclude that these interests are void for perpetuity. There is, therefore, no estate of inheritance in existence available for dealings by way of conveyance or otherwise, and nothing is left but the three life estates. The fallacy lies in the lack of appropriate definition. No release or destruction of the contingent interest would be of any avail. What is required is a dealing by way of conveyance of all the three contingent interests, and this is impossible, because they have been declared void, and three void contingent remainders will not make one good vested remainder. Mr. Wood relied on a passage in Lewis on Perpetuities (p. 164): "A perpetuity is a future limitation, whether executory or by way of remainder, which is not to vest until after the expiration of, or will not necessarily vest within, the period fixed and prescribed by law for the creation of future estates and interests, and which is not destructible by the persons for the time being entitled to the property subject to the future limitation, except with the concurrence of the individual interested under that limitation." It is to my mind plain that the learned author in speaking of destructibility is referring to remainders after an estate tail; but in any case the passage does not help Mr. Wood, because the validity of the estate which he wishes to create must depend on the conveyance of the ultimate remainders. The persons entitled subject to that limitation are entitled for life only. Mr. Wood also pressed on me a dictum of Lord Cranworth's in Gooch v. Gooch, 3 De G. M. & G., p. 383. I think that if the whole of that passage is read it is plain that the Lord Chancellor was really thinking of a joint tenancy, and not of a gift to three with a contingent limitation to the survivor of them. But, however that may be, it is only a dictum; and the reasons given are not easy to reconcile with the judgments of the Court of Appeal in In re Hargreaves and London and South-Western Railway Co. v. Gomm, 30 W. R. 620, 20 Ch. D. 562. The case before me is really undistinguishable from Garland v. Brown, 10 L. T. Rep. 292, before Wood, V.C., where there was a gift to the surviving children of the testator's surviving child for life in equal shares as tenants in common with remainder to the survivor of those children in fee, and the remainder in fee was held void for remoteness.

Then it is said that this is a legal contingent remainder supported by a particular estate vested in trustees during the lives of the grandchildren and of the survivor of them, and this was not disputed. But the plaintiffs argue further that such a remainder is not affected by any doctrine of remoteness, except the rule that life estates cannot be limited to unborn persons for life with remainders to the issue of such unborn persons. I might have contented myself with following Kay, J.'s, decision in In re Frost, 38 W. R. 264, 43 Ch. D. 246; but it is said that this was only the second or alternative reason for his judgment, and I have accordingly considered the point for myself. It is very difficult to say when the conception of perpetuity in its modern meaning first appeared in our courts. There is no doubt that the common law regarded all attempts to restrict the free alienation of property with extreme disfavour, as is stated in Mr. Butler's note to Coke on Littleton (342, b, i.). Although the suspense or abeyance of the inheritance (as distinguished from the freehold) was allowed by the common law, it was discountenanced and discouraged as much as possible, and modern law has added her discouragement of every contrivance which tends to render property inalienable beyond the limits settled for its suspense, because it is clear that no restraint on alienation would be more effectual than a suspense of the inheritance. He adds: "The same principles have in some degree given rise to the well-known rule of law that a preceding estate of freehold is indispensably necessary for the support of a contingent remainder, and they influence in some degree the doctrines respecting the destruction of contingent remainders." There was also the rule that an estate by purchase cannot be limited to the unborn child of an unborn child: Whitby v. Mitchell, 38 W. R. 337, 44 Ch. D. 85. With all respect to Kay, J., I do not think that much reliance can be placed on the existence of an independent rule of law forbidding a possibility on a possibility: see Gray on Perpetuities, p. 86, and Williams on Real Property (6th ed.), p. 245. The phrase seems due to Lord Coke's unfortunate predilection for scholastic logic, and may possibly be a pedantic and inaccurate reason for avoiding remoteness: see Blamford v. Blamford, 3 Bulst., 98, cited in Gray at p. 86. "Coke moves another matter in this case on Popham's opinion, Coke I., Rector de Chedington, that a possibility on a possibility is not good, for here in our case is a possibility on a possibility; yet it seems that it is good, for, if Popham's opinion should be law, it would shake the common assurances of the land. . . . But I agree that in divers cases there shall not be a possibility upon a possibility, and he puts the diversities in Lampet's case (10 Coke, 50, b)." It seems probable that contingent remainders could not anciently have been created (see Williams on Seisin, p. 190), and that down to the time of the Commonwealth the usual mode of settlement on marriage was by giving vested estates tail to living persons, and not estates tail to unborn children (ibid, 189). Although, therefore, there was a general principle that alienation should not be restricted by the creation of estates beyond a particular estate for life with a remainder in fee, or in tail, I can find no trace of any statement of the present rule in terms in any of the old books. But the general principle was well established, and as the ingenuity of real property lawyers invented new devices for rendering land inalienable for as long a time as possible, it became necessary to mould the expression of the old law so as to meet new emergencies. Thus in Cadell v. Palmer, 1 Cl. & F. 372, the House of Lords settled the question of the extent to which executory limitations and shifting uses, which had become possible under the Statute of Uses, could be lawfully carried, and they did this, not by creating any new law, for that would have been legislation, not decision, but by applying the limits of the old law to the new circumstances. The judges who advised the House supported their opinion by numerous authorities, and I would refer in particular to the quotation from Lord Kenyon's judgment in Long v. Blackall, 7 Term Rep. 102: "The rules respecting executory devises have conformed to the rules laid down in the construction of legal limitations, and the courts have said that the estates shall not be inalienable by executory devises for a longer time than is allowed by the limitations of a common law conveyance." Here, then, is an authoritative statement, in terms of precision, of the rule of law which had existed for centuries, but had not been theretofore defined, and had been applied from time to time as occasion arose by judges, who without formulating the precise limits of the rule held, as Lord Nottingham said in the Duke of Norfolk's case, 3 Ch. Cas., p. 31: "If it tends to a perpetuity, there needs no more to be said, for the law has so long laboured against perpetuities that it is an undeniable reason against any settlement if it can be proved to tend to a perpetuity." The rule, however, was only to be applied to cases where it was really necessary in order to defeat remoteness, and accordingly Lord St. Leonards, in Cole v. Sewell, 4 Dru. & War. 1, points out that it has no application to remainders limited to arise after an estate tail, because they are destructible by barring such estate tail, and are no more open to objection than the estate tail itself; and this is the meaning of the reference to destructibility in the passage that I read above from Lewis on Perpetuities, p. 164. But this reason has no application to contingent remainders not so limited and destructible; nor do I think that Lord St. Leonards so intended: see Sug. Prop., House of Lords, 116-121, and Lord Brougham's speech in the same case in the House of Lords, 2 H. L. Cas., at p. 234, where he puts this ground plainly as the reason for his observations. It would be very strange indeed that Lord St. Leonards should have referred to the "sacred rule" enunciated in Purefoy v. Rogers, 2 Wms. Saund. 768, 781, n. 9, that no limitation shall be construed as an executory or shifting use which can by possibility take effect by way of remainder—a rule which probably owes its origin to the chance of destruction by the failure of the particular estate incident to that one and not to the other—and should at the same time have affirmed that the rule against perpetuities had no application to such contingent remainders, although they might exceed the limits allowed for executory limitations, because they could not exceed the limits of perpetuity, for the proposition is self-contradictory. Assume that the doctrine of the destructibility of contingent remainders by failure of the particular estate is due to the desire of the courts to avoid remoteness (as Mr. Butler suggests), it does not follow that such remainders should be free from all other bonds. Liability to destruction for a particular cause at or before a given period is not incompatible with, or any ground for immunity from, destruction at the same period for a cause common to all other interests, executory, equitable, or otherwise, which may lead to remoteness. It is plain, moreover, that the courts have acted upon the principle that the rule against perpetuities is to be applied where no other sufficient protection against remoteness is attainable. Thus, inasmuch as equitable contingent remainders never failed for want of a particular estate, is was held that the rule must apply to them. In In re Finch, Abbiss v. Burney, 28 W. R. 903, 29 W. R. 449, 17 Ch. D. 211, the gift was to trustees on trust for A. for life, and after his death on trust to convey to such son of his as should first attain twenty-five. Sir George Jessel, M.R., at p. 230, said: "Where the legal fee is outstanding in trustees, that doctrine of contingent remainders which until the recent statute prevented contingent remainders from taking effect at all unless they vested at the moment of the termination of the prior estate of freehold, has no operation, and on that ground I think that this appeal should succeed." In In re Hollis Hospital Trustees and Hague, 47 W. R. 691, [1899] 2 Ch. 540, the late Byrne, J., held that the rule against purpetuity applied to a common law condition. He says at p. 552: "The courts have first to find what is the common law—that is, the principle embodied in what is called the common law—and then to apply it to new and ever-varying states of fact and circumstances. . . . New statutes and the course of social development give rise to new aspects and conditions, which have to be regarded in applying the old principles. The policy of the law against the creation of perpetuities was certainly asserted at a very early date, as was also the policy of discountenancing unrestricted restraints upon alienation." In Chudleigh's case (the case of perpetuities), 1 Rep. 120, the court defeated an attempt to make the Statute of Uses serve as the means of protecting contingent remainders from destruction, lest lands should remain too long in settlement. In Abbiss v. Burney the Court of Appeal defeated an attempt by vesting all the property in trustees. The present attempt is made by vesting a legal estate pur autre vie in trustees and limiting the contingent remainders as a legal use. In my opinion, the court is equally bound to defeat this; nor can I find any rule of law, or decision, or principle to the contrary. The opinion of the late Mr. Challis (Real Property, 2nd ed., 174-177) is, I think, sufficiently displaced by Byrne, J.'s, judgment in the Hollis Hospital case, and that of the late Mr. Joshua Williams by Gray on Perpetuity, 283-298; and the conclusion at which I have arrived is supported by (in addition to the text writers cited in that case and in In re Frost) an argument in the first edition of Jarman on Wills, vol 2, p. 727, and repeated in some of the later editions, by Mr. Serjeant Stephens's note in his Commentaries, vol 1, p. 554 (8th ed.), and by Mr. Gray's excellent treatise on perpetuities. The rule against perpetuities applies to all contingent equitable limitations of real estate and all contingent limitations of personality, including leaseholds. It would certainly be undesirable to add another to the anomalies that adorn our law, as I should succeed in doing if I held that the rule did not apply to legal contingent remainders. I therefore answer the first question by saying that the limitation in question is void for remoteness, and the second question in the negative.

Solicitors, Bird & Eldridges; G. A. Buxton Carr.

Chan. Div.
Farwell, J. } Feb. 9, 10.

In re GENT AND EASON'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Title—Will—Trustees—Trust funds to be laid out in purchase of freehold lands—"Vary and transpose"—"Securities"—No trust for conversion or reconversion — Concurrence of beneficiaries.

(a.) Reported by A. R. TAYLOUR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

A testator by his will had authorized his trustees to sell his real estate and to lay out and invest such moneys coming to their hands under the trusts of his will in the purchase or upon mortgage of freehold or leasehold properties in England or in Government stocks or funds or certain railway debenture or preference stock, or in any investments in which they could legally invest trust funds, with full power to vary and transpose such securities for others of a like description thereinbefore authorized. In pursuance of this power the trustees entered into a contract to sell certain freehold ground-rents, which it appeared from the abstract of title they had previously purchased under their power in the will to purchase freehold land. In the contract for sale they were expressed to be selling as trustees, and there was a condition stating that the beneficiaries were not to be required to concur in the sale. On an objection by the purchasers that there was no trust for conversion or reconversion, and that the beneficiaries must concur,

Held, that the trustees had a power of reconversion having regard to the words in the will "vary and transpose such securities"; that the word "securities" was synonymous with "investments"; and that the trustees could therefore show a good title without the concurrence of the beneficiaries in the conveyance, or receipt of the purchase-money.

In re Rayner, Rayner v. Rayner, 52 W. R. 273, [1903] 1 Ch. 176, discussed.

Adjourned summons.

This was an originating summons taken out for the purpose of determining the question whether William Gent, Henry Barker, and William S. Cottrell, purporting to sell as trustees of the will of William Gent, and in pursuance of a power therein contained, were able to show a valid title to certain real estate, and give a valid receipt for the purchase-money, without all the beneficiaries under the will, being sui juris, joining in the conveyance and receipt thereof.

The facts were shortly as follows:

By his will dated the 15th of February, 1893, William Gent, after making various bequests, devised and bequeathed all his real estate and the residue of his personal estate unto his trustees therein mentioned (the above-named vendors) upon trust to allow his wife during her life or widowhood to reside in his dwelling-house rent free, and also pay to her £150 per annum, and upon further trust to pay unto each of his sons, H. S. Gent and the said William Gent, £100 per annum during their lives on certain conditions. And the testator further directed his trustees to pay to each of his daughters, A. R. Gent and J. A. Gent, during the life of his wife, £250 per annum. And after the decease of his said wife he directed his said trustees to stand possessed of the sum of £6,000 for each of his said daughters who should be living at the time of his decease. And to stand possessed of the remainder of his real and residuary personal estate in trust for his said sons and daughters in equal shares. And the testator continued: "I authorize and empower my said trustees or trustee to sell and absolutely dispose of all or any part of my real and personal estate of a saleable nature at such time or times and in such manner and form as they or he shall think beneficial. I authorize and empower my said trustees or trustee to lay out and invest the moneys coming to their or his hands under the trusts of this my will in the purchase or upon mortgage of freehold or leasehold properties in England, or in or upon the Government stocks or funds or in or upon the debenture or preferential stock of the Great Western Railway Co., the Midland Railway Co., or the London and North-Western Railway Co., or in or upon any other investment in or upon which trustees are for the time being authorized or empowered by law to invest trust funds, with full power to vary and transpose such securities for other securities of any of the descriptions hereinbefore authorized." And he appointed the above-named vendors trustees and executors of his will.

The testator died on the 10th of June, 1895, and his will with a codicil thereto was proved on the 16th of August, by all the executors. The widow died on the 28th of May, 1904, and the trustees of the will, for the purpose of distributing the estate among the children of the testator in accordance with the terms of the will, gave instructions to their solicitors to sell by public auction under the printed particulars and conditions of sale certain freehold ground-rents in ten lots arising out of hereditaments at Hackney and elsewhere, the property of the testator. Several of the lots having failed to realize the reserve price, were withdrawn.

By a contract dated the 27th of October, 1904, but signed on the 15th of November, 1904, the vendors agreed to sell to Harriett Eason, widow, and E. H. P. Eason, the purchasers, certain property comprising lot 2 in the printed particulars, consisting of eight freehold ground-rents, amounting to £57 5s. per annum, secured on eight dwelling-houses in Hackney aforesaid. The purchasers thereupon paid a deposit of £152 10s. An abstract of title was delivered by the vendors, purporting to be an "abstract of title of the trustees of the will of the late William Gent, Esq." It commenced with an indenture of conveyance, dated the 28th of July, 1884, being a conveyance in fee simple to one John Clutton, subject to some leases, followed by another conveyance, dated the 28th of September, 1896, and made between the trustees of the will of John Clutton, and the vendors, by which, after reciting the conveyance above-mentioned to John Clutton, his will, death, and probate of his will, and also the will of William Gent, his death, and proof of his will, it was witnessed that in consideration of the sum of £1,890 then paid by the vendors "out of moneys coming to their hands under the trusts of the said will of the said William Gent, deceased," to the trustees of John Clutton, the latter thereby granted to the present vendors the hereditaments therein described, which included the said ground-rents, to hold the same, "unto and to the use of the said vendors, their heirs and assigns, subject to and with the benefit of the several leases of the same premises specified or referred to in the said schedule thereunder written, nevertheless upon the trusts and subject to the powers and provisions upon and subject to which the same premises ought to be held by virtue of the said will of the said William Gent, deceased."

In the contract the vendors were expressed to be selling as trustees of the will of the late William Gent, in consequence of the death of the testator's widow, and for the purpose of distributing his estate, and the beneficiaries under the said will were not to be required to concur in the sale or to join in the conveyance.

The testator left four children, all of whom were living.

The purchasers in their requisitions on title denied that the property, the subject of the contract, was the real estate of the testator, but was purchased by the vendors in 1896 and paid for out of moneys coming to their hands under the trusts of the will of William Gent, and this was apparently done under a power in William Gent's will empowering the trustees to invest such moneys in the purchase of real estate but that no power of conversion or reconversion was shown by the will. The purchasers therefore declined to accept the title of the vendors unless it could be shown that all the parties interested under the said will in the residuary real and personal estate and the proceeds thereof were sui juris and would concur in the sale and the receipt of the purchase-money.

To this the vendors on the 5th of December, 1904, replied as follows: "Without admitting the purchasers' assumption that the express power of sale contained in William Gent's will does not extend to cover investments made by his trustees, we fail to see how the trustees can 'vary and transpose such securities' except by sale."

The purchasers replied the title was too doubtful and called for a return of the deposit.

The vendors alleged that they had an implied power to sell or an actual power to sell under the power to vary, and that they could not carry out "the trusts of the will without realizing the whole of the estate."

Subsequently the purchasers took out this summons to have the question settled by the court.

H. Fellows, for the applicants.—The property contracted to be sold was purchased by the trustees, it is not the testator's real estate, and the question is whether there is an express power given by the will to reconvert the property so purchased. There is not sufficient in this will to justify the court in extending the meaning of the word "securities." Real estate is in no sense a "security." If there is a power to reconvert, then there is a power to alter the interests under the will. To treat this as a security would be straining the will. [FARWELL, J., referred to In re Rayner, Rayner v. Rayner, 52 W. R. 273, [1903] 1 Ch. 176.] Here the trustees have a power to lay out the trust moneys in the purchase of land, and to invest in a string of securities, and In re Rayner is very different from the present case. [FARWELL, J.—It comes to this, does it mean "investments" in the popular sense or the strict sense; or must I read "securities" in the popular sense as "investments."] It would be carrying In re Rayner very much further than before to say that the power to vary and transpose "securities" can only apply to an investment in land, because the power to invest in land is mixed up with investments. The devise is "my real estate," therefore by section 24 of the Wills Act, 1837, it means that particular real estate at the time of the testator's death. There is either a power of conversion under the power "to vary and transpose" or by implication arising from the context, but there is nothing in the will to imply that power.

He cited Tait v. Lathbury, 14 W. R. 216, L. R. 1 Eq. 174.

Upjohn, K.C., and S. B. Druce, for the respondents.

FARWELL, J.—I am unable to bring myself to feel any doubt about this case. The testator by his will has authorized his trustees to lay out and invest the moneys coming to their hands under the trusts of his will in the purchase or upon mortgage of freehold or leasehold properties in England, or in or upon the Government stocks or funds, or in or upon debentures or preferential stock of the Great Western Railway Co., the Midland Railway Co., or the London and North-Western Railway Co., or in or upon any other investments in or upon which trustees are for the time being authorized or empowered by law to invest trust funds, with full power to vary and transpose such securities for other securities of any of the descriptions hereintofore authorized. Now, the Court of Appeal in In re Rayner, 52 W. R. 273, [1903] 1 Ch. 176, had to consider the meaning of the word "securities," and Romer, L J., says: "The word is a flexible one, and I recognize that it is largely used in a wider or different sense, and in particular is widely used as a synonym for investment." It is quite plain to my mind that in the present case the word "securities" is used as a synonym for "investment." When he uses the term "preferential Great Western stock," that is sufficient to show that the word "security" is used in a wider sense than investment, as preference stock is not an "investment" in the strict meaning of the word. There is also this curious variation of the phrase "or in or upon any other investments in or upon which trustees are for the time being authorized or empowered by law to invest." It is clear he uses the word "securities" as synonymous with "investments." Here I have a trust to invest the money in the purchase or mortgage of land with a power to vary and transpose such securities for other securities of a like nature. I cannot see any ground for doubting that this does come within the words of the will. I am not impressed with counsel for the applicants' horror as a conveyancer at not having the usual trust for reconversion. At the same time it would not be unreasonable to suppose that a testator would authorize his own trustees to convert his own real estate as they thought fit at their own discretion if he did not give them a like power to turn back into personalty that which was made realty by their own act. I confess there is no difficulty about the title which the counsel for the applicants need fear, or which I need shrink from giving effect to.

Solicitors, Gamlen, Burdett, & Gamlen, for Cottrell & Son, Birmingham; Lattey & Hart.

Chan. Div.
Buckley, J. } Jan. 31.

In re WENBORN & SONS (LIMITED). (a.)

Company — Voluntary winding up — Pending action against company—Adoption of defence by liquidator—Plaintiff's costs of action—Costs out of assets of company.

If the liquidator of a company in liquidation, whether voluntary or compulsory, elects either to prosecute or defend proceedings in a pending action to which the company is a party on behalf of the estate, the company must be treated as an ordinary litigant, and if costs are given against it the liquidator must pay those costs in full to the plaintiff out of the assets of the company.

The liquidator of a company in voluntary liquidation, which was defendant in an action pending at the date of liquidation, upon the demand of the plaintiff as to his intentions, adopted the defence, and refused to admit the plaintiff's claim. The company had judgment given against it with costs.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to have these costs paid out of the assets of the company, and was not obliged to add them to his claim for proof in the winding up.

Summons.

This was a summons on the winding up of the above company asking that the costs of an action against the company continued after the commencement of the winding up might be paid out of the assets of the company.

In February, 1904, the applicant, Louis Charlier, brought an action against the company for damages for breach of contract, extending over a considerable time, for non-delivery of coal contracted to be supplied by the company and delivered at Port St. Nazaire, in France.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The action proceeded in the Commercial Court.

The company appeared and delivered their defence, and the case was ready for trial on the 17th of May, 1904. The parties, however, not being ready, trial was postponed.

On the 16th of June, 1904, upon an application to the court, a day in July was fixed for the trial.

In the meantime, on the 17th of June, 1904, the company passed a resolution to wind up voluntarily, and the respondent to the summons was appointed liquidator.

On the 22nd of June the solicitors of the applicant wrote to the solicitor of the liquidator as follows: "In view of the resolution for voluntary winding up of the above company, we shall be glad if you will write us definitely stating whether your client, the liquidator, is prepared to admit the claim of our client, M. Charlier, in respect of the breach of contract for which the action is now proceeding, at the amount claimed, or at any smaller amount, or whether your client proposes, as we understood at our interview with you that he does, to dispute the claim altogether. We should, however, like to have it definitely put in writing whatever course is proposed to be adopted."

A similar letter was also sent to the liquidator. The solicitor to the liquidator on the following day replied as follows: "In reply to your letter of yesterday's date, as I informed you at the interview, the liquidator cannot admit the claim of your client in the action."

The action consequently went to trial, and was heard in July, 1904, and in August judgment was given for the plaintiff for £750 and for a certain proportion of costs.

The plaintiff's costs of action were taxed, and after certain agreed costs of the defendant had been deducted, amounted to £543 11s.

The company not being solvent, the applicant took out the present summons against the liquidator asking for an order that the liquidator should pay the £543 11s. out of the assets of the company to the applicant.

E. Todd, for the applicant.—The liquidator was entitled to proceed with the defence of the action under the Companies Act, 1862, s. 133, sub-section 7, without the sanction of the court. He did so, and adopted the defence on behalf of the creditors of the company. He must be treated in the same way as a liquidator in a compulsory winding up who obtains the leave of the court to defend, and must consequently pay the costs of the action out of the assets of the company: Bailey and Leetham's case, 17 W. R. 1079, L. R. 8 Eq. 94; In re London Drapery Stores, 47 W. R. 118, [1898] 2 Ch. 684; Boynton v. Boynton, 27 W. R. 825, L. R. 4 A. C. 733.

Hon. J. Mansfield, for the liquidator.—The practice of the court is that in cases such as this the costs given against the company shall be added to the debt and proved for in the liquidation: In re Poole Firebrick and Blue Clay Co., 22 W. R. 247, L. R. 17 Eq. 268; In re Thurso New Gas Co., 38 W. R. 156, 42 Ch. D. 486; In re Snyder Dynamite Projectile Co., (1893) W. N. 37, 41 W. R. Dig. 36. In all the cases cited on the other side, except In re London Drapery Stores, the action the costs of which were paid out of the assets was brought after the winding up. The claim of the applicant depends upon the trial not having taken place before the winding up. This was a mere accident, and ought not to give the plaintiff rights he would not otherwise have had.

BUCKLEY, J.—The cases cited to me are not perhaps easily reconcilable, but the principle which seems to underlie all of them is that when there is a winding up of a company—whether the liquidation be compulsory or voluntary—all claims of creditors ought primâ facie to be dealt with in the winding up in accordance with the rules applicable to the distribution of the assets, and that the costs ought also to be dealt with there; but that if an action is pending to which the company is a party then, if the company which is in liquidation by its liquidator determines to prosecute or defend the proceedings for the estate, the estate must be treated as the party litigant, and must in case of failure bear the costs. In other words, the other creditors, for whose benefit the action is defended, must pay the costs. The question here is: Did this liquidator adopt the proceedings on behalf of the estate and fail? If he did, the estate must pay the costs. The present case falls to be decided—as many cases do—on its own particular circumstances. The effect of the correspondence between the parties is that the plaintiff says: "I have an action against your company for damages. You are its liquidator. Do you propose to admit my claim for any, and what, amount?"; and the liquidator replies, "I do not admit your claim at all." The liquidator adopted the defence in the action, and elected that it should go on. The action went on, and the plaintiff succeeded in obtaining judgment for damages and costs. The proper course for the liquidator to pursue when he got the plaintiff's letter was to apply, as he could have done, to have the action stayed; and very likely the judge would have taken the view that the action ought to proceed, and would have let it go on on the terms that the plaintiff, if he succeeded, should add his costs to the amount he succeeded in recovering judgment for. But the liquidator, instead of taking this course, resisted the claim altogether and adopted the defence on behalf of the estate, and it seems to me that the other creditors will have to bear the costs—in the sense that the costs must be paid out of the company's assets. As to Bailey and Leetham's case and other cases which have been cited to me, there is no real difficulty. When the voluntary liquidator, or the liquidator in a compulsory winding up, comes to the court for leave to bring or to defend an action by or against the company, and obtains this leave, the judge in effect pledges the assets of the company for the costs of the action which he authorizes the liquidator to bring or to adopt. In Bailey and Leetham's case leave was given to the liquidator to defend an action brought against the company, and when the company lost the action James, V.C., as he then was, ordered the costs in full to be paid out of the company's assets. The principle of that case applies here. This liquidator was not bound to go to the court for leave, although he might have done so, but he elected to defend the action and adopted the defence, and the costs in full must come out of the assets. I was properly pressed by Mr. Mansfield with the case of In re Thurso New Gas Co., but I have two observations to make on that case. One is that the passage relied on at p. 491 of the report (42 Ch. D.) deals with the case of a creditor suing for a debt and shows that there is some difference between suing for a debt and suing for damages; and the other is that there was not in that case, as there was here, a request for the liquidator to admit the claim. Here the reply of the liquidator is such an adoption of the defence to the action as to bring the case within the principle of Boynton v. Boynton, which was adopted by Wright, J., in In re London Drapery Stores. The defence has been adopted with all its consequences, including the liability to pay costs. It has been adopted as a whole, and the liquidator must out of the assets pay in full the costs of the action from its commencement and also the costs of this application.

Solicitors, Church, Rendell, & Co.; Goodacre, Harrison, & Darrell.

Chan. Div. Warrington, J. } Nov. 23, 24.

WRIGLEY v. GILL. (a.)

Mortgage—Mortgagee in possession—Redemption—Rests—Accounts—Sale of part of the mortgaged property—Proviso for capitalization of interest—Right to compound interest.

*Under a proviso in a mortgage for the capitalization of interest in arrear for twenty-one days, on the default of the mortgagor, a mortgagee in possession is not entitled, on the accounts being taken, to charge the mortgagor with compound interest, unless he can show that, after crediting the rents received each half-year, the interest was actually in arrear at the time specified in the proviso. Sale by a mortgagee in possession of part of the mortgaged property does not by itself entitle the mortgagor to an account with a general rest of the rents and profits as well as of the proceeds of sale, as on the date of the receipt of such proceeds.

A summons to vary the master's certificate in a mortgagor's action for redemption had been taken out, and, amongst other matters, two questions in practice on the taking of accounts came up for consideration: (1) Whether a proviso for the capitalization of interest in arrear applied to the case of a mortgagee in possession, on the ground that the receipt of the rents by the mortgagee, though more than sufficient for the purpose, was not punctual payment by the mortgagor; (2) Whether a sale by a mortgagee in possession of part of the mortgaged property entitled the mortgagor to an account with a general rest, as well of the proceeds of the sale as of the rents, as on the date of such sale.

The material facts and documents were as follow:

By a mortgage of the 22nd of October, 1887, certain leasehold properties were sub-demised by the plaintiff to a building society to secure £1,800.

On the 8th of October, 1890, and the 4th of July, 1892, further charges for £120 and £60 respectively were given by the plaintiff to the building society on the same security.

On the 13th of March, 1893, by a second mortgage, plaintiff mortgaged the equity of redemption of these properties to secure £200 to the defendant Ann Gill. The mortgagor covenanted to pay the mortgagee interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum. The deed also contained the following proviso:

"Provided also, and it is hereby agreed that if and so often as any interest due under the covenant hereinbefore contained or this present provision shall be in arrear for twenty-one days after the day hereby appointed for payment thereof, such interest shall be treated as an accession to the capital moneys hereby secured as on the day on which the same ought to have been paid, and shall thenceforth bear interest payable at the rate and on the days aforesaid, and this security shall extend to such capitalized interest in all respects."

On the 29th of May, 1894, half-a-year's interest on this second mortgage being over two months in arrear, the defendant entered into possession of the mortgaged properties.

On the 16th of June, 1894, the plaintiff paid the interest then due to the defendant, but the latter still remained in possession.

On the 11th of September, 1894, the defendant took a transfer from the building society of the mortgage of the 22nd of October, 1887, and the two further charges.

On the 24th of November, 1899, the defendant sold a portion of the mortgaged properties for £250 under the power of sale in the mortgage.

On the 20th of September, 1900, the present action was commenced, the plaintiff claiming redemption of the mortgaged properties, with the usual accounts.

The master, by his certificate of the 29th of July, 1904, certified that there was due to the defendant from the plaintiff under the second mortgage of the 13th of March, 1893, the sum of £200 for principal, and £158 13s. 1d. for compound interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the 13th of March, 1894, to the date of the certificate. That there was due on the first mortgage and further charges £1,299 8s. 1d. for principal, and £642 1s. for simple interest thereon at 5 per cent. from the 11th September, 1894, to date of certificate. From these amounts he set off the £250 proceeds of sale thereinafter referred to, and also certified the amount of the rents and profits received by the defendant, and that a part of the property had been sold by the defendon the 24th of November, 1899, for £250, and that this sum had been applied by the defendant in reduction of the principal and interest due under the said mortgage securities.

The plaintiff took out a summons to vary the master's certificate in the following particulars:

(1) "By declaring that no interest having been due under the mortgages mentioned in the said certificate to the defendant at the date when possession of the mortgaged premises was taken by the defendant, only simple interest at the rate of 6 per cent. is payable upon the mortgage dated the 13th of March, 1893."

(2) "By directing that a rest be taken on the 24th of November, 1899, upon the sale by the defendant of a portion of mortgaged premises, and that upon taking such rest the defendant bring into the account all sums received by her in respect of the rents and profits of the said premises up to that date."

(6) "That the account be directed to be taken with annual rests, upon the ground that the defendant before action brought set up an unfounded claim to the property, and denied the plaintiff's character as mortgagor, and the rents have materially exceeded the expenditure, especially since the plaintiff applied for an account which was refused."

Peterson, for the plaintiff.

Rowden, K.C., and Austen-Cartmell, for the defendant.

WARRINGTON, J., in a lengthy judgment, said: The first point raised by the summons to vary is whether on the defendant's second mortgage of the 13th of March, 1893, interest ought to be computed as simple or compound interest. The plaintiff says it ought to be simple interest only, and the defendant says that the master was right in computing it as compound interest. This question depends upon the effect to be given in the events which have happened to the proviso for capitalization of interest in this deed of March, 1893. It appears at first sight, and with sufficient certainty to justify me in assuming this fact for the purposes of this judgment, that the rents received by the defendant were sufficient to make up the half-yearly payment of interest, at any rate in some half-years. In that state of things, What is the rule which I am to apply? In the first place, in this case I am dealing with a provision in a mortgage which imposes a special and peculiar liability upon the mortgagor, and it is for the mortgagee, therefore, to make out that the event has happened on which that provision takes effect so as to entitle him to the special and peculiar advantage which it gives him. What the mortgagee has to show affirmatively is that in each half-year, or the particular half-year in which he says he ought to be allowed interest on interest, the interest was in arrear for more than twenty-one days.

---

* See also Ainsworth v. Wilding, ante, p. 282.

(a.) Reported by PERCY H. WINFIELD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This also is to be noticed, that by taking possession the mortgagee himself takes the rents, to which presumably the mortgagor would look as providing the fund out of which he would pay the interest on the mortgage, and under these circumstances, if I am unfettered by authority, I should come to the conclusion that where, primâ facie at all events, the rents are enough to keep down the interest, in that case the mortgagee has not made out the affirmative case which he has to make out, that the interest is in arrear.

How far am I bound by authority? There have been three cases referred to: (1) The Union Bank of London v. Ingram, 29 W. R. 209, 16 Ch. D. 53. In that case, unlike the present, it was the mortgagor who had to establish affirmatively that the event had happened which entitled him to the advantage secured to him by the provision, and the event which he had to establish affirmatively as having happened was that he had punctually paid the interest. On that the Master of the Rolls held that, inasmuch as he had paid no interest at all, but the mortgagee had been receiving the rents which, when the accounts were taken, were applicable not only to interest but also to principal, it could not be said that the mortgagor had paid the interest within the forty days contained in the provision, and accordingly he had not made out his case to be entitled to the privilege given him by the mortgage deed. (2) Bright v. Campbell, 37 W. R. 745, 41 Ch. D. 388, which was really the same case as the Union Bank of London v. Ingram. (3) Cockburn v. Edwards, 29 W. R. 136, 18 Ch. D. 449. This case gives me rather more trouble. It was shortly as follows: There was a mortgage taken by a solicitor from his own client in which he had inserted a power of sale which did not contain the usual restrictions on the exercise of the power, that it should not be exercised unless the interest was in arrear. The mortgagee had taken possession and had been receiving the rents, and a question arose whether, assuming that the mortgagee had inserted a power of sale with a proper restriction, whether even on that assumption the power of sale had arisen, and accordingly the question arose, Was the interest in arrear? The Master of the Rolls held that the interest was in arrear, because if the clause had contained that provision the interest must be treated as in arrear, inasmuch as the receipt of the rents was not sufficient to discharge the interest. What he says is this, after referring to the omission of the clause and saying it ought to have been inserted: "The sale, then, was improper unless there was interest three months in arrear; and I think there is great weight in the argument for the respondent, that it was improper, whether there was interest in arrear or not, for that the client had a right to be informed what the terms were upon which the estate could be sold, and that the absence of such information made the sale improper. But was there any interest in arrear? It has been argued that a mortgagee in possession, if he receives rents to an amount more than sufficient to pay the interest, must be taken to have been paid his interest. I cannot accede to that argument. A mortgagee in possession first deducts expenses, and then what remains goes against principal and interest; but till an account is taken there is no set-off, there is no appropriation of the rents. But the receipt of rents by the mortgagee is not a payment by the mortgagor, or by anyone on his behalf. The mortgagee receives rents which are his own, subject, of course, to the right of redemption; he is not receiving interest or principal, but receiving the rents of property which belongs to him subject to the right of the mortgagor to redeem it." The result was that he treated the interest as in arrear notwithstanding the receipt of rents. The other two learned judges deal with the point in a different way. Brett, L.J., holds that the interest was not in arrear, that the rents had been appropriated to the interest, and that it had been paid. Cotton, L.J., said: "The accounts show that there was not any interest in arrear for three months when the sale was effected." [His lordship, after reading the above judgment, said:] I have read those two judgments because it is quite clear on Cotton, L.J.'s, judgment that he did not accept the dictum of the Master of the Rolls in his judgment, but, on the contrary, said he was not prepared to decide that that was the law, and Brett, L.J., though not so emphatic as Cotton, L.J., was obviously not prepared at the moment to follow what the Master of the Rolls had said.

The result is, I think, that in dealing, as I have to deal here, with a provision in which it is for the mortgagee to show that an event has happened which entitles him to this special peculiar privilege of compound interest, I am entitled to say that I am not fettered by authority, and can give effect to my own opinion, which is, that in a case like the present the mortgagee has not shown that the interest is in arrear so as to entitle him to claim compound interest on this security. The result is that, in reference to that second mortgage of the 13th of March, 1893, I think the interest ought to have been computed as simple interest at 6 per cent., and not as compound interest, and to this extent the certificate must be varied.

The second objection taken to this certificate raises a very important point of practice. It is this: A mortgagee in possession sells a part of the mortgage property. The judgment directs the ordinary account, an account of the money due on the security, an inquiry as to the proceeds of sale, and an account of the rents and profits, with the usual direction to set off against what shall be found due on the first account the amount found due on the rents and profits account. Now, I have ascertained from a very experienced master—[one of the Chancery masters had been sent for and consulted as to the usual practice in chambers in taking accounts of this kind]—and I think it is substantially admitted, that under a judgment in this form the ordinary course of practice in chambers is this: The first account is treated as separate from the account of rents and profits. If money is received from an exercise of the power of sale, that money is credited to the mortgagor under the first account at the date at which it is received, but unless rests have been directed in the judgment the account of rents and profits, following the usual rule, goes on without rests. That is ordinarily the common practice in chambers under the usual mortgagee's account, but the argument before me here really is that, having regard to the reservation in the judgment of the 30th of July, 1901, in the terms which I have already read, namely, that the direction to set off what is found due on the account of rents and profits is to be "without prejudice to any question upon further consideration as to rests," I am now to deal with this case as if I had at the hearing to determine whether rests ought so be ordered or not. The ordinary rule is admitted that in the absence of special circumstances the account against a mortgagee in possession is not directed with rests—that is to say, the account of the rents and profits runs on from beginning to end without reference to the question whether he has at any particular time had in his hands more than sufficient to pay the interest or not, the reason being that a mortgagee is not bound to accept payment by dribblets, but is entitled to have the account taken as a whole and not to be treated as repaid until that account has been so taken. It is said there are certain exceptions. One of those is where the mortgagee has himself claimed the property—that is to say, has insisted that the mortgagor is not entitled to redeem. So far as I can make out, the only principle upon which an exception is made in that case is that it is by way of punishment to the mortgagee; there can be nothing else, because his receipts have been the same whether he has been insisting upon his title to the property or not. I think it is merely a means whereby the court has penalized the mortgagee in order to show dissatisfaction with the case he has set up. That is one exception, and it is sought to bring the present case within that.

Now, it is quite true that the defendant, the mortgagee, did originally say that the property had been sold; but when the case came on for trial, in fact when the defence was put in, that part of the case was abandoned, and, in my judgment, where that is so, I am not in a position to say I am bound to impose that penalty upon the mortgagee which has in some cases been imposed where he has insisted on his ownership of the property. I think in all the cases cited he had insisted on that till the trial, and then the court imposed that penalty upon him. It was suggested that there is another exception where the excess of the rents and profits over the interest is great and notorious. The only case which supports that contention is the case of Thompson v. Hudson, 18 W. R. 1081, L. R. 10 Eq. 497. In reality that was not a case of rests at all. What happened in that case was that it appeared when the accounts came to be taken that at a certain date in June, 1861, the mortgagees, having exercised the power of sale, were found to have in their hands a sum, £20,673 or thereabouts, more than what was due to them for interest and costs. Sir John Romilly, M.R., having analyzed the accounts at that date, and finding as a fact that there was that large excess at that moment of receipts over expenditure, took what I think I am bound to say was an exceptional course, and there I am only speaking on the authority of Nelson v. Booth, 6 W. R. 845, (1858) 3 De G. & J. 119, of drawing a line at that date on seeing that there was a sum of £20,673 in the hands of the mortgagees which they ought either to have applied in discharge of the principal, or have paid over to the mortgagor. Now, am I at liberty in this case to take that view? I have looked at the accounts to form an opinion, so far as it is possible to do so, and I cannot find on an inspection of the accounts that on the 24th of November, 1899, the receipt of rents, having regard to the money expended for repairs, had more than discharged the interest due under the mortgage; on the contrary, so far as I can see, again only from such inspection as I am able to make here in court, they were not quite sufficient for that purpose at that time; at all events, there is no excess so great and so notorious that if the matter were now before me on motion for judgment or notice of trial I should, in my opinion, have been justified by the authorities on this point in regarding the case as so exceptional as to direct rests; and without direction rests I do not see how I can do what the plaintiff now asks me to do with regard to this £250. On the accounts as they have been taken the £250 has been dealt with in the ordinary way; that is to say, it has been brought in on the first account, the account of what is due on the mortgage as at the date of its receipt, the account of rents and profits running on without interruption. In my opinion that is right, and in that respect the master's certificate cannot be varied.

Solicitors, Scott, Spalding, Bell, & Co., for William Lees, Oldham; Bower, Cotton, & Bower, for Longbotham & Sons, Halifax.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy and Ridley, JJ.) Oct. 25.

KEENE v. THOMAS. (a.)

Contract—Hire-purchase—Agreement by hirer to keep in repair—Lien—Authority of hirer to give lien to repairer.

By a hire-purchase agreement the plaintiff let a dog-cart; one of the terms of the agreement being that the hirer should keep and preserve the said dog-cart from injury, damage by fire included. During the currency of the agreement the dog-cart was sent by the hirer to the defendant for repair. The defendant claimed a lien on the dog-cart for the cost of the repairs. In an action by the plaintiff to recover the dog-cart or its value,

Held, that the terms of the agreement gave authority to the hirer to create a lien as against the plaintiff in favour of the defendant for the amount of his charges.

Appeal from his Honour Judge Gye, sitting at the Newport County Court.

It appeared that in June, 1903, the plaintiff let a dog-cart, the value of which was stated to be £10, to one Robertson, and by the terms of the agreement the cart was to remain the property of the plaintiff unless and until the sum of £15 should have been paid to the plaintiff in monthly instalments of £1, and if Robertson failed to pay the instalments as and when they became due the plaintiff was to be at liberty to take possession of the cart.

Robertson agreed to pay the instalments and, inter alia, "to keep and preserve the said dog-cart from injury (damage by fire included)."

In November, 1903, Robertson became in arrear with his instalments, and notice to terminate the agreement was sent in May, 1904.

Between November, 1904, and May, 1905, the cart was sent by Robertson to the defendant for certain repairs, and as Robertson failed to pay for these repairs the defendant refused to give up the cart until he had been paid for them. In an action by the plaintiff to recover the dog-cart or its value, the county court judge held that the agreement between the parties contemplated repairs being done, and that there must be taken to be an implied agreement between Robertson and the plaintiff that Robertson should have reasonable repairs done to the cart by a coachbuilder if necessary, and that under the circumstances the defendant had a lien for his charges against the plaintiff, and he gave judgment for the defendant accordingly.

S. H. Emanuel, for the plaintiff.—The county court judge was wrong. No lien can be created except by express authority: Buxton v. Baughan, 6 C. & P. 674.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Grimwood Mears, for the defendant.—The agreement between the plaintiff and Robertson binds him to keep the cart repaired. He is therefore entitled to have reasonable repairs executed by a coachbuilder, to give a lien for the cost of the work so executed: Seager Manufacturing Co. v. London and South-Western Railway, 42 W. R. 774, [1894] 1 Q. B. 833.

S. H. Emanuel replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—This case raises an important point, and one on which there is little direct authority, but, in my opinion, the county court judge has come to a right conclusion.

The question which we have to decide is whether there was authority from the plaintiff to the defendant to make the bargain he did with the repairer. Now there is no doubt that under this hire-purchase agreement Robertson was to keep the dog-cart in repair, and that, in my opinion, implies an authority on the plaintiff's behalf to get the trap repaired if it needed repair, as it cannot be contended that Robertson was bound to do the work with his own hands. The case of Buxton v. Baughan is not in favour of the plaintiff. The facts there were not the same. In that case Alderson, B., said: "If you trust your goods into a man's possession, and he makes a bargain about them without your authority, you are not bound by that bargain, and may reclaim the goods. A man has no right to keep my property and charge for the standing of it unless there was a previous bargain between him and me, or between him and some agent authorized by me"; and he held on the facts in that case, there was no such authority. The principle laid down by Collins, J., in the case of Seager Manufacturing Co. v. London and South-Western Railway Co. goes a long way to support the proposition that the hirer is entitled to use the chattel for all reasonable purposes; and in my opinion in this case, the hirer of the chattel having undertaken to keep it in repair, and having at any rate a duty to take care of it, and having employed the defendant to repair it, has created a lien in respect of the proper cost of the repairs, not only against himself, but also against the plaintiff, the owner of the trap.

The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

KENNEDY and RIDLEY, JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for appellant, P. J. Nicholls, for Hallett & Martin, Southampton.

Solicitors for respondent, Speechly, Mumford, Rodgers, & Craig, for Lamport, Bassitt, & Hiscock, Newport, Isle of Wight.

Privy Council.

(From the Supreme Court of New South Wales.)

Dec. 19.

COMMONWEALTH PORTLAND CEMENT CO. v. WEBER, LOHMANN, & CO. (a.)

Principal and agent—Delivery of goods—Duty at custom house—Delay—Obligation undertaken.

Apart from express provision, it is no part of a shipping agent's duty to expedite the passing of goods through the custom house so as to escape a contemplated duty, where such duty is equally in the knowledge of his principal, and no wilful misconduct is imputed to the agent.

Appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

The facts are given in their lordships' judgment.

Cohen, K.C., and Tyrrell T. Payne, for the appellants.

Charles C. Scott (Lawson Walton, K.C., with him), for the respondents.

The judgment of their lordships (Lords MACNAGHTEN and LINDLEY, Sir FORD NORTH, and Sir ARTHUR WILSON) was delivered by Lord LINDLEY.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of New South Wales affirming a judgment of non-suit in an action brought by the appellants against the respondents.

The appellants are manufacturers of cement. Their head office and works are at Portland, New South Wales. They had ordered machinery from abroad, and it was to arrive at Sydney in a steamer named The Karlsruhe, consigned to the care of the respondents, who were shipping agents there. The ship arrived on Sunday, the 6th of October, 1901. Monday was a holiday. The ship was reported early on Tuesday, the 8th of October. When the ship arrived no customs duty was payable in New South Wales on machinery imported from abroad; but like other duty-free goods it had to be entered and cleared at the Customs House at Sydney, and (as will be more fully explained presently) the respondents had undertaken to pass it through the customs house for the appellants.

By the New South Wales Customs Regulation Act, 1879 (42 Vict. No. 19), twenty-four hours from the date of the report of the ship were allowed for entering and clearing duty-free goods, Sundays and holidays not being counted.

Before twenty-four hours for entering and clearing the machinery had expired, and before it had been cleared—viz., in the afternoon of the 8th of October, the machinery became liable to a heavy duty of £900 odd, and it could not be afterwards cleared or landed until this duty was paid.

It was proved at the trial that there was ample time to enter and clear the machinery on the 8th of October before the duty became chargeable. It was also proved that on the morning of the 8th of October the defendants did enter and clear some goods of their own brought by The Karlsruhe. It was further proved that it had been for some time common knowledge in Sydney that the Government of New South Wales was contemplating the publication of an ordinance bringing into operation in New South Wales the Customs Act, 1901, passed on the 3rd of October by the Commonwealth Parliament of Australia. Such an ordinance was, in fact, published in the afternoon of the 8th of October.

These being the admitted facts, the question arises whether the appellants who had to pay the duty to get their goods landed are entitled to recover the amount from the respondents as damages for their negligence. This question really turns on the duty of the respondents; and this depends on their contract with the appellants. The contract is to be found in a series of letters passing between the two companies, commencing on the 24th of April and ending on the 3rd of October, 1901. The short effect of these letters was that the respondents undertook to lighter and load on railway trucks the machinery of the appellants brought by The Karlsruhe for certain fixed charges, and they also agreed to pass the machinery though the customs without extra charge. It is clear from the correspondence that the payment of customs duties was not contemplated by either party. To enter and clear duty-free goods involved no difficulty or trouble worth mentioning to the respondents, who were to receive and lighter them; and it was very natural that the respondents should further undertake to pass them through the customs house without extra charge.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The appellants contend that the obligation contracted by the respondents included the duty to exercise reasonable diligence in entering and clearing the goods; and that this involved the duty to protect the appellants' goods from loss which was known to the respondents to be imminent or at least probable. The appellants further contend that it should have been left to the jury to say whether such diligence was exercised or not.

The respondents, on the other hand, contend that all they agreed to do was to enter and clear the goods in the usual way in the time fixed by the Customs Regulations. They contend that the appellants are seeking to throw upon them a duty which they never undertook and which was never contemplated by either party.

There is no doubt that all agents are bound to take reasonable care in doing what they have undertaken to do; but it appears to their lordships that the appellants cannot succeed unless they can show that it was the duty of the respondents to attend to taxation by the government and to take reasonable care to protect the appellants' goods from taxation. Their lordships are of opinion that the contract between the parties did not impose upon the respondents any legal obligation to pay attention to what the government might or might not do as regards altering customs duties; and that there was no evidence to go to the jury of any breach by the respondents of any duty which they owed to their employers.

This was the view taken by the judge who tried the case and by the Supreme Court. In coming to the same conclusion, their lordships have assumed that all the questions put, and successfully objected to, had been answered favourably to the appellants. No wilful misconduct was imputed to the respondents. The appellants knew quite as well as the respondents that the imposition of customs duties was to be feared, and they knew that the goods were arriving; but the appellants did not request the respondents to expedite the clearing under the peculiar circumstances which had arisen, and which had never been contemplated by either party.

Under these circumstances their lordships are of opinion that the non-suit was correct, and that there was no misdirection or improper rejection of evidence. The case was one in which a jury would be very likely to go wrong by reason of the fact that the respondents cleared their own goods early on the 8th of October, and that the respondents might have cleared the appellants' goods at the same time. But what they might have done and what they legally were bound to do are two very different questions.

The lordships will humbly advise his Majesty to dismiss this appeal, and the appellants must pay the costs.

Solicitors, Paines, Blyth, & Huxtable; Snow, Fox, & Higginson.

Court of Appeal.

From P. D. & Ad. Div.
Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ. } Dec. 10, 20, 21.

TOWNSEND v. MOORE. (a.)

Will—Codicils of even date—Inconsistency—Simultaneous execution—Admissibility to probate—Function of a Court of Probate—Limit of parol evidence—Person entitled to administration.

Where a testator leaves two varying testamentary documents of even date or undated, and it is not known which was executed last, both are primâ facie admissible to probate. In such a case a Court of Probate must act as a court of construction so far as to ascertain whether the documents can stand together. If one of them purports wholly to revoke the other, or they be wholly irreconcilable, then neither document can be proved; but if they can be reconciled in part, they should both be admitted to probate and their effect afterwards determined by a court of construction.

Testatrix, by will in 1863, executed in favour of her husband a power of appointment in the marriage settlement, and bequeathed to him all her property, appointing him sole executor. On the 6th of October, 1891, she executed two holograph codicils, each commencing "Whereas I have bequeathed all my property to my husband, now in case I survive him I hereby appoint A. and B. to be executors. At the decease of my husband and myself . . . " here followed in each codicil a number of legacies and a gift of residue. These provisions were in great measure identical in both documents, but there were some important differences, and there was no evidence as to which had been executed last. Testatrix died in 1892, and her husband in 1902 without having obtained probate. On the residuary legatees seeking to establish the will and codicils,

Held, that the codicils were not conditional on the wife surviving her husband, and that the condition only affected the appointment of executors.

Held, further (dissentiente Cozens-Hardy, L.J.), that the codicils were not so inconsistent as to be incapable of standing together, and that both must be admitted to probate as simultaneously executed, and their effect afterwards determined by a court of construction.

And held, that since the husband, as executor, had not obtained probate, though he had intermeddled in the estate, his executor was not entitled to administration.

Lemage v. Goodban, L. R. 1 P. & D. 57, 14 W. R. Prob. Dig. 21; In the Goods of Petchell, 22 W. R. 353, L. R. 3 P. & D. 153; and Jenner v. Ffinch, 28 W. R. 520, 5 P. D. 106, approved and followed.

Appeal from a judgment of Barnes, J., refusing to grant probate of two testamentary papers of even date purporting to have been executed in the presence of two witnesses by Mrs. Emily Donald as codicils to her will.

Testatrix was the wife of Captain Thomas Donald, to whom she was married in 1862. Both husband and wife brought money into the settlement, the wife's fund being nearly £26,000. The settlement was in the usual form, giving to the husband a life interest in the wife's fund after her death, subject to which there was a power to the wife to appoint in default of children. The only child of the marriage died at birth. By her will dated in 1863, Mrs. Donald exercised her power of appointment in favour of her husband absolutely, and also bequeathed to him her other property (which amounted only to about £400), and appointed him sole executor; but by a codicil in 1886 she made a disposition of £3,000 (payable at her husband's death) in favour of her sister, Mrs. Bigge.

(a.) Reported by R. HILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

who, after testatrix's death, by deed assigned that sum to Captain Donald.

The codicils now in question both bore date the 6th of October, 1891. They were in the handwriting of the testatrix, and were understood to have been prepared, without legal advice, at the instigation of Captain Donald, who was much given to making testamentary dispositions for himself and other people. They contained many erasures, interlineations, and other alterations, and, though in some respects identical, they differed in several important particulars. There was no indication as to which had been executed first, but for the purpose of this action they had been marked respectively A and B, by which letters they will be referred to in this report. The following were the contents of the documents as altered, the variations between A and B being given in separate columns. The punctuation, being doubtful, has been omitted, but the capital letters, and also the division of paragraphs where not doubtful, have been retained:

"Whereas I Emily Donald have bequeathed all my Property to my husband Thomas Donald now in case I survive him I hereby appoint the following persons to be executors Capt Reginald Fullerton R N A D C and the Revd William Norman Ramsay

"At the decease of my husband and myself £3000 to my sister Mrs Arthur Bigge

A	B
"and £2000 to my sister Miss Julia Townsend Payable at my death with my husband's consent or optional the following legacies £300 each to my sisters Miss Julia Townsend and Mrs Arthur Bigge in addition to the above £300" [? £3000]	"but not in addition to the £3000 already bequeathed to the said Mrs A Bigge"

[In both documents there followed thirteen legacies aggregating £1,950 and practically identical. The documents continued:]

"Should my husband sell the Reversion to the Marriage C ntract Trust property then I leave to his Executors the sum of Five Thousand Pounds

A	B
"in Trust for his Estate to make up for the loss and to go to his niece Miss F G C E Somerset	"to be paid to them for his Estate to make up for the loss" [here several words had been obliterated]

"The rest of my Property at my husband's decease

"The rest of my Property to be divided in equal shares between my two sisters Miss Julia Townsend and Mrs Arthur Bigge and to the survivor for life."

[Then followed an ul imate gift of residue, which was identical in both documents, except that in A there was an uncertainty as to the shares into which it was to be divided. The documents respectively ended as follows:]

A	B
"This is subject to any Legacies I may after this bequeath Also as to legacies of Jewels Furniture Pictures China &c mentioned in enclosed list"	"This is subject to any Legacies I may after this bequeath. Also as to Legacies of Jewels Furniture Pictures &c mentioned in enclosed Lists signed by me In addition to above I bequeath to my two sisters Mrs A Bigge and Miss Julia Townsend the sum of £300 each payable at my decease"

The testimonium was practically the same in each, and expressed the document to have been signed by the testatrix in the presence of two witnesses present at the same time; these witnesses were the same in both cases. The lists of chattels referred to were never found. There was a note in B following the testimonium. It was in testatrix's handwriting and purported to explain a point in her will, but being enigmatical and unsigned it is here omitted.

The testatrix died in 1892, and Captain Donald made several efforts to prove her will, with the codicil of 1886, and the document A, which had been found with her papers. Difficulties, however, arose in consequence of an alteration occurring in the earlier codicil (which had also been mutilated) and the impossibility of obtaining evidence regarding it, neither of the witnesses to its execution being producible. The document B was in Captain Donald's own custody, but he appeared to have regarded it as a draft or duplicate of A, and never submitted it to probate. He died in 1902 without having obtained probate of any of his wife's testamentary papers.

The present was a friendly action brought by the residuary legatees under codicils A and B, who sought to establish the will and all three codicils. The defendant was the executor of Captain Donald's will, and he opposed probate of A and B on the ground that they were conditional on the testatrix surviving her husband. About seventy persons who were interested in Captain Donald's estate had had notice of the proceedings, and two of them intervened, making the same defence as the executor, and further pleading that the said two documents were not executed in accordance with the Wills Act, that one was a rough draft of the other, and that only one was intended to be operative, or in the alternative that one revoked the other. One of the attesting witnesses was dead, but the other, formerly butler to Captain Donald, was called at the trial. He remembered witnessing the execution of A, but not of B, nor could he recollect that more than one document was produced or executed on the 6th of October, 1891. He, however, identified the signatures of Mrs. Donald and of both witnesses on each of the documents, and also swore to the majority of the alterations in A as having been made before it was executed.

J. Eldon Bankes, K.C., and W. T. Barnard, for the plaintiffs.

Priestley, K.C. (Willock with him), for the defendant, pointed out that the effect of codicils A and B, containing as they did a gift of residue, would be to take away from the husband all interest in his wife's property except his life interest under the settlement, and that this was clearly contrary to the intention of the testatrix as expressed in her will, which she had impliedly confirmed by the recitals in codicils A and B. If the condition of surviving her husband was intended, as the plaintiffs maintained, to govern only the appointment of executors in her husband's place, the part of the will that would have been recited was that appointing him executor, and not that bequeathing him all her property. The documents were conditional on an event which had not happened, and consequently ought not to be admitted to probate. Besides, they were too inconsistent to stand together, and being of even date it could not be ascertained which revoked the other, therefore neither ought to be proved.

He cited Williams on Executors (9th ed.), p. 144; Phipps v. Lord Anglesea, 7 Bro. P. C. 443.

Beddall, for the interveners, argued that the court should refuse probate of a document appearing on the face of it to be conditional and would construe its provisions for the purpose of ascertaining whether they were contingent on the happening of some event. A grant of probate was a recognition of the validity of a document, and he was anxious, if the court did grant probate to one or both of these documents, that it should be made clear the matter was not thereby made res judicata so as to preclude the parties from raising the question of construction before another court having the administration of the estate.

He cited Edmondson v. Edmondson, 17 Times L. R. 397; In the Goods of Porter, 18 W. R. 231, L. R. 2 P. & D. 22; Parsons v. Lanoe, 1 Ves. sen. 189, Amb. 557, 1 Wils. 243; Sinclair v. Hone, 6 Ves. 607; In the Goods of Tharp, 26 W. R. 770, 3 P. D. 76, 81 (followed in In re Lambert's Estate, 39 Ch. D. 626).

Eldon Bankes, K.C., and W. T. Barnard, in reply, argued that the documents were sufficiently consistent to be both admitted to probate, it being left to the proper court to decide on their construction. As to their being conditional, the wording of A at least showed that the dispositions of property were to take effect if the testatrix's husband survived her.

BARNES, J., held that the documents were conditional on the testatrix surviving her husband, an event which had not happened, and were therefore not entitled to probate.

The plaintiffs appealed.

The same attesting witness was called, and gave evidence similar to that given in the court below. He also said he had never witnessed testamentary papers for Mrs. Donald except on the 6th of October, 1891, and described an alteration in a document he then witnessed as having been pointed out to him before execution. This alteration was found to exist in B but not in A.

Captain Donald's solicitor was also called and said that his client, when first sending him codicil A after testatrix's death, stated that he considered it valueless, his wife having to his certain knowledge only intended it to take effect in case she survived him.

J. Eldon Bankes, K.C., and W. T. Barnard, for the plaintiffs.—The testatrix clearly contemplated her husband surviving her, for in A she gives legacies payable at her death with his consent. Moreover, the rest of her property is made divisible at his decease, which could not mean in her lifetime. She in fact disposed of her property subject to his life interest. In every operative clause she refers to his death. The proper course is to admit both papers to probate, and their construction can be afterwards determined in the proper court, such provisions as are inconsistent being disregarded.

They referred to Phipps v. Lord Anglesea.

Bargrave Deane, K.C. (Willock with him), for the defendant, cited Leonard v. Leonard, [1902] P. 243, 51 W. R. Dig. 131; Willock v. Noble, 23 W. R. 809, L. R. 7 H. L. 580.

Beddall, for the interveners, cited In the Goods of Cadge, 16 W. R. 406, L. R. 1 P. & D. 543. [COZENS-HARDY, L.J., pointed out that, being before the Married Women's Property Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 63), s. 3, neither the will nor the codicils would take effect without re-execution in case the testatrix survived her husband.]

W. T. Barnard, in reply.—The codicils were executed as duplicates, or one was only a draft of the other, so the question of one revoking the other does not really arise. The court would give effect to the longer one.

Cur. adv. vult.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In this case the question we have to decide is whether two codicils executed by Mrs. Emily Donald, and bearing date the 6th of October, 1891, ought both or either of them to be admitted to probate. The first point made was that neither ought to be admitted, because when you come to look at the words of the respective codicils you find in each of them that which ought to have induced the court to come to the conclusion that these codicils are conditional and only intended to take effect upon the contingency of Mrs. Donald, the testatrix, surviving her husband. The words which are said to support this contention are at the beginning of the codicils and are identical in both: "Whereas I, Emily Donald, have bequeathed all my property to my husband, Thomas Donald, now in case I survive him I hereby appoint the following persons to be executors, Captain Reginald Fullerton and the Rev. William Norman Ramsay." It is said that that condition is a condition which does not apply only to the appointment, in a certain contingency, of new executors other than the executor (the husband) appointed under the will, but that the condition overrides the whole of the codicils—that is, that they are only intended to take effect in the contingency of the testatrix surviving her husband. In my judgment that contention ought not to prevail. I think that if one reads through these codicils and takes note of their provisions as to what is to happen in case of the death of the husband, and looks also at the words which appear in the second paragraph, "at the decease of my husband and myself," it is impossible to come to the conclusion that the condition at the head of these documents was a condition intended to override the whole of the dispositions. I am of opinion therefore that they are not conditional or contingent codicils intended to take effect in case of the wife surviving the husband.

Having disposed of that part of the case, I now propose to deal with the other point which is made. It is said that these two codicils, bearing the same date, cannot either of them be admitted to probate having regard to the frame of the codicils themselves respectively, and also having regard to the fact that they bear the same date, and that there is nothing upon the face of them which enables one to say that one of them has priority in time over the other. I am of opinion that this contention also fails, and that both these codicils ought to be admitted to probate.

The facts proved are, in my opinion, the following: Mrs. Donald made a will, dated the 22nd of June, 1863, which was duly executed. She also made a codicil dated the 18th of January, 1886, which purports to be duly executed, and can, I understand, be now proved to have been duly executed. She also made and duly executed two codicils dated the 6th of October, 1891. These two codicils were witnessed by two witnesses, Prosper Greenwood and Alfred Vickers. Alfred Vickers, who at the time of the execution of these codicils was the butler in the service of Captain Donald, the husband of the testatrix, and of the testatrix, has proved the due execution, by signature, of these two codicils (called in this litigation A and B respectively) by the testatrix. Vickers has no distinct recollection in respect of codicil B, but, recognizing his own signature, he has no doubt that he did witness its execution. He also is certain that there was only that one occasion on which he witnessed any document executed by Mrs. Donald. Moreover, he testifies to the fact that Captain Donald, who was present on the occasion of the execution, called his attention to an alteration in respect of the legacy of £3,000. Inasmuch as there appears to be no alteration in this respect in codicil A, but only in codicil B, I infer that both documents were dealt with on this occasion. Examination of the two codicils, which are both in the handwriting of the testatrix, has led me to the conclusion that they were both written in 1889, and were brought into the room, for the purpose of being executed and witnessed, in the state in which they now are, except as to dates, signature, and attestation. After their execution, codicil A seems to have been placed in an escritoire, whereas codicil B was found, after the death of the testatrix, in a box belonging to Captain Donald, which had been sent from Bournemouth, where he and Mrs. Donald lived, to Brighton, where he lived after her death. I think (but in stating this opinion I am not stating anything which is essential to the judgment which I am going to deliver) that when the two codicils were prepared in 1889 probably codicil B was the corrected draft, and codicil A a later copy based on the draft as corrected, but containing modifications; but be this as it may, I think that the testatrix executed A and B in the belief that they were in substance duplicates, and retained A in her possession, allowing her husband to take possession of B as a duplicate, which, by way of precaution, she executed in conformity with the requirements of the Wills Act.

The question now arises whether either or both of these codicils ought to be admitted to probate. I am of opinion that both ought to be admitted. Primâ facie every document purporting to be testamentary, and signed and witnessed in accordance with the provisions of the Wills Act, ought to be admitted to probate. Where, however, you have more testamentary documents than one, the presumptive admissibility to probate may be displaced, because it may be that there is a sequence in the dates of execution of such documents, which, coupled with the words of the later document, or the inferences to be drawn from such words, leads to the conclusion that the later document was intended as a revocation of the earlier; or it may be that the later document is intended to partially revoke and modify an earlier document; or lastly, it may be that, quite apart from any question of revocation, the court has to deal with documents which are proved to have been executed on the same date and occasion, or which are undated, and as to which it is impossible to affirm that one has any priority in time of execution over the other. In this last case, in my opinion, if the documents are so inconsistent that they cannot stand together, probate becomes impossible, because the presumption of admissibility to probate of testamentary documents executed in accordance with the Wills Act is displaced.

In my judgment the authorities on this point are reasonably clear. In dealing with them I propose first to read a passage which appears on p. 162 of the 7th edition of Williams on Executors (p. 138 of 9th edition), because in its entirety, and in particular in respect of the final clause of it, it has been three times most emphatically affirmed—namely, by Lord Penzance (then Sir J. Wilde) in Lemage v. Goodban, L. R. 1 P. & D. 57, 62, and by Sir J. Hannen in In the Goods of Petchell, 22 W. R. 353, L. R. 3, P. & D. 153, 156, and Jenner v. Ffinch, 28 W. R. 520, 5 P. D. 106. [His lordship read the passage commencing "But the mere fact of making a subsequent testamentary paper" and ending "those parts only where they are inconsistent," and also read (from the reports named below) the first part of the judgment in Lemage v. Goodban, 35 L. J. P. & M. 28, 30, down to the quotation from Williams on Executors; the head-note of In the Goods of Petchell, 43 L. J. P. & M. 22, and the judgment therein, from "Now where there are two wills," on p. 23, to "I am entitled to act in the present case," on p. 24, and from "acting upon the authority" on p. 24 to the end; and the head-note of Jenner v. Ffinch, 42 L. T. 327, and continued:] With regard to the latter case the importance of it (I do not propose to read it at length) is that one gets at what is really the question which the court ought to ask itself in a case where you have two testamentary documents, as one has in this case. Sir James Hannen arrived at the conclusion that you must not in the first instance ask yourself the question, How many testamentary documents did the testatrix intend should constitute her will? but what you have to do is this—look, in the case of documents prior and subsequent in point of date, at the later document, see what are its provisions, and having construed its words, ask yourself the question, aye or no, Did the testatrix intend that the later document should be a revocation of the first, or that the two should be read together? Then he goes on to point out this: That if the second document is ambiguous, then parol evidence of the surrounding circumstances will be admissible in order to enable the court to determine the intention of the second document. But speaking for myself, I should hesitate to say that that dictum as to parol evidence extends to evidence of the intention of the testatrix according to the view of those who were present with the testatrix at the time of the execution of the testamentary document. I think that the principle which is laid down plainly enough by Sir J. Wilde in the first case I have cited—namely, that where there is this question to be solved, as between two documents properly executed in accordance with the Wills Act, as to how far the one affects the other, the Court of Probate must act to that extent and for this purpose as a court of construction—is based upon what I have already mentioned, that if you have a document that purports to be testamentary, and it is executed in accordance with the provisions of the Wills Act, primâ facie that document is one which ought to be admitted to probate. You have to displace that proposition in order to reject such a document, and I think that this principle applies not only to documents as to which there is a sequence of execution, so that you can speak of one as the prior document and the other as the subsequent document, but also when you get undated documents or documents of even date. If the words are looked at which I have read from Williams on Executors, they will be seen to deal not only with the case of prior and subsequent documents, but with undated documents and documents of even date.

That being the case, I think that the court ought now to apply itself to the question whether or not these two documents are so inconsistent that they cannot stand together. I have arrived at the conclusion that they can stand together, and I wish to say, though it is the sort of principle one is reluctant primâ facie to apply, that I think the authorities show that where there are two properly executed documents, and it is submitted that both ought to be admitted to probate, the principle applied by the court in construing those documents is to read the words in such a way as to support the admissibility of both—even though the effect may be to override a construction which is not only a possible construction of one or both, but may even be one that the court would feel bound to adopt were it not overmastered by the consideration that a testator ought not easily to be held to have intended to override a properly executed testamentary document where there are no express words of revocation and where the inference can only be arrived at from construction of its provisions. His lordship discussed the variations in the two documents and observed that the beneficiaries were in the main the same in both—as were also the conditions attached to the various provisions, though not expressed in the same manner. He thought that in A a new sentence began with the words "Payable at my death," but the absence of those words in B did not make it impossible to read the two documents together. He laid stress on the occurrence in both of the phrase "At the decease of my husband and myself." The primâ facie presumption that where two legacies were given to the same person, either in one document or, as here, in two, they were cumulative was, he said, rebutted by the wording and by the fact that the two documents were simultaneously executed—a fact of which the decision in In the Goods of Petchell showed that the court could take notice. The very alteration in the order of some identical bequests was, to his lordship's mind, an indication that the documents were intended to be duplicates and to be read together, and if that were so no difficulty could arise as to the legacies being cumulative. The residuary clauses offered the greatest difficulty, but there was not such inconsistency in them as would, in the case of documents of different dates, have warranted the inference of revocation. The question to be asked, where one document was of later date than another—namely, does it revoke the other?—was not, it was true, the question that had to be asked where the two were simultaneously executed, but in both cases the underlying question was the same, and that question was, can the two be so read as to stand together? His lordship continued as follows:] I have come to the conclusion on the authorities that if on any reasonable construction the documents can stand together it is the duty of a Court of Probate to admit both to probate, and I think, therefore, that this appeal should be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.—From the evidence, I come to the conclusion that these two codicils were duly executed on the same day, and on the same occasion, and practically simultaneously, and that when they were executed they were in the condition in which they now appear—that is to say, with the present erasures and interlineations. That being so, from the circumstances of their execution, and from a consideration of the contents of the documents themselves, I come to the conclusion that the two were intended to be, and must be, read together as if executed simultaneously, and that neither was intended to revoke the other, and that they are to be taken together as containing the expression of the testatrix's testamentary intentions at the time of the execution. That being so, the question as to which, as a matter of accident, happened to be first executed, is immaterial, for in my opinion, no importance was intended to be, or can be, attributed to one document over the other by reason of the order of execution.

That being the position of affairs, the question arises, what, as a matter of law, ought to be done in regard to probate? Now, of course if there are two testamentary documents, and it is to be gathered that one was intended to revoke the other altogether, but it cannot be ascertained which was intended to be the revoked document, then neither can be proved—as, for example, if you find two wills, each purporting to revoke all prior testamentary documents, and it cannot be ascertained which was executed last. But where there are two testamentary documents, and the court is able to gather that one was not intended to wholly revoke the other, but that both were intended to be effective, at any rate to some extent, then I think, on authority and on principle, that the two documents must be admitted to probate, so that effect can be given to them, at any rate so far as circumstances will permit. To what extent that can be done would be left, to a great extent at least, to a court of construction to determine. The authorities which my lord has gone into show, I think, that what I have stated to be the law is the correct view, and I need not further refer to them. I certainly think that those authorities ought to be adhered to, for in such a case as we are considering it would to my mind have been a lamentable result if the court had been obliged to hold that, because some parts of the two documents cannot be given effect to, therefore both documents must be set aside, and neither admitted to probate, or be allowed any validity whatever. In a case such as I have been referring to both documents then should be admitted to probate, and the effect of the two together be determined by a consideration of their contents, and of the circumstances under which they were executed. So far as they can stand together, effect should be given to them. The cases show how far courts of construction have gone in the direction of reconciling documents which they felt it their duty to try and reconcile, and how the courts struggle, if I may use the expression, to see if they cannot reconcile dispositions which on the face of them might possibly appear to be somewhat irreconcilable. But, of course, if, after doing its best, the court finds that there are dispositions perfectly inconsistent, which it is impossible to reconcile or to determine, that one in particular is to have effect at the expense of the other, then effect cannot be given to them so far as concerns those inconsistent dispositions. And in particular if there be two inconsistent dispositions which cannot be reconciled, and the court cannot say which was intended to override the other without knowing in what order the two documents were executed—and that fact cannot be ascertained—then the court would be driven to hold both dispositions invalid.

Now I apply these general considerations to the circumstances of the present case, and, having regard to the findings with which I first started my judgment, I see no difficulty in holding that both these codicils can be admitted to probate, and ought to be admitted. Regarding them as dispositions executed simultaneously, and both intended to take effect, I may say that in the first place I have no doubt myself that the documents cannot be held to be contingent on the wife surviving. I should come to that conclusion even if I looked at the document B alone. But when I look at document A all difficulty to my mind disappears. It is true the codicils commence by a reference to the fact that she, the testatrix, had bequeathed all her property to her husband, and they then go on "now in case I survive him I hereby appoint the following persons to be executors," and she names two persons. In the first place it is to be noticed that grammatically the only effect of her surviving him, the only limitation of the expression of her intentions in case she survives him, refers to the appointment of these two executors. There is nothing grammatically to show that she intended that hypothetical case to extend to the rest of the documents. And when you see the rest of the documents it is to my mind impossible to hold that it is made clear that these documents as a whole were intended to be contingent on the wife surviving.

I will now deal with document A, which goes on: "At the decease of my husband and myself." That in itself is a curious thing if the whole codicil was intended to be contingent on her surviving her husband. It is difficult to see why in such case she should make legacies payable at the decease of both her husband and herself, which would mean payable at the decease of the survivor of the two. But later on I find a provision of a gift to the executors of the husband, and when I look at that it appears to me that I cannot gather that it was not intended to cover a disposition, by the husband, of his reversion after the wife's death, and therefore it was contemplating something to be done by him after her death—though it might also contemplate something done during her lifetime, and then a gift after his death to his executors. But then there follows something which to my mind renders it almost impossible to hold that these documents as a whole were intended to be contingent on the wife surviving. For in A she says "the rest of my property at my husband's decease to be divided in equal shares" in the manner she mentions. She could not have meant her property to be divided in her lifetime. She must have meant what she says—to be divided at her husband's decease, presuming he survived her. At any rate it is impossible to hold, and the onus would be on those who contended it, that these documents are to be treated as contingent.

That being so, as I have said, I see no difficulty in holding that they should be admitted to probate, for certainly the two documents can be reconciled, at any rate in part, and that is sufficient to determine that they should be admitted to probate. But without trespassing on the province of a court of construction, I must say for myself, if it be necessary to go into the point, that I see no difficulty in wholly reconciling the two documents. For example, I will deal shortly with the main features of the two documents about which doubt might otherwise arise. Bearing in mind that the documents are to be treated as being executed simultaneously, I, in the first place, see no difficulty in holding that the pecuniary legacies common to both were intended for one and the same legacy, and are not to be duplicated, though I may point out that, even if this had not been the correct view, it would not have prevented both documents from being admitted to probate, for then the legacies might be held cumulative. Take next the gift of £3,000 to Mrs. Arthur Bigge. Taking the documents together I have no hesitation in saying that the condition in B, that that gift was not to be in addition to the £3,000 already bequeathed to that lady, is to affect the bequest of that £3,000. The legacy of £2,000 to the sister, Miss Julia Townsend, is in document A and not in B. I have no hesitation in reconciling those two. The one in A is not contradicted by anything in B, and therefore takes effect. As to the residue, as my lord has said, I gather they are to be read together as meaning the same thing, and I see no difficulty whatever in holding that the residue was intended to go in thirds, and that the difficulty which might arise if you look at B is wholly removed when you look at both documents together. And I may also say that I see no difficulty in reconciling the times of payment of the residue. They do not conflict, but the time of payment is mentioned in one and not in the other. Those can be reconciled.

Perhaps I have to some extent gone beyond my province and discussed matters which ought, strictly speaking, to be left to a court of construction. I need scarcely say that so far as I have made observations with regard to questions which may properly be said to be questions of construction, I do not wish or intend to bind in any way the court before whom those questions may ultimately come for final consideration and determination. All I say is that in the present case I see no difficulty in holding that the two documents stand, and were intended to stand together, and can stand together, and as such should be admitted to probate as documents executed simultaneously. Therefore I think the appeal should be allowed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—In this case Barnes, J., declined to admit the two documents called A and B to probate on the ground that they were both conditional or contingent testamentary documents intended to operate only in an event which has not happened. I entirely agree with my learned brothers that that view cannot be supported. On the construction of the documents it seems to me reasonably plain that they were not intended to take effect only in that event. If A is the governing document, for reasons which have been pointed out, the conclusion seems to me to be irresistible, and although if B alone is to be looked at there might be more doubt, I think I should arrive at the same conclusion even if I looked at B alone.

That being so, it becomes necessary to consider the second point, which Barnes, J., did not think it necessary to deal with—namely, whether these two documents, A and B, are so inconsistent that they ought to be treated as void, and not to be admitted to probate. Now, on this second point, my learned brothers are clear that both A and B ought to be proved. I feel so much doubt that if the decision of this appeal had rested with me I should desire further time for reflection. But my doubt is of no practical moment, and I will therefore only state, in a very few words, what my difficulties are. To me it is almost incredible that Mrs. Donald intended both these documents to be effective. They are not duplicates; there are very important differences between them. They are not consistent; they contain dispositions of residue which, taken separately, have different meanings. In A the residue is divided into four parts, in B into three parts. I feel the greatest possible doubt in knowing which of these two was intended to be operative. If I had to guess from internal evidence, I should be rather driven to the conclusion that it was document B, and not document A. But then it is said that, according to the evidence of Vickers, they were executed simultaneously, on one occasion, and they ought really to be regarded as one single document, or to be construed as though they had been one single document. Even so, ought not the court of construction to be told by the Court of Probate which part of the single document came first, and which second? We all know that in construing a testamentary document it is very important to know which part comes first, and which comes second. These doubts, which I have very briefly indicated, have not been removed after such consideration as I have been able to devote to this particular case.

Appeal allowed; costs of all parties, as between solicitor and client, to come out of the estate; the two codicils to be admitted to probate as executed simultaneously, it being left to the parties to agree as to the court by which their construction should be decided.

[A discussion took place as to the person to whom administration should be granted, and it was held that, as Captain Donald, the executor named in the will, had not proved (though he had intermeddled), his executor was not entitled. Eventually the grant (with the will and codicils annexed) was made to Admiral Fullerton, one of the residuary legatees named in the codicils.]

Solicitors, Frere, Cholmeley, & Co.; Wilde, Moore, & Wigston; Booth & Smee, for Fitzhugh, Woolley, Baines, & Woolley, Brighton.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) Nov. 16, 17.

JONES v. HUGHES. (a.)

Local Government—Education—School teacher—Dismissal—Notice given before Education Act, 1902, came into force—Expiration of notice after Act came into force—Education Act, 1902 (2 Ed. 7, c. 42), s. 7 (1) (c).

The plaintiff was, in 1899, appointed head master of a national school by the then managers, who were appointed under a trust deed. The appointment was terminable on three months' notice. On the 6th of May, 1904, the then managers gave the plaintiff notice to determine his appointment on the 9th of August. Before that day arrived the Education Act, 1902, had come into operation in the district, and the county council, the local education authority, desired that the plaintiff should continue in office, and insisted that under section 7 (1) (c) of the Education Act, 1902, he could not be dismissed without their consent.

Held, that at the date when the Education Act, 1902, came into operation the only contract in existence was one to employ the plaintiff up to the 9th of August. On that date the contract came to an end by effluxion of time, and there was no dismissal of the plaintiff within section 7 (1) (c) of the Education Act, 1902.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J.

The plaintiff was appointed head master of the Gwaenysgor National School by a written agreement on the 3rd of July, 1899. One of the terms of this agreement was that his engagement should be terminable at three months' notice.

The site of the school was by deed-poll dated the 31st of May, 1875, under the School Sites Act, 1841, and the School Sites Act, 1844, conveyed unto and to the use of the minister and churchwardens of the parish of Gwaenysgor for the purposes of the Acts. The trusts were to permit the premises and all buildings thereon to be appropriated and used as and for a school for the education of children and adults, or children only of the labouring, manufacturing, and other poorer classes in the parish, and as a residence for the teacher or teachers of the school, and for no other purpose whatever, such school to be always in communication with, and conducted upon, the principles and in furtherance of the ends and designs of the National Society; and it was provided that the management of the school and the appointment and dismissal of the school teachers should be vested in a committee, consisting of the incumbent for the time being, his licensed curate (if the incumbent should appoint him a member), and of the churchwardens, and three other persons, being members of the Established Church and subscribers to the funds of the school of not less than 10*s.* annually; and that any vacancy on the committee should be filled up by the appointment of a subscriber qualified as aforesaid, such appointment to be vested in the incumbent for the time being.

On the 6th of May, 1904, the then rector and churchwardens, who composed the managing body, gave the plaintiff notice that they would not require his services after the 9th of August, 1904. The managers who gave this notice were not identical with the managers who appointed the plaintiff in 1899.

On the 1st of July, 1904, the Education Act, 1902 came into operation in Flintshire, that being the appointed day in that county, and the Flint County Council thereupon became the local education authority for the county. After the Act came into force the managing body, under section 6, sub-section 2, and section 11 of the Act, consisted of four "foundation managers," who were the rector and churchwardens of the parish and one other person, and two other persons appointed by the local education authority.

The plaintiff applied to the county education committee that the county council, as the local education authority, should not give the consent to his dismissal which was required by section 7 (1) (c) of the Act. An inquiry was held by a committee of the county council, with the result that the committee passed a resolution recommending the local education authority not to give their statutory consent to the dismissal of the plaintiff. The foundation managers did not attend this inquiry. As the foundation managers were taking steps to appoint a fresh master in the place of the plaintiff, he, on the 24th of August, 1904, issued the writ in the present action against the foundation managers without adding the two managers appointed by the county council, as they had taken no part in the proceedings. He claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from preventing him from exercising his duty as master, and also a declaration that the plaintiff was master until his engagement had been duly terminated by a properly-constituted authority. On the 31st of August the plaintiff moved for an interim injunction in the above terms before Bigham, J., as vacation judge, who made an interim order until over the second motion day in the Michaelmas sittings.

On the 28th of October, 1904, the motion came before Kekewich, J., who refused to continue the injunction.

The plaintiff appealed.

By section 7 (1) of the Education Act, 1902: "The local authority shall maintain and keep efficient all public elementary schools within their area which are necessary, and have the control of all expenditure required for that purpose, other than expenditure for which, under this Act, provision is to be made by the managers; but, in the case of a school not provided by them, only so long as the following conditions and provisions are complied with:

". . . (c) The consent of the local education authority shall be required to the appointment of teachers, but that consent shall not be withheld except on educational grounds, and the consent of the authority shall also be required to the dismissal of a teacher, unless the dismissal be on grounds connected with the giving of religious instruction in the school."

Low, K.C., and Lynn, for the appellant.—Before the notice to leave became operative the "appointed day" had arrived. After that date the consent of the local education authority became necessary to the dismissal of any teacher under section 7 (1) (c) of the Education Act, 1902. The dismissal of this teacher took place in August, after the appointed day, and therefore the consent of the county council must be obtained.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and Nutter, for the respondents.—The plaintiff entered into a contract with the managers quâ managers, and this contract is not affected by a change in the personnel of the managing body. Nor is its validity affected by the Act of 1902. The dismissal was really the work of the old managing body, and the new managers have nothing at all to do with it. We also submit that this action is irregularly constituted, as the defendants are neither the managers with whom the plaintiff actually contracted, nor are they the whole body of managers.

Low, K.C., replied.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—Whatever the rights may be under the statute, it seems to me that this action, brought as it is against the four persons who are members of the board of management as it exists under the Act of 1902, is an action which ought not to have been brought. These gentlemen are not the original contracting parties and they are not the whole board of management as it exists under the Act of 1902. I think, therefore, that the action should be dismissed on this ground. Counsel for the appellant say that we ought to give leave to amend. In my judgment the case which it is said would be presented if the amendment were allowed would fail equally, and therefore there is nothing to be gained by amendment. I thought when this case was first presented to us that, inasmuch as it was a case arising with respect to a teacher of a school governed by the Education Act, 1902, it was desirable in the case of an Act of that importance that, before we delivered our judgment, we should have called to our minds the frame of the Act and the provisions which chiefly affect the relation of the management to the teachers; but I agree that a great deal of the information that we asked for, or rather that I personally asked for, does not affect this case at all. The plaintiff's claim is based upon contract, and he says that the notice given on the 6th of May, that is, two months before the Act came into force, is ineffective. It is admitted that at the moment when the notice was given it was a good notice, and that the effect of it was that at the termination of the three months therein mentioned the contract would come to an end by effluxion of time. We, unfortunately, have not the written contract before us, but the plaintiff in his affidavit tells us what the contract was, and as against him that is sufficient. We learn from the affidavit that this was a contract which could be terminated by three months' notice on either side. The three months' notice was given, and, therefore, it would seem to follow that if the plaintiff bases his claim upon the the contract he must take it as a whole and take it that the contract was determined at the end of the three months. But he says that that is not so because of section 7 (1) (c) of the Act of 1902. It is said here that the board of management are dismissing the plaintiff, and dismissing him since the appointed day without the consent of the local authority. I think that the answer to that is, that the plaintiff's term of service as a teacher came to an end on the day on which the time limited by the notice ran out by reason of a previous notice having been given for the termination of the contract in accordance with the terms of the contract. That being so, it seems to me that clause (c) of section 7 (1) has no application at all. I wish to guard myself against being supposed in this judgment to express any opinion as to what is the position of managers in respect of contracts made by the management before the Act came into force. I say nothing as to how far managers under the Act of 1902 are or are not bound by such contracts or are or are not entitled to enforce such contracts. I say nothing as to who would be the proper parties in litigation, either as plaintiffs or defendants, if a question arose as to the enforcement of a contract made by the managers before the arrival of the appointed day when the Act came into force. I wish also to say that I express no opinion as to what would be the position of a new board of management who continue to employ a schoolmaster who had been the schoolmaster before the appointed day, and continued to pay him with moneys provided by the county council, the county council knowing at the time when they provided the moneys who was the schoolmaster in fact, and that he was paid out of these moneys. As to what the effect of that might be I say nothing; I do not know. That is not the case which is presented to us. The case presented to us is based entirely upon the assumption that the contract made by the old management is the only contract which is material. That being so, it seems to me that the term of service under that contract is determined by the effluxion of time under a proper notice, and that the case of a contract so determined does not fall within the operation of clause (c) of sub-section 7 of the Act of 1902, I think that this appeal must be dismissed, and dismissed with costs.

ROMER, L.J.—Apart from the question of parties, with which my lord has dealt, I also am of opinion that the grounds upon which this application is based are insufficient, and that the plaintiff's claim fails. The plaintiff was employed under a contract made between him and the old managers of the school. Those managers while still managers, and before the Act of 1902 came into operation, gave him notice determining his services at the end of a certain period. It is not disputed that that was a valid notice rightly given. The result was that when the Act came into operation the plaintiff was employed for a term which would end at the expiration of the notice. Now, whatever be the effect of the Act upon the contract, it appears to me that the plaintiff's case must fail. Take, first, the view that by the operation of the Act the contract was rendered binding upon the new managers, and that the new managers took over the existing contracts as they stood. The only contract in that case which they took over here was a contract to employ the plaintiff till the expiration of the notice. On the expiration of the notice his term ceased. In that case the new managers had to give no further notice; they had to do nothing which could be held to be a dismissal within the meaning of the phrase as used in the Act of 1902; all that they had to do was, when the term of office came to an end according to the notice, to appoint some person whom they thought fit to fill up the vacancy. In that they would be doing nothing which was wrong, nothing of which either the county council or the plaintiff could complain. Now take the other view of the Act of Parliament, that upon the Act coming into operation the original contract terminated. It is common ground that no fresh contract was made between the new managing body and the plaintiff. Assuming, then, that matters went on as they did, and that we are to imply some contract with the assent of the county council if that be necessary, the only contract that should be implied is a contract to continue to employ the plaintiff to the end of his term. When that term came to an end he ceased to be teacher, and the managers had to employ a new master in his place. Again, they had to do nothing which would amount to a dismissal within the meaning of the Act. Again, there would be nothing of which either the plaintiff or the county council had any right to complain. Whichever view, therefore, is taken of this Act of Parliament, it is clear to my mind that the plaintiff in this case has no right whatever as against the new managing body, and that this action, even if the defect as to parties were cured, wholly fails.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I should not add anything except for the circumstance that I desire to state my view that it is not necessary to express any opinion upon many of the points which have been argued before us. The question whether contracts entered into before the appointed day by the old managers are enforceable by and against the new managing body created by the Act is one upon which we have heard a great deal said. I desire to keep an entirely open mind on that question if and when it comes before the court, but in my view it is wholly unnecessary to deal with the matter now. If his rights under the old contract can be enforced by the plaintiff against the new body of managers, it is in my opinion plain that they can be only the rights which were in existence on the 1st of July when the Act came into operation; but on the 1st of July the only contract which was in existence was a contract for a term expiring on the 9th of August. If, however, the rights under the old contract cannot be enforced against the new managers, still less can the plaintiff have any relief in this action. There is the further ground to which I am not able to see any answer, that the plaintiff has brought the wrong defendants before the court, and on that ground also he cannot obtain any relief.

Solicitors, Baker & Nairne; Crawley, Arnold, & Co.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Farwell, J. } Feb. 7.

Ex parte THAVIE'S ESTATE. (a.)

Lands Clauses Act—Compulsory purchase—Reinvestment of purchase-moneys in land—Granting lease as part of purchase agreement—Expenses of reinvestment—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 81.

Where land has to be bought for the reinvestment of purchase-moneys obtained by a compulsory sale, the costs of granting a lease to the vendors of such land will not be held to be expenses incidental to reinvestment within the meaning of section 81 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, even where the agreement to grant such lease is a part of the agreement to purchase the land.

Adjourned summons.

The Corporation of the City of London, under the powers conferred upon them by the Holborn Valley Improvement Act, 1864, and the Holborn Valley Improvement Amendment Act, 1867, acquired land by compulsory purchase from the trustees of the Thavie Estate, a charity established under the will of John Thavie and holding land for the purposes of its trusts. The money which represented the purchase price was in court. A summons was issued by the trustee of the charity asking for the approval by the court of an agreement whereby it was proposed to reinvest the purchase-moneys in the purchase, by the charity trustees, of freehold lands on the east side of Leather-lane in the City of London, and for payment out of court to complete the purchase. The agreement, for which approval was desired, provided that the purchasers (the charity trustees) should grant to the vendors a lease of the said land, at a ground-rent, for a term of years, and a question arose in chambers as to the costs of granting this lease.

For the trustees of the Thavie Estate it was contended that section 81 of the Land Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, applied to the costs of granting a lease to the vendors of the property bought with the money in court when reinvested. It was admitted that the costs of the conveyance in fee of such property fell within the section; and that the costs of such leases as the present one had been paid in some previous cases as being costs incidental to conveyance.

(a.) Reported by C. H. CARDEN NOAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The master decided that the costs of granting a lease to the vendors of the property in Leather-lane should be paid for by the city corporation as part of the costs of the conveyance to the Thavie trustees.

Owen Thompson, for the plaintiffs, the Thavie trustees, cited Ex parte The Governors of Christ's Hospital, L. R. 20 Eq. 605; and Ex parte The Vicar of Sawston, 6 W. R. 492, 27 L. J. Ch. 755.

Baker, for the respondents, the Corporation of London.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said: This is a question arising on the intepretation of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, which I think has already been settled. In spite of cases where these costs are said to have been allowed, I should never, apart from the decision of the master, have had any doubt that the costs of granting a lease to the vendors of the property in this instance could not be construed as an expense incidental to the reinvestment of the purchase-moneys obtained from the Corporation of the City of London.

Master's decision reversed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Pontifex, Hewitt, & Pitt.

Solicitor for the defendants, The City Solicitor.

Chan. Div. } Swinfen Eady, J. } Jan. 21, 23, 24, 25, 26; Feb. 18.

SIRDAR RUBBER CO. (LIMITED) v. WALLINGTON, WESTON, & CO. (a.)

Patent—Infringement—Combination—Subject-matter—Repair.

The defendants made by way of repair a new rubber tyre for an old patent rim of the plaintiffs and fitted it into the rim to replace the previous rubber tyre, which was worn out. This was done bonâ fide by way of repair. The plaintiffs admitted that anyone was entitled to make and sell rubber tyres to fit the rims. The infringement alleged was placing the tyre in the rim.

Held, it is a question of fact in each case whether the work which has been done may fairly be termed a "repair," regard being had in each case to the exact nature of the invention.

Where a subordinate integer is specified and claimed, and a larger combination, of which this integer is part, is also claimed, the patentee is at the peril of justifying the combination, as matter which ought properly to form the subject of a patent of invention; and he does not discharge this burden where there is no novelty or invention in the larger claim, but the combination is merely an obvious one if the subordinate integer is to be used at all.

Action for infringement of a patent.

Moulton, K.C., and Walter, for the plaintiffs.

Bousfield, K.C., and W. Neill, for the defendants.

SWINFEN EADY, J., in giving judgment, said: The plaintiffs claim an injunction to restrain the infringement of a patent, and damages. The patent in question is No. 11,686 of 1900, granted to the plaintiff, James Mecredy MacLulich, for "Improvements relating to rims and tires for vehicle wheels." The patentee claims to have invented a wheel-rim of a particular shape, intended to receive a solid india-rubber tyre. The width of the mouth of the rim, or the space between the inner edges of the flanges, is approximately the same as the width of the base; the flanges project outwardly from the base, and then return the same distance inwardly; the inner sides of the flanges are flat, and of equal length; or, as the patentee says, resemble in cross-section the two equal sides of an isosceles triangle. The rubber, to fit the tyre, is of such a shape in cross-section that under ordinary pressure it will not over-hang or project laterally beyond the edges of the flanges, and accordingly the patentee claims that when under pressure it will not be cut or injured by being pressed against the unyielding metal edge, but will have free access within the rim; and, moreover, the tire will not be pinched by the edges of the flanges of the rim as in Clincher tyres. The patentee also claims that with a tyre so shaped inextensible wires or bands for securing the tyres to the rims are unnecessary, and he is thus able to dispense with what is frequently a cause of injury to, or destruction of, the rubber.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendants, who are rubber manufacturers, denied infringement, and disputed the validity of the patent on the usual grounds. The defendants have not made or supplied any rim. They have made by way of repair a new rubber tyre for an old patent rim of the plaintiffs, and they have fitted it into the rim to replace the previous rubber tyre, which was worn out. It appears that this work was in fact actually done for the plaintiffs, although the person sent with the old rim did not disclose the plaintiffs' name. The plaintiffs admit that the defendants are entitled to make and sell rubber tyres of any suitable section to fit their rims; but they contend that the defendants cannot fit them into the rims, even by way of repair, as by so doing they make the combination claimed in the second claiming clause of the patent and infringe the patent.

The specification does not particularly describe and ascertain the nature of the invention, and the manner in which it is to be performed.

In substance, the plaintiffs' claim is for a rim of a new shape and in combination with a tyre to fit. No claim is made to the tyre except in combination with the rim. Solid rubber tyres have been made of very numerous patterns, and it is obvious that a slight variation of the section of rubber could not form subject-matter of a patent. In my opinion, the same may be said with regard to rims.

The plaintiffs' patent is invalid for want of novelty. If the patent is invalid there is an end of infringement; but, assuming the patent to be valid, have the defendants infringed it, and do they threaten and intend to infringe it in the future? The defendants have supplied a new rubber tyre and inserted it into an old rim of the plaintiffs' to replace the old tyre worn out. This was done bonâ fide, by way of repair. The plaintiffs contend that this is an infringement of their patent, although they concede that any one is entitled to make and sell rubber tyres to fit the rims. The infringement alleged is placing the tyre in the rim. This is done in a way which is old, and by use of machinery which is old, and by which all solid tyres of this kind are placed in metal rims. Have the defendants infringed the patent? In the recent case of Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co. (Limited) v. David Moseley & Sons (Limited), 52 W. R. 454, [1904] 1 Ch. 612, 621, Cozens-Hardy, L.J., said: "I think, speaking for myself, that there may be a third class of cases in which the supply by the defendants might be perfectly lawful—I mean for the purpose of repair. The word 'repair' is no doubt a difficult one to construe, but I do not think that Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co. (Limited) v. Neal, 47 W. R. 632, [1899] 1 Ch. 807, justifies the construction which was put upon it by the appellant's counsel. I certainly doubt—I will not say any more than that—whether the holder of a licensed tyre may not replace a worn-out cover without being guilty of an infringement of the patent. It is not necessary to decide that point now, and I only desire to keep that point open for future consideration." I fully appreciate the difficulty felt by Cozens-Hardy, L.J., in construing the word "repair," but, in my opinion, it is a question of fact in each case whether the work which has been done may fairly be termed a "repair," regard being had in each case to the exact nature of the invention. The purchaser of a patented article has a right to prolong its life by fair repair, but he has not any right to obtain, without licence from the patentee, a substantially new article, made in accordance with the invention, retaining some subordinate part of the old article, so that it may be said that the combination is not entirely new. Such a retention of an old part would be colourable only, and would not prevent the article from being substantially a new article, instead of being substantially a repair of the old one. This was the case of Dunlop Pneumatic Co. (Limited) v. Neal, where North, J., held that the tyre was really a new tyre; nothing was left of the old tyre but the wires, and one of these had been broken and was mended by the defendants.

In the present case, assuming validity, the plaintiffs' real invention is a metal rim of a particular shape, to receive a rubber tyre; the soft wearing part is the rubber tyre, and in the nature of things the rim is calculated to wear out several tyres. Unless the purchaser is able to have new rubbers placed in the rim, he cannot obtain the use of the patented article for the fair period of its life. This is not a repair amounting to reconstruction, and a new article, but a fair repair; the old metal rim, the distinguishing feature of the invention, being retained not colourably but because essential and practically as good as new, and a fresh rubber put to replace the old one worn out. In my opinion, there has not been any infringement.

It may, however, be further urged that in the present case the patent also claims as new "a wheel rim and solid rubber tyre constructed substantially as described, and that the defendants, by fixing the tyre in the rim, have assembled the parts, and made the plaintiffs' combination." But I cannot in any case regard this claim as valid, even if the patent were otherwise valid as regards the rim. No doubt there may be a valid patent for a combination, even though all the parts be old, but there must be novelty, invention, and merit in the combination to support validity. Where the only invention is in the form of one part of an article or machine, which part is separately claimed as an invention, the scope of the patent cannot be enlarged by claiming that part in every combination in which it can be used, however obvious. The patentee, having claimed the rim, cannot extend the scope of the patent by claiming the rim in combination with a rubber tyre, as that is the only and obvious manner in which the rim is intended to be used, and there is no invention or merit in the combination apart from the novelty in the shape of the rim itself. If the patent be restricted to the form of the rim, it is obvious that the defendants have not infringed, and as that is all that the plaintiffs can claim to have invented they cannot extend the ambit of the patent by an additional claim for a combination and so bring within it something as an infringement which would not have been an infringement if the patent had been for the rim alone. It was pointed out by Lord Cairns in Clark v. Adie, 26 W. R. 45, [1877] 2 App. Cas. 315, 321, that a patent may be granted for a larger invention and also for certain subordinate integers properly specified and claimed; but then the patentee "is, as was said by the Lords Justices, at the peril of justifying those subordinate integers as themselves matters which ought properly to form the subject of a patent of invention." I apprehend that the converse of this proposition also holds true, that, where a subordinate integer is specified and claimed and a larger combination of which this integer is part is also claimed, the patentee is at the peril of justifying the combination, as matter which ought properly to form the subject of a patent of invention; and he does not discharge this burden where there is no novelty or invention in the larger claim, but the combination is merely an obvious one, if the subordinate integer is to be used at all. The result is that the action fails and must be dismissed with costs, except that the plaintiffs must have the cost of the issue of the true and first inventor, and there will be a set-off.

Solicitors, Shaen, Roscoe, Massey, & Co.; Collyer-Bristow, Hill, Curtis, Booth, & Co.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy and Ridley, JJ.) Jan. 20.

TURNER & SON v. WILLIS. (a.)

Solicitor and client—Past costs—Oral agreement to pay lump sum—Account stated—Bill of costs.

Where a solicitor has a bill of costs against his client on the one hand, and the client on the other hand has a claim against the solicitor for work done not of a professional nature, then if the solicitor and client meet and strike a balance, in favour of the solicitor, that is not an agreement by the client to pay his solicitor a lump sum which would require to be in writing within the meaning of the Solicitors' Remuneration Acts.

This was an appeal from a decision of his Honour Judge Bacon in an action tried at the Whitechapel County Court, Middlesex, to recover the sum of £35 due on an account stated.

The plaintiff firm of solicitors, of which Mr. Alfred Turner was the surviving partner, had executed legal work for the defendant over a period of years extending from 1881 to 1895. No bill of costs was rendered until the 23rd of August, 1900, when an unsigned bill of costs was sent with a letter to the defendant. The amount of the said bill was £50 0s. 7d.

On the 24th of August, 1900, the defendant called upon the plaintiffs, and at the trial of the action Mr. Alfred Turner alleged that the items in the bill were gone into by both parties, and after making deductions for moneys owed by the plaintiffs to the defendant for work done not of a professional character, the account was settled at £35; in accordance with this settlement Alfred Turner, sen., since deceased, in the presence of the witness, marked the bill as follows: "£35 in settlement." The bill was produced. The plaintiffs addressed several letters to the defendant requesting payment, and in a letter of the 9th of April, 1901, the defendant admitted indebtedness.

At the trial the defendant's counsel upon the conclusion of the plaintiffs' case submitted that there was no case for him to answer, and, the learned county court judge concurring, no evidence was called for the defence. The judge non-suited the plaintiffs on the following grounds: (1) "That the letter of the 9th of April, 1901, was not such an acknowledgment as implied a promise to pay, and that the defence under the Statute of Limitations prevailed." (2) "That the agreement sued upon was a verbal agreement by a client to pay his solicitor a lump sum in discharge of past costs, and that such agreement was not binding on the client, not being in writing."

The plaintiffs appealed.

Nield, for the appellants.—I admit that the letter of the 9th of April, 1901, does not take the debt out of the statute, but the time must be held to run from the 24th of August, 1900, when the defendant admitted that £35 was due on an account stated: Ashby v. James, 11 M. & W. 542. A bill of costs, although not signed (Solicitors Act, 1843, s. 37), and an agreement to pay a solicitor a lump sum, although not in writing within the requirements of section 8 of the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, may nevertheless be judicially noticed for other purposes than to found an action (vide In re Pender, 16 L. J. Ch. 25; In re Russell, Son, & Scott, 30 Ch. D. 114); thus courts have recognized an unsigned bill of costs to constitute a good set-off.

Counsel also referred to In re Billings, 5 Dowlings Prac. Cas. 126.

Warde, for the respondent.—No bill of costs has been delivered, because this summary of work done cannot be termed a bill of costs, and, therefore, the plaintiffs cannot sue on an account stated. Eicke v. Nokes, 1 M. & R. 359; Brooks v. Bockett, 9 Q. B. D. 847; In re West, King, & Adams, 40 W. R. 644, [1892] 2 Q. B. 102; and In re Russell, Son, & Scott are in my favour. The whole object of the Solicitors Acts would be null and void if a solicitor could mark on this bill of costs, assuming it to be a bill of costs at all, "£35 in settlement." There is nothing to show that the account was actually settled at £35.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—There must be a new trial. I do not propose to express a final opinion as to what the rights of the parties may be when the facts are ascertained, because it seems to me that a good deal is to be said on both sides as to what, as a matter of fact, the alleged account stated actually is. If this is only a claim made by the solicitors, it is not a bill of costs at all. If on the other hand it is a good account stated, the authorities which have been cited to us would seem to show that an agreement, where the claim litigated on consists on the one side of solicitors' costs and on the other of costs incurred by the solicitor for work done by the client, need not be in writing. The learned county court judge in dealing with this matter of an account stated practically decided this particular case on the second ground set out in the notice of appeal—viz., "that the agreement sued upon was a verbal agreement by a client to pay his solicitor a lump sum in discharge of past costs, and that such an agreement was not binding on the client, not being in writing." As at present advised, if this bargain was a bargain with respect to a claim of £50 by the solicitor on the one hand, and on the other a cross-claim by the client for a sum of money, and the parties agreed to settle for £35, that would not be the kind of bargain required to be in writing within the meaning of the section with which the learned county court judge has been concerned. The only other point is that the letter of the 9th of April, 1901, did not take the original claim out of the Statute of Limitations; this is now admitted. That being so, I think there ought to be a new trial, because in my opinion the real rights of the plaintiffs cannot be ascertained until the true facts have been dealt with. It cannot be taken that the true state of facts was such as was deposed to by the one witness who was called. I do not think we can deal with this case on the facts as proved. We think there must be a new trial. Costs will abide the event.

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree. No point arises on the first question. The second ground was that the agreement sued upon was a verbal agreement by a client to pay his solicitor a lump sum in discharge of past costs, and that such agreement was not binding on the client, not being in writing. I think that the objections to the claim would have been good objections if, as a matter of fact, the learned county court judge had decided the question of fact—viz., that the account stated consisted solely of solicitors' claims purported to be settled on that bill. It seems to me the reason of there being a new trial is this—in the evidence as it stood, after hearing one witness the learned county court judge non-suited the plaintiffs. On that evidence it may be argued that the account was not constituted solely of this solicitors' bill, but consisted of a contrà account which was taken into consideration, and the account alleged to be stated was the result not only of a claim by the plaintiffs settled by the agreement, but of claims which had nothing to do with a solicitor's bill at all. And I think for the distinction there is ground in the decision which is cited by Bullen and Leake under the head of "Account Stated"—viz., the case of Scadding v. Eyles, 9 Q. B. 858. The declaration claimed for work done, and, secondly, on an account stated. To the account stated it was pleaded "that the account therein mentioned to have been stated was so stated solely of and concerning the said debt (i.e., on account of work done as solicitor), and not otherwise." And what the court held was that under those circumstances the plea was a perfectly good plea. The plaintiffs' counsel seemed to have assumed from something that fell from the learned judge that the defendant might reopen the account if some only of the items related to law proceedings, for he says: "It cannot be said if, in point of fact, the accounts had been cast up and a balance struck, a defendant might reopen them if one item related to law proceedings." The question of fact remains to be tried, and to be tried on the basis of my lord's decision.

RIDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion.

New trial ordered.

Solicitors for appellant, Metcalfe & Storr.

Solicitor for respondent, Geo. Vandamm.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy and Ridley, JJ.) Nov. 3, 18.

IMPERIAL AND GRAND HOTELS CO. v. CHRISTCHURCH GUARDIANS. (a.)

Poor law—Rating—Appeal—Time—Poor Relief Act, 1743 (17 Geo. 2, c. 38), s. 4—Union Assessment Committee Act Amendment Act, 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 39), s. 1.

During the currency of a rate certain ratepayers appealed against an assessment, and their appeal was dismissed by the valuation committee. They further appealed to quarter sessions, when their appeal was allowed.

Held, that quarter sessions had jurisdiction to entertain the appeal, notwithstanding that two meetings of the committee and one of quarter sessions had been held before the notice of objection was given, as it was not shown that the appellants had been guilty of unreasonable delay.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Case stated by the Recorder of Bournemouth on an appeal from the Christchurch Assessment Committee by the Imperial and Grand Hotels Co. (Limited) against a poor rate.

The recorder allowed the appeal and reduced the assessment.

The case set out the following facts: The rate was made on the 21st of April, 1903, to provide for expenses incurred before the 31st of March, 1904, and was made payable in two instalments on the 1st of May and the 1st of November, 1903. The assessment committee held a meeting for the purpose of hearing objections to the valuation list on the 15th of May, 1903, and at this meeting no objection was made by the appellants.

On the 26th of October, having previously in August paid the instalment due on the 1st of May, the appellants, the hotel company, gave notice of objection to the list, which objection was duly heard by the assessment committee on the 12th of November, when the appellants failed to get relief.

Due notice of appeal to quarter sessions was given, and the appeal was heard on the 2nd of January, 1904. It was objected on behalf of the respondents that there was no jurisdiction to hear the appeal, inasmuch as the appellants had not appealed to the next quarter sessions as required by section 4 of the Poor Relief Act, 1743 (17 Geo. 2, c. 38).

The recorder overruled the objection, and after hearing the appeal reduced the assessment, but inasmuch as the appellants had not taken steps, as they might have done, to appeal against the rate, refused to order the return of the first instalment.

Ryde and Francke, for the appellant guardians.

Clavell Salter, K.C., and Haydon, for the respondents.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., read the judgment of the court.—This is an appeal on a case stated from a decision of Mr. Kinglake, the Recorder of Bournemouth, and raises a question of some difficulty under the Poor Relief Act, 1743, and the Union Assessment Act, 1862, and the Amendment Act, 1864. The rate appealed against was made on the 21st of April, 1903, to provide for expenses up to the 31st of March, 1904, and was payable by two instalments, one on the 1st of May, and the other on the 1st of November, 1903. Meetings of the assessment committee were held on the 15th of May, the 15th of August, and the 12th of November. Courts of quarter sessions were held on the 27th of June and the 27th of October. The first notice of objection was given by the appellants to the assessment committee on the 26th of October; the objection was heard and determined on the 12th of November, and the notice of appeal to the sessions held on the 2nd of January, 1904, was given on the 5th of December, 1903. The appellants in the month of August, 1903, paid the first instalment due on the 1st of May.

Objection was taken to the jurisdiction of the recorder upon the ground that the appeal to the January quarter sessions was too late, not having been brought to the next quarter sessions within the meaning of section 4 of 17 Geo. 2, c. 38. It is clear from the authorities, and in fact it is not disputed, that up to the passing of the Union Assessment Committee Act Amendment Act, 1864, the appeal would have been too late. There are numerous authorities which establish that an appeal against a rate must be brought at the next practicable sessions at which an appeal could be lodged: Rex v. Sussex Justices, 15 East 206; Reg. v. West Riding Justices, E. B. & E. 73; and numerous other cases. Section 1 of the Union Assessment Committee Act Amendment Act, 1864, provides that no person shall be allowed to appeal against a poor rate unless he shall have given to the assessment committee notice of objection against the valuation list, and shall have failed to obtain such relief in the matter as he deems just. And the section further provided that "After notice given at any time in the manner provided by the said Act with respect to objections, the committee shall hear [such objections] with full power to call for and amend such list, although the same has been approved of, and no subsequent list has been transmitted to them, and if they amend the same shall give notice of such amendment to the overseers, who shall thereupon alter their then current rate accordingly." It was contended on behalf of the respondents that the proviso to this section which makes it a condition precedent to an appeal that an appellant shall have given notice of objection to the assessment committee and shall have failed to obtain relief, had not affected the duty of the appellants under section 4 of the Act of 1743 of bringing his appeal at the next practicable sessions after the publication of the rate, and that inasmuch as the appellants had taken no steps until the 26th of October, and had allowed the meetings of the assessment committee of May and August to go by, and that no explanation was given to account for the delay, the appellants had failed to comply with the provisions of the Act of 1743. It was further contended that, inasmuch as the recorder had found the appellants had not taken steps which they might have taken to object at an earlier date, he had, in effect, decided that the delay in going to the assessment committee and the consequent postponement of the appeal showed that the appellants had not brought the appeal to the next practicable sessions. There is a great deal of force in these contentions, and there is no doubt that the language in some of the judgments which have been given shows that an appellant ought to be prompt in raising objections. For instance, Bovill, C.J., in Reg. v. Biggleswade Union, 21 L. T. 494, in deciding in favour of an appellant, said there was nothing to show that the appellant took more than a reasonable time before taking any step. But we are dealing with a question of jurisdiction. Whatever the true view may be in a case in which it could be proved that as a matter of fact the appellants had unreasonably delayed going before the assessment committee, and had thereby exceeded the time allowed for appealing, we are unable to say that the recorder had no jurisdiction to entertain this appeal. The Act of 1743 provided that the appellant should appeal to the next general or quarter sessions. These words, as we have already said, have been construed to mean the next practicable sessions. Section 1 of the Act of 1864 contains no similar direction or limitation. Reliance was placed by the appellants, the Imperial and Grand Hotels Co., upon the words in section 1 of the Act of 1864, "at any time," following the words "after the notice given," but we doubt whether that argument is entitled to much weight because these words were undoubtedly necessary to extend the limit of twenty-eight days during which, under section 18 of the Union Assessment Act, 1862, a person could object to the valuation list, and also to give the committee power to alter the list notwithstanding approval under the same Act. But apart from this argument the section contains no direction or limitation similar to that contained in the Act of 1743, that the appellant shall lodge his objection before the next or any particular meeting of the assessment committee; and looking to the practical working of the matter we think it quite possible that the Legislature recognized that these objections could not be dealt with as speedily as appeals against poor rates under the old law, especially having regard to the extended powers of objection which were conferred by the Union Assessment Committee Acts of 1862 and 1864. Further, the power of the committee to alter a current rate would seem indirectly to limit the time within which objections can be effectively taken. We express no opinion as to what may be the true view to be taken in a case in which the whole period for which the rate was made was allowed to go by, or where, as we have said, persons have been guilty of unreasonable delay in giving notice of their objections. But we are unable to say, in this case, in which the objection was lodged and determined and the appeal brought within the period of the current rate, that the jurisdiction of the court of quarter sessions was ousted because the appellant might have lodged his objection at one of two earlier meetings of the assessment committee. Upon the whole, therefore, we are of opinion that the recorder was right in hearing the appeal and in declining to give effect to the preliminary objection.

The other point raised in the case must, in our opinion, be answered in favour of the hotel companies. The recorder, having reduced the rateable value from £1 500 to £1,325 in the one case and from £2,050 to £1,530 in the other, ordered that the order for the repayment of the excess should only operate in respect of the second instalment of the rate, and should not apply to the first instalment which the hotel companies had paid in August. Assuming that he could entertain the appeal as we have already decided, he was bound, having regard to the provisions of section 8 of the Poor Rate Act (41 Geo. 3, c. 23), to order repayment in respect of the whole rate. We therefore think that the appeal of the assessment committee must be dismissed, with costs, and the order varied as above directed, and the appeal of the Imperial and Grand Hotels Co. should be allowed, with costs.

Solicitors for respondents, Lovell, Son, & Pitfield, for Druitt & Druitt, Christchurch.

Solicitors for appellants, C. F. Ingram, for C. J. Lacey, Bournemouth.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. / Admiralty. — Nov. 22, 23, 24.

"THE GUSTAFSBERG." (a.)

Ship—Collision—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, 1897, art. 25—"Narrow channel."

Four red conical lighted buoys having been placed approximately in the central line of Sea Reach, in the River Thames, to mark the northern side of the deepest water, a collision occurred between the plaintiffs' vessel, which was proceeding up, and the defendants' vessel, which was coming down the river, the collision occurring on the plaintiffs' starboard side of the channel thus marked.

The Court held that the defendants were in fault, inasmuch as the four red conical lighted buoys indicated a "narrow channel" between them and the buoys to the south of them, within the meaning of article 25 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

(a.) Reported by GWYNNE HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Action.

The facts fully appear from the judgment.

Laing, K.C., and Dawson Miller, for the plaintiffs, the owners of The Rubis.

Aspinall, K.C., and Stubbs, for the defendants, the owners of The Gustafsberg.

GORELL BARNES, J.—On the 3rd of August, 1904, about 10 p.m., the twin-screw steamship The Rubis, of 633 tons gross register, manned by a crew of sixteen hands, was proceeding on a course of N.W. by W. magnetic, up Sea Reach of the river Thames to the south of, and above, No. 1 and below No. 2, red conical gas buoys, on a voyage from Ostend to Tilbury with general cargo and one passenger. The Gustafsberg is a Swedish steamer of 1,155 tons gross, and she was on a voyage, with a crew of twenty hands and a coasting pilot or waterman, from the Surrey Commercial Docks to Blyth, in ballast. These two vessels met in collision at about the place mentioned by the plaintiffs in their preliminary act, the contact being between the stem of The Rubis and the port side about amidships of The Gustafsberg, at an angle which has been in dispute in this case.

Now, the broad feature of the plaintiffs' case is that they had the masthead and green lights of The Gustafsberg a little on their port bow at first, and that the masthead and green lights of The Gustafsberg drew ahead and on to the starboard bow, and that after they had done so The Rubis, having arrived off No. 2 buoy, and when the vessels were starboard to starboard, altered her course from N.W. by W. ½ W. to W.N.W., for the purpose of bringing herself on to the slightly altered course necessitated by the different line of the buoys, and gave two short blasts at the time with her whistle, and steadied on the changed course. Then the case is shortly this: that when the vessels had continued to approach and were green to green The Gustafsberg ported across the bows of The Rubis, and the moment that was seen the engines of The Rubis were reversed full speed, and three short blasts were blown twice with the whistle. The short point, therefore, of their case is that the vessels were at the material time green to green, and that the fault lay with the defendants in porting into the plaintiffs' vessel.

On the other hand, the defendants' case as pleaded is a little more complicated in statement, but the substance of it is that when first they made out from The Gustafsberg the lights of The Rubis she was a little on their starboard bow and showing all her lights; in other words, that she, The Gustafsberg, was ahead of The Rubis. The defendants' case then is that The Rubis shut in her green light, and that thereupon The Gustafsberg's helm was ported slightly, and the vessels became port to port for a short time; and that afterwards The Rubis starboarded, and by starboarding brought about this collision, opening her green light on the port bow of The Gustafsberg. The evidence from The Gustafsberg is that various steps were taken by porting, and porting more, and slightly altering her speed, but that this collision took place. There is a point made in the pleadings about The Rubis being hailed to stand by, and proceeding on her way without ascertaining whether The Gustafsberg required assistance, but nothing has come of that and nothing was said about it in the addresses of counsel to the court. To go back for a moment to what those cases substantially mean—in short they mean, from the plaintiffs' point of view, that the vessels were green to green and The Gustafsberg ported into The Rubis, and from the defendants' point of view that they became red to red and The Rubis starboarded improperly.

Now, there is no doubt that the defendants' vessel, The Gustafsberg, ported and ported more and hard a-ported, and that that was going on for some time. There is no doubt about that part of the case, and therefore as far as the helm action is concerned the only question in the case appears to be whether the plaintiffs' vessel's helm was starboarded. I have come to the conclusion that it was not. I think there are one or two points which lead me to that conclusion, and that the first is that the plaintiffs' master gave his evidence in a most excellent manner, and I see no reason for doubting his version of the matter. In addition to that the plaintiffs' vessel's course and the defendants' vessel's course were slightly crossing—not much, it is true, but slightly—and taking the account given by the defendants as to the seeing of all the lights of The Rubis on the starboard bow, and also the evidence given by the defendants as to there being an intention on the part of The Gustafsberg to pass out of the channel which is between the lights and the south shore at a lower point than where this collision happened, it seems to me that these considerations fortify the view which has been taken in this case by the master of the plaintiffs' vessel. Then there is a question as to the damage. The plaintiffs' say, and a surveyor is called for that purpose, that the blow was a blow leading aft on The Gustafsberg, at an angle of five or six points, and the defendants maintain, and a surveyor is called for that purpose, that was a blow leading forward at an angle of something like seven points forward. There has been a good deal of conflict about it. I have examined, and the elder brethren have examined, the photographs, and I have heard the evidence. Upon the photographs themselves it is extremely difficult to arrive at any definite conclusion, but my own impression is that the evidence given by Mr. Dudgeon was entitled to greater weight, in the circumstances, than that given by the surveyor called by the defendants; and I can see nothing in that damage which is inconsistent with the view that this was a blow leading from forward to aft. Mr. Dudgeon's notebook contains an expression of opinion that the angle of the blow was about a right angle, leading from forward, when he first made an examination, but afterwards, on further inspection, he modified that somewhat, maintaining that the blow led slightly more from forward than his first impression had led him to think. The result seems to be that the porting of the defendants' vessel admits of a conclusion that that was sufficient alone to produce the collision, and that the defendants' vessel must be held to blame for porting in the circumstances. In addition to that it is quite clear to my mind and the Elder Brethren, too, that the defendants' vessel, having regard to the danger that existed, was not justified in keeping on as she did, and ought to have stopped and reversed her engines as soon as any danger became manifest. On both those grounds that vessel must be held to blame.

This leaves for consideration one point under the 25th article of the sea rules, because it has been agreed on both sides that the collision in this case took place at a spot where the sea rules became applicable, being a little lower down than the line across where the Thames rules cease to apply. Now, the merits of the case, to my mind, do not depend upon the application of these rules at all, because it is quite clear that on this fine, clear night, when these vessels saw each other for a long distance, they each were navigating, in fact, for the other, whatever view you take of the rules, just as if they were in the open sea. So, on the merits of the case the rule has no practical application; but at the same time there it is, and if it is broken I suppose it would be difficult to say that the vessel which broke it was not by any possibility in fault, because if she had not been in the position where she was there would have been no collision. Still, it is clear that on the merits there is very little application. However, it has to be dealt with, and the only point necessary for my decision is how far the rule affects the plaintiffs' vessel. I say that for this reason: Whether the defendants are right or wrong with regard to their vessel the starboard hand or narrow channel rule does not matter, because I have found that they were to blame for another reason. It is necessary to see, however, how far that rule affects the position of the plaintiffs. Now, the 25th article provides that in narrow channels every steam vessel shall, when it is safe and practicable, keep to that side of the fairway or mid-channel which lies on the starboard side of such vessel; and of course it is necessary in this case to see what the navigation at the place of this collision is. It is in a wide part of Sea Reach. Speaking, of course, generally, it is opposite Southend, and before the alteration made by the Trinity House—before the placing of the lighted gas buoys—there were buoys on the south side, one of these being the Jenkyn Buoy, which is now also a gas buoy. There were on the north side of the channel the black buoys—the West River Middle and the River Middle—and there was also the buoy known as the East River Middle, which, as I understand, was a spherical gas buoy; and between the rows of buoys on the north side and the south side the traffic passed; but a short time before this collision the Trinity House placed four gas buoys known as 1, 2, 3, and 4, which are now shown on the chart, and took away the light from the buoy called the East River Middle. Those gas buoys were placed in the position shown on the chart, and a notice was published on the 6th of May as follows: "It is intended on or about the 7th of July next to place four red conical lighted buoys to mark the northern side of the deepest water through Sea Reach. The width of the deepest water is at present about 650 feet. The buoys will be named Sea Reach, numbered from seaward one to four, and will lie in about twenty-six feet at low water spring tides." Then follows approximately the situation of the buoys, and the notice further says: "The light on the East River Middle buoy will at the same date be discontinued, and the spherical buoy thereat (painted in black and white horizontal bands) will be surmounted by a diamond top mark. Further notice will be given when the above changes have been made." I understand those changes were made on or about the 7th of July, some time before this collision took place. Now, the buoys that are so put are not only lighted buoys, but they are conical buoys of uniform colour; and that appears to be done in accordance with the uniform system of buoyage on the coast of England, particulars of which are set out in the Channel Pilot at p. 29. The second of the statements of information—I avoid saying rules—as to this system is that "the term 'starboard hand' shall denote that side which would be on the right hand of the mariner either going with the main stream of flood or entering a harbour, river, or estuary, from seaward; the term 'port hand' shall denote the left hand of the mariner under the same circumstances. (3) Buoys showing the pointed top of a cone above water shall be called Conical, and shall always be Starboard Hand buoys as above defined. (4) Buoys showing a flat top above water shall be called Can, and shall always be Port Hand buoys as above defined." I need not refer to 5 and 6—they refer to another class of buoy—but No. 8 says: "Starboard Hand buoys shall always be painted in one colour only. (9) Port Hand buoys shall be painted of another characteristic colour, either single or parti-colour." So that, apart from any legal considerations for the moment we have four lighted conical buoys of uniform colour on the right-hand side as vessels go up between those buoys and the south side, and we have on the south side several buoys which are can-shaped—for instance, there is the black and white Chequer, the East Blyth, the Yantlet, &c., all can buoys and parti-colour—and anybody seeing those buoys with knowledge of the locality, guided by the uniform system of buoyage adopted on the coast of England, would at once treat the passage between those two sets of buoys as being a passage on the north of which are starboard hand buoys and on the south port hand buoys, within the meaning of the terms to which I have just referred in that state-of the buoyage system. It seems to me that the effect of what has been done is that, in accordance with the recognized practice of buoyage, there is indication by means of the buoys of a narrow channel, within the meaning of the 25th article, to the southward of the red conical buoys, and this is acted upon. We have had evidence to show to what extent already it has been thoroughly acted upon, and it seems to me that it would not be at all reasonable, at night at any rate—I am dealing with a night collision, and it is not necessary to go beyond the particular case, so far as my decision is concerned, though my observations may be more general—that it is not at all necessary to hold that a vessel with those distinct starboard hand buoys is to be held to be wrong for treating the southern part of the river between those buoys and the buoys on the southern side as a narrow channel. The cases of The Correnie, [1894] P. 336, notes at p. 338; The Minnie, [1894] P. 336; and The Oporto, [1897] P. 249, are not directly in point, in a case of this character, because there are differences which have been pointed out in argument, and to which I need not again refer: but they do go to this extent, that, physical conditions remaining the same, the alteration in lights and other marks which affect the usual way of navigating a particular part does have the effect of making what may be termed a large piece of water a narrow channel all over it—a narrow channel because of the convenience which the marking and lights give for the purpose of navigation. What the precise effect of this is upon the northern piece which still remains between those lighted buoys which are at present on the northern side of the deepest channel and the black buoys—namely, the West and East River Middle, I do not at present feel quite clear; and it is not necessary I should decide whether that is a separate narrow channel or not. There is however, this difficulty, which I pointed out to Mr. Laing in the course of his argument, and which induced him, I think, to maintain that his real case was that his vessel was rightly treating the part of the river to the southward of the buoys as a narrow channel, if used by vessels coming down or going up it. There is this difficulty—that having two sets of starboard hand buoys going up river, if vessels going up river acted in accordance with the recognized practice they would treat those buoys as starboard hand buoys; but vessels coming down should not treat them as being other than they are shown by their form to be, and would require to keep right away to the south side of the river, acting for the port hand buoys. There is that difficulty, and it may well be—I am not sure whether it is or not—that this has the effect of leaving the greater part of the navigable water for vessels going up, and the smaller part of the navigable water for vessels going down. I am not so sure at the moment what the exact position is, and it is not necessary I should determine that; but what I think is clear is that if vessels bound by the practice and by the reason of the thing do use the south channel, guided by the starboard hand buoys on the one hand and by the port hand buoys on the other, they do treat, and are right in treating, that as a narrow channel. I have asked the Elder Brethren who assist me what their view about that point is, and they consider that as matters stand, and as they stood at the time of this collision, vessels using this channel to the southward of the lighted red buoys do treat, and are right in treating, it as a narrow channel. It may be that the central part of this navigable water of the Thames might have been indicated by buoys of a description which were neither starboard hand nor port hand buoys. It is not a matter upon which I feel competent to express an opinion, but it may possibly be that, having regard to certain difficulties which the facts of this case have brought out, the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House may consider whether matters should remain as they are, or whether they should be buoys which merely indicate that the, so to speak, central line of the river there is its central line, and not a line which has a starboard hand character. I have no doubt if there is any point which they think worth considering in connection with this matter, the Trinity Masters will consider it. I must hold that the plaintiffs cannot be held to blame for proceeding as they did, and as the great bulk of the traffic appears to have proceeded, treating these buoys as marking the starboard hand of the narrow channel. The result must be that The Gustafsberg is held alone to blame for this collision.

Solicitor for plaintiffs, the owners of The Rubis, Charles E. Harvey.

Solicitors for defendants, the owners of The Gustafsberg, Stokes & Stokes.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Feb. 27.

DRESEL v. ELLIS. (a.)

Married woman — Restraint on anticipation — Costs — Appeal — Married Women's Property Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 65), s. 2.

Where a married woman applies unsuccessfully for a new trial of an action in which she is the plaintiff, the Court of Appeal has jurisdiction, under section 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893, to order payment of the defendant's costs of the application out of separate property of the married woman which she is restrained from anticipating.

Hood Barrs v. Cathcart, [1894] 3 Ch. 376, and Hood Barrs v. Heriot, 45 W. R. 507 [1897] A. C. 177, considered.

Application for a new trial or judgment in an action tried before Lawrance, J., and a jury.

The action was brought by a married woman to recover damages for trespass.

At the trial a verdict and judgment were entered for the defendants.

The plaintiff applied for a new trial or judgment.

The court having dismissed the application, a question arose as to whether the defendants were entitled to an order for the payment of their costs of the appeal out of the separate property of the plaintiff subject to a restraint on anticipation.

By section 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893, "In any action or proceeding now or hereafter instituted by a woman or by a next friend on her behalf, the court before which such action or proceeding is pending shall have jurisdiction by judgment or order from time to time to order payment of the costs of the opposite party out of property which is subject to a restraint on anticipation, and may enforce such payment by the appointment of a receiver and the sale of the property or otherwise as may be just."

Woodfin (T. R. Kemp, K.C., with him), for the defendants.—The defendants are entitled to an order under section 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893. This action was brought or instituted by a married woman, and this application for a new trial is a step in the action which is still pending. Under the section the court has power from time to time—as, for example, on dismissing this application—to order the defendant's costs to be paid out of property of the plaintiff subject to a restraint on anticipation. In Hood Barrs v. Cathcart, [1894] 3 Ch. 376, and Hood Barrs v. Heriot, 45 W. R. 507, [1897] A. C. 177, the married women were defendants.

Firminger (Hugo Young, K.C., with him), for the plaintiff.—The section is not applicable to this case. No doubt the action was instituted by a married woman, but the action came to an end when judgment was signed. The bringing of this appeal by the married woman is not the instituting of an action or proceeding within the meaning of the section. In Hood Barrs v. Cathcart Davey, L.J., said: "I take it that the words 'action or proceeding' must mean some action, or some proceeding in the nature of an action—that is to say, a proceeding in which a lis is initiated. . . . I have never myself heard of an appeal being 'instituted,' and I do not suppose anyone ever heard of such an expression being applied to an appeal."

COLLINS, M.R.—This case seems to be quite clear. The effect of section 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893, according to the construction put upon it by the judgments in the two cases which have been referred to, is that, where an action has been commenced by a married woman, the court has jurisdiction to order the costs of the opposite party to be paid out of the married woman's property, notwithstanding any restraint on anticipation. In Hood Barrs v. Cathcart Davey, L.J., expressly brings within the section such a case as the present. He says: "Wherever a married woman commences an action or litigation as plaintiff, then, if at any stage or proceeding in that action she is ordered to pay the costs, the court may, in such an action or litigation, order those costs to be paid out of her separate estate, notwithstanding any restraint on anticipation." This appeal is a stage or proceeding in an action commenced by a married woman. We have therefore jurisdiction to make the order which the defendants ask for, and I think it ought to be made.

MATHEW and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., concurred.

Order for payment of costs out of separate estate.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, H. W. Henniker Rance.

Solicitor for the defendant, W. B. Glasier.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Stirling and Mathew, L.JJ.) Feb. 24.

FROST v. AYLESBURY DAIRY CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Sale of goods— Warranty — Latent or undiscoverable defects—Particular purpose—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 71), s. 14, sub-section 1.

Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 14, sub-section 1, enacts: "Where the buyer expressly or by implication makes known to the seller the particular purpose for which the goods are required, so as to show that the buyer relies on the seller's skill or judgment, and the goods are of a description which it is in the course of the seller's business to supply (whether he be the manufacturer or not), there is an implied condition that the goods shall be reasonably fit for such purpose. . . ."

Held, that this condition is an absolute condition so as to cover latent or undiscoverable defects.

Held, further, if the article or commodity—e.g., milk, bears on its face the purpose for which it is intended, then the buyer makes known the particular purpose to the seller by implication, as contemplated by the section.

Appeal from the judgment of Grantham, J., sitting with a special jury.

The grounds for the appeal were (i.) various misdirections to the jury by the learned judge of which paragraph G is alone material: That if a purveyor of food provides food which is not fit for human food, but which is injurious to health and causes a person injury he is liable to damages; or alternatively omitting to direct the jury that such rule does not apply in the case of milk infected with germs of typhoid. (ii.) The verdict was against the weight of evidence.

The defendants carried on business as vendors of milk at Ealing and other places. The plaintiff and his wife, now deceased, had obtained their milk from the defendants for some years. In July, 1903, the plaintiff's wife contracted typhoid fever, as alleged, from the milk supplied by the defendant company. In August, 1903, she died from the effects thereof, and the plaintiff brought this action. In his statement of claim the plaintiff set up the contract between himself and the defendant company for the purchase and sale of milk, which contract he alleged included terms that the defendant company should take certain precautions to ensure that only pure milk free from all germs of disease should be supplied. The said terms were contained in an account book supplied by the defendant company to the plaintiff. They were of the nature of advertisements informing the consumer that the company insisted on the farms from which the supply of milk was drawn being frequently visited by medical officers of health, that every sample of milk was carefully analyzed by the company's expert staff, and such like. The plaintiff pleaded breach of the contract, and, further, that the milk was not reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was required.

In July, 1903, there was an epidemic of typhoid fever in the neighbourhood of Ealing, and it was found that a large proportion of the families, in which cases of infection arose, was supplied with milk by the defendant company. At this time the company was drawing its milk for the supply of the Ealing district under contract from Messrs. N. Keevil & Sons, at Bourton, near Shrivenham, in the county of Berks. The contract contained stringent terms with the view of insuring the purity of the milk, and in addition the company took all the precautions which in its account books it held itself out to take. In July, 1903, a boy, whose mother worked on Messrs. Keevil's farm, and who himself helped occasionally in milking the cows, contracted typhoid fever and died.

As this case is not reported on the question of the weight of evidence, the conclusions of expert witnesses are not here set out.

Macmorran, K.C. (Lawson Walton, K.C., and W. Mackenzie with him).—The action in so far as it is founded on contract must fail, because all the company undertook to do was to take every precaution, and that it did. Is there an implied warranty? Now, section 14, sub-section 1, of the Sale of Goods Act must be read in its entirety. The buyer must make known the particular purpose, so as to show he relies upon the skill or judgment of the seller. In this case the lady was an invalid, and if the plaintiff had asked the company for milk prepared for invalids then, the implied warranty might have sprung up. The company would have offered its sterilized milk or peptinized milk, not its ordinary milk. Sub-section 2 does not apply, because milk is not bought here by description. That is, "beer" is not bought by description, but Bass's beer is: see Wren v. Holt, 51 W. R. 435, [1903] 1 K. B. 610. It is on this distinction that Preist v. Last, 51 W. R. 678, [1903] 2 K. B. 148, is to be supported. There you had a hot-water bottle—i.e., not an ordinary bottle. The strongest case against me is Wallis v. Russell, [1902] 2 I. R. 585, where the illness was caused from eating crabs. But in that case the buyer relied upon the seller's skill and judgment. She asked for crabs, at first chose one herself, but, then upon the suggestion of the seller, finally bought a couple pointed out to her as being exceptionally good. Now it is admitted that it is impossible to trace without a prolonged bacteriological examination whether a sample of milk contains the baculli of typhoid. In fact before the examination were completed the milk would be of no use as milk. Now, how can the buyer be said to rely upon the skill of the seller when the seller by no means in his power could himself discover the defect.

Mackenzie addressed the court on the question of evidence.

Duke, K.C., and Holman Gregory, were not called upon.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal by the defendants from the decision of a special jury under the direction of Grantham, J. The action was brought by the plaintiff for damages sustained by the loss of his wife, caused, as he said, by typhoid fever, the infection of which was carried from milk supplied to the plaintiff and his wife. The jury found that the cause of the typhoid fever was the milk supplied to them by the defendants, and they held that under the circumstances the defendants were liable to the plaintiff in damages. The appeal is brought by the defendants. They say the learned judge misdirected the jury, and they say the verdict was against the weight of evidence.

The first point taken, and the one most pressed upon us in argument, was whether, in point of law, on the facts as ascertained, there could be any liability on the defendants, even if admitted that the milk sold by the defendants was the cause of the typhoid fever which occasioned the lady's death. It was strenuously argued by Mr. Macmorran that on these facts there was no actionable wrong done by the defendants. The main point is, then, whether the circumstances under which this milk was bought from the defendants bring the case within what was once a well-known principle of the common law, but is now crystalized into a statutory enactment. It is enacted by the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 14, as follows: [His lordship read the section as set out above to the end of sub-section 1.] Consider this section by steps. I do not think it necessary to deal with the alternative section, although cases may arise under it. It is said here: "It is true that this milk was bought by the plaintiff from the defendants, but was it bought under such circumstances 'as to show that the buyer relies on the seller's skill or judgment'?" It cannot be denied that "the goods are of a description which it is in the course of the seller's business to supply." The point is that it does not appear that the goods were bought "so as to show that the buyer relies on the seller's skill and judgment." We have not had elaborate evidence as to the inception of the contractual relations between these persons, the buyer and seller, because, as a matter of fact, people do not enter into elaborate negotiations with a vendor of milk. We begin the discussion at this state of things where the practice is established of obtaining the supply of milk for household consumption from the defendants. That involves a contract for the supply of food. What were the circumstances under which that contract was made? As for the "purpose," I do not suppose that anybody in their senses would question that the purpose for which the milk was bought was for the supply of milk for family use, not for, say, dyeing purposes, but for an article of consumption. It would be absurd to call evidence to prove the purpose. It would be assumed by everybody. The purpose being known, was the milk bought "so as to show that the buyer relies on the seller's skill or judgment"? If any seller did inform the mind of a buyer of his particular skill and care as an inducement to deal with him and not another, the Aylesbury Dairy Co. did here. Here is their book with information interlarded so as you may in no manner pass over their special knowledge in the matter of milk. You have on the first pink page the method of inspection of the milk described, the precautions taken in every particular. Then again you get another pink page pointing to the analysis of the milk—how it is taken—the bacteriological examination. Then comes details as to their staff, their chemists, their veterinary surgeons, and so on. You cannot escape being permeated with a sense of their extraordinary capacity to safe guard those who buy milk from them. Now, under what circumstances, could any buyer be said to put reliance on the "skill or judgment" of the seller if not under these circumstances. Now we come to the point of law pressed upon us by Mr. Macmorran. He says, how can you be said to rely upon the skill or judgment of the seller, when that seller, by any amount of skill or judgment, could not find out the fault? That means that though the goods be supplied for a particular purpose, you cannot become liable for latent defects unless under a special contract. That argument has not been addressed to us for the first time. It was employed before this Act was passed. It was employed when the law stood without the Act of Parliament which consolidated and crystallized it. The law is the same now under the statute as in the old days, and that very point has been dealt with in Randall v. Newsom, 25 W. R. 313, 2 Q. B. D. 102, a case of the greatest authority. In that case the Court of Appeal, consisting of Kelly, C.B., Mellish, L.J., and Brett and Amphlett, JJ.A., gave a considered judgment, which was delivered by Brett, J.A., who deals with this very point. He is questioning whether—in a sale made under circumstances where the buyer makes known the particular purpose for which he requires the article, a pole for his carriage—that sale does or does not include a warranty against defects which cannot be discovered by reason of the skill and judgment of the seller. "Is it an absolute warranty that the pole shall be reasonably fit for the purpose, or is it only partially to that effect, limited to defects which might be discovered by care and skill?" That is really Mr. Macmorran's point. At p. 109, Brett, J.A., says: "If the subject-matter be an article or commodity to be used for a particular purpose, the thing offered or delivered must answer that description—that is to say, it must be that article or commodity, and reasonably fit for the particular purpose. The governing principle, therefore, is that the thing offered and delivered under a contract of purchase and sale must answer the description of it which is contained in the words in the contract, or which would be so contained if the contract were accurately drawn out. And if that be the governing principle, there is no place in it for the suggested limitation. If the article or commodity offered or delivered does not in fact answer the description of it in the contract, it does not do so more or less because the defect in it is patent, or latent, or discoverable. And accordingly there is no suggestion of any such limitation in any of the judgments in cases relating to contracts of purchase and sale." That concludes the argument upon that part of the case. I may shortly refer to what was said in the case of the water-bottle: Preist v. Last, 51 W. R. 678, [1903] 2 K. B. 148. A great deal of difficulty arises in some of the cases where the question is whether the article was sold for a particular purpose or not, the article being one capable of being used for an indefinite number of purposes. But when you are dealing with an article which carries on its face the purpose for which it is used, that difficulty is cut out of the discussion. In this case we begin with a purchase of milk, and when we get to that we have excluded the 999 other purposes, because the article carries with it its special limitation for food. So the hot-water bottle described its purpose, and that was the principle upon which we decided that case. The same principle applies to milk, but in a higher degree. It was sold for a special purpose, and claimed and received the merit which was asserted for it in these advertisements. There is, therefore, no difficulty whatever in upholding this verdict. All this, however, assumes that the effects followed from the consumption of milk. [His lordship then discussed the facts as set out above, which he held constituted ample evidence upon which the jury could find a verdict for the plaintiff.] Then Mr. Macmorran questions to some extent the learned judge's direction as to the law. The learned judge directed the jury that "if a purveyor of food provides food which is not fit for human food . . ." I do not think I should quarrel with that on broad principle. It is not so much wrong as it is not a specific direction on the words of the section. It may have been desirable if the learned judge had addressed himself to the details of that section. But what has that to do with what we have to decide? Unless we think the specific words would have made any difference we ought not to interfere. It seems to me that we should be wrong, having the facts of this case clearly before us, if we found fault with the direction given by the learned judge on the point of law. Therefore, although with the greatest possible respect to the learned judge, I think his direction is capable of improvement in point of law, yet I think in this case we should be requiring a pedantic compliance if by reason of a technical inaccuracy we sent this case down again for trial. In my opinion, this judgment must stand, and the appeal must be dismissed.

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The terms of section 14 are: "Where the buyer expressly or by implication makes known the particular purpose for which the goods are required . . ." The purchase is clearly made here by implication. "So as to show the buyer relies in the skill . . ." Skill is quite sufficient for this purpose. In the ordinary course milk is supplied without the inspection of the buyer, so there is no question that discretion would be exercised by the buyer. And the buyer here reasonably relies upon the skill of the seller. Every effort had been made on the part of the sellers to give assurance to the buyer of their skill. Every precaution appears to have been taken which could have been taken to secure that the milk should be free from contamination or adulteration. [His lordship concurred with the view taken by Collins, M.R., as to the weight of evidence.]

STIRLING, L.J.—I agree with what has been said.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants, Harries, Wilkinson, & Raikes.

Solicitors for the respondent, Skipper & Tucker.

From K. B. Div.
(Collins, M.R., and Cozens-Hardy, L.J.) } Jan. 23.

BARRATT v. KEARNS. (a)

Defamation—Slander—Privilege—Ecclesiastical commission of inquiry—Absolute immunity—Pluralities Act, 1838 (1 & 2 Vict. c. 106), s. 77—Pluralities Acts Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 54), s. 3—Practice—Interrogatories—Right to refuse to answer—Alternative defences.

Where a bishop issues a commission under section 77 of the Pluralities Act, 1838, as amended by section 3 of the Pluralities Acts Amendment Act, 1885, to inquire as to whether the incumbent of a benefice has inadequately performed his ecclesiastical duties, evidence given before the commissioners comes within the rule under which evidence given in a court of justice is exempt from being made the subject-matter of an action of slander. Therefore in an action of slander, in which the plaintiff complains of such evidence, the defendant cannot be interrogated as to whether he spoke the words complained of.

In an action of slander the defendant pleaded that he did not speak the alleged words, and in the alternative that if he spoke them he did so upon the invitation of the plaintiff. The plaintiff administered interrogatories to the defendant asking whether he did not speak the alleged words, and how and when the plaintiff invited him to speak them. The defendant answered that he did not speak the alleged words, but that he did speak certain other words which he set out, and further that, as the alleged words were not the words he spoke, he was not called upon to answer the interrogatory as to how and when the plaintiff invited him to speak the alleged words.

Held, that the defendant must answer the last-mentioned interrogatory.

Appeal from an order of Jelf, J., at chambers, directing that the defendant should make further and better answers to certain interrogatories administered to him by the plaintiff. The action was brought to recover damages for slander.

The plaintiff was a clerk in holy orders and was the vicar of the Church of Holy Trinity, in the parish of Claygate, in the diocese of Winchester. The defendant was a resident in the parish of Claygate.

The plaintiff by his statement of claim alleged two separate slanders. The first slander was alleged to have been spoken by the defendant at a meeting of the vestry of the parish of Claygate, and was to the effect that the plaintiff had told the defendant that he, the plaintiff, had taken money collected for the poor and put it into his own pocket. The second slander was alleged to have been spoken by the defendant during the course of an inquiry which was not open to the public, held before a private ecclesiastical commission appointed by the Bishop of Winchester, and was to the effect that the plaintiff had been guilty of dishonourable conduct by cheating at golf and in other ways.

The defendant, by his defence, denied that he spoke any of the words complained of. Alternatively, he pleaded, with regard to the first alleged slander, that, if he spoke the words complained of, he did so on a privileged occasion and without malice, and, further, that he did so upon the invitation of the plaintiff. With regard to the second alleged slander, he pleaded alternatively that, if he spoke the words complained of, he did so as a witness upon a judicial inquiry held before an ecclesiastical commission duly appointed by the Bishop of Winchester, which commission had been appointed at the request of the plaintiff to inquire as to his conduct, and he said he would contend that no action lay in respect of any evidence given before such commission.

It appeared that, the plaintiff having become bankrupt, a writ of sequestration was issued against the benefice of Claygate. After the sequestration had remained in force for six months, the Bishop of Winchester, having been informed that the ecclesiastical duties of the benefice had been inadequately performed by the plaintiff, and that scandal and inconvenience might be likely to arise if the plaintiff was permitted to continue to perform the services of the church and to have pastoral cure of souls within the parish, issued a commission to inquire into the facts of the case and to report thereon to him. The commissioners were five in number, one of them, the Rev. William Tringham, being the rural dean of the deanery within which the benefice of Claygate was situate, and another, the Rev. Philip Richard Pipon Braithwaite, being a canon of Winchester. The commissioners heard evidence, but it did not appear to have been given on oath.

The words constituting the second slander were alleged to have been spoken by the defendant in giving evidence before the commissioners. The commissioners made a report unfavourable to the plaintiff, and the bishop inhibited the plaintiff from performing duty within the diocese.

The plaintiff administered certain interrogatories for the examination of the defendant on oath. The first and fourth interrogatories related to the words alleged to have been spoken at the vestry meeting. The first interrogatory asked whether the defendant did not speak the alleged words. The defendant's answer was that he did not speak the alleged words, but that he did speak certain other words, which he set out. The fourth interrogatory asked how and when the defendant said the plaintiff invited him to speak the alleged words. The defendant's answer was that, as the alleged words were not the words he spoke, he was not called upon to answer this interrogatory. The second interrogatory asked whether the defendant did not speak the words alleged to have been spoken by him at the court of inquiry. The defendant's answer to this was that he objected to answer this interrogatory on the grounds stated in his defence with regard to the second alleged slander.

On the application of the plaintiff, Jelf, J., ordered the defendant to make further and better answers to the second and fourth interrogatories.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendant appealed.

Hohler, for the defendant.—As to the fourth interrogatory, the defendant is not bound to answer it. By his answer to the first interrogatory he has denied that he spoke the alleged words. In his defence, besides the plea of denial, there is an alternative plea that if he spoke the alleged words, he did so upon the invitation of the plaintiff. He is now asked how and when the plaintiff invited him to speak the alleged words. He is not bound to answer a question with regard to words which he denies he ever spoke. [COLLINS, M.R.—The defence that he spoke the words on the invitation of the plaintiff is a separate defence from that of denial. Under the old system of pleading there would have been two entirely distinct pleas. The fact that the second plea is now introduced with an "if" does not make it any the less a separate defence. The defendant is asked how he was invited by the plaintiff to speak the words. He cannot resist answering that by falling back on his denial that he ever spoke the words.] As to the second interrogatory, the words to which it relates were spoken as evidence before a judicial tribunal. The commission was appointed by the bishop under statutory powers conferred by section 77 of the Pluralities Act, 1838 (1 & 2 Vict. c. 106), as amended by section 3 of the Pluralities Acts Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 54), and sections 1 and 5 of the Sequestration Act, 1871. The Pluralities Acts are not referred to by name in the document appointing the commission, but in a letter from the bishop's secretary to the chairman of the commission the statute 48 & 49 Vict. c. 54 is referred to. Evidence given before such a tribunal is absolutely privileged, and no action can be brought upon it. And because no action can be brought upon it, any interrogatory based on it is wholly irrelevant and inadmissible.

He referred to Bonaker v. Evans, 16 Q. B. 162; Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby, 21 W. R. 544; Marks v. Frogley, 46 W. R. 548, [1898] 1 Q. B. 888.

Hugh Fraser, for the plaintiff.—The defendant ought to answer the second interrogatory unless he can establish a clear case of privilege. The burden is on the defendant to show that the commission was properly constituted under section 3 of the Pluralities Acts Amendment Act, 1885. The section is very precise in its terms as to the description of the persons who may be named as commissioners. There is no conclusive evidence to show that the requirements of that statute have been complied with. Further, no oath was administered to the witnesses before the commission, nor were any witnesses compelled to attend. Absolute privilege ought not to be extended beyond those cases in which the courts have recognized its existence: Royal Aquarium and Summer and Winter Garden Society v. Parkinson, 40 W. R. 450, [1892] 1 Q. B. 431.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from an order of Jelf, J., that the defendant in an action of slander should give further answers to two of a set of interrogatories delivered by the plaintiff

The fourth interrogatory asks how and when the defendant said the plaintiff invited him to speak the words constituting the first slander complained of. The defendant had pleaded alternatively that he did not speak the words complained of, that he spoke the words on a privileged occasion and without malice, and also that he spoke them upon the invitation of the plaintiff. The defendant's answer to this interrogatory is that, as the words complained of are not the words he spoke, he is not called upon to answer it. But the plea that he spoke them upon the invitation of the plaintiff is a separate defence, and there is no reason why he should not answer this interrogatory. As to that, therefore, the appeal fails.

A more important question arises with regard to an earlier interrogatory—viz., the second of the set. This interrogatory asks the defendant whether he did not speak the words constituting the other slander complained of. The defendant objects to answer this on the ground, broadly stated, that the words, if spoken at all, were spoken on an occasion which conferred absolute privilege with regard to them. The privilege thus claimed is peculiar to statements made in the course of a judicial inquiry. The question is whether the occasion on which these words were spoken was a judicial inquiry. It is well settled that evidence given in a court of law is privileged, not merely sub modo in the absence of malice, but absolutely. In this case the occasion was an inquiry instituted by the Bishop of Winchester in accordance with certain statutes. The plaintiff, who was a clergyman, had become bankrupt, and his benefice had been sequestered, and it had remained under sequestration for more than six months. This state of things is provided for by section 77 of the Pluralities Act, 1838. That section enacts as follows: "Whenever the bishop shall see reason to believe that the ecclesiastical duties of any benefice are inadequately performed, it shall be lawful for him to issue a commission to four beneficed clergymen of his diocese . . . one whereof shall be the rural dean, if any, of the rural deanery or district wherein such benefice is situated, directing them to inquire into the facts of the case; and it shall be lawful for the incumbent of the said benefice to add to such commissioners one other incumbent of a benefice within the same diocese; and if the said commissioners or the major part of them report in writing under their hands to the said bishop that, in their opinion, the duties of such benefice are inadequately performed, it shall be lawful for such bishop, if he shall see fit, by writing under his hand, to require the spiritual person holding such benefice, though he may actually reside or be engaged in performing the duties thereof, to nominate to him a fit person or persons, with sufficient stipend or stipends, to be licensed by him to perform or to assist in performing such duties, specifying therein the grounds of such requisition." By section 3 of the Pluralities Acts Amendment Act, 1885, so much of the above section as relates to the persons to act as commissioners on inquiries as to inadequate performance of ecclesiastical duties is repealed, and it is provided instead thereof that such commission shall be issued to four commissioners, one of whom shall be the archdeacon or rural dean of the archdeaconry or rural deanery wherein the benefice is situated, one other shall be a canon of the cathedral of the diocese, one other shall be a beneficed clergyman to the archdeaconry, one other shall be a layman in the commission of the peace for the county, and one other may be added by the incumbent. In the present case the bishop issued a commission to five persons, some of whom certainly fill the position of persons designated by the Act, one of them being the rural dean and another being a canon of Winchester. The commission is to the following effect: "Whereas the said benefice of Claygate is under sequestration, and by virtue of the Sequestration Act, 1871, if a sequestration issues and remains in force for a period of six months, the bishop of the diocese is required from and after the expiration of such period of six months and as long as the sequestration remains in force to take order for the due performance of the services of the church of the benefice with power to appoint such curate or curates or additional curate or curates as the case may require with such stipend in each case as the bishop thinks fit, and in such case the bishop, if it appears to him that scandal or inconvenience is likely to arise from the incumbent continuing to perform the services of the church while the sequestration remains in force, may from and after the expiration of such period inhibit the incumbent from performing any services of the church within the diocese so long as the sequestration shall remain in force and may at any time withdraw such inhibition, and whereas we the said Bishop of Winchester have been informed that the ecclesiastical duties of the said benefice of Claygate have been inadequately performed by the Rev. Alfred Allen Barratt and that scandal and inconvenience may be likely to arise if the said Alfred Allen Barratt is permitted to continue to perform the services of the church and to have pastoral cure of souls within the parish, and whereas we have given to the said Alfred Allen Barratt notice in writing of our intention to issue our commission of inquiry in this respect, Now we the said Bishop of Winchester do by these presents commission and direct you the said Rev. William Tringham, Rev. Cyril Fletcher Grant, Rev. Philip Richard Pipon Braithwaite, Frank Eastwood, and Ramsay Nares, to inquire into the facts of the case, you first giving the said Alfred Allen Barratt due notice of this commission (by forwarding to him a copy of the same) and of the time and place appointed by you to meet for the purpose of the said inquiry, and we do further direct and require you or the major part of you to report to us in writing under your hands whether or not you find upon such inqury that the duties of the said benefice have been and are, in your opinion, inadequately performed, and whether or not, in your opinion, scandal or inconvenience is likely to arise from the said Alfred Allen Barratt continuing to perform the services of the church and to have the pastoral cure of souls within the parish, and to transmit to us with such report this commission and the evidence or statements taken by you in the execution thereof." This seems to be most distinctly a constitution by the bishop of a judicial tribunal in accordance with the powers conferred on him by statute. It is to be noticed that he uses the words which occur in the Pluralities Acts as to the duties of the benefice being inadequately performed, as well as the words "scandal and inconvenience" which occur in the Sequestration Act. It follows that the evidence given before the commissioners comes within the rule which I have stated. It has been argued on the part of the plaintiff that it is not clear that all conditions precedent have been satisfied, that the defendant has failed to show that the persons named as commissioners are such persons as are required by the Act of 1885. But I think this is a case to which we ought to apply the maxim Omnia presumuntur rite esse acta. In my opinion the onus is on the objector to show that any condition has not been complied with. Having all the materials for coming to a conclusion before me, including a letter from the bishop referring to the statute 48 & 49 Vict. c. 54, I have no doubt that this commission was a tribunal of which it must be held that evidence given before it was entitled to privilege, and that privilege an absolute privilege. The case of Royal Aquarium Society v. Parkinson is a strong authority for this view. There Lord Esher, M.R., said: "It is true that in respect of statements made in the course of proceedings before a court of justice, whether by judge, counsel, or witnesses, there is an absolute immunity from liability to an action. The ground of that rule is public policy. It is applicable to all kinds of courts of justice; but the doctrine has been carried further; and it seems that this immunity applies wherever there is an authorized inquiry which, though not before a court of justice, is before a tribunal which has similar attributes. In the case of Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby the doctrine was extended to a military court of inquiry. It was so extended on the ground that the case was one of an authorized inquiry before a tribunal acting judicially—that is to say, in a manner as nearly as possible similar to that in which a court of justice acts in respect of an inquiry before it. This doctrine has never been extended further than to courts of justice and tribunals acting in a manner similar to that in which such courts act." That describes the tribunal in this case, and it follows that the evidence given before it was absolutely privileged. The defendant therefore ought not to be ordered to answer the second interrogatory, and this part of the appeal must be allowed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J., concurred.

Appeal allowed in part.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Richards & Barnett.

Solicitors for the defendant, F. J. Abbott, for F. J. Bell, Kingston-on-Thames.

Appeal.
(Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Jan. 18.

PLANT v. WRIGHT & CO. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation — Building "being constructed" — Measuring up plumbing work—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7.

A contractor for the construction of a factory subcontracted with another contractor whereby the latter agreed for a lump sum to do the plumbing work in the factory. The plumbing work was a part of the work of construction, and under the contract with the plumbing contractor it was necessary that the plumbing work should be measured up. A firm of engineers had entered into an independent contract with the owner to erect and fix the necessary machinery and steam-pipes. After the building contractor had finished the work of building, and after the plumbing work had been finished, the plumbing contractor sent one of his workmen, who had been employed on the plumbing work, to measure up the work. While measuring it up he was injured by an accident. At this time the contractors for the erection of the machinery and steam-pipes were engaged upon their work, which was part of the work of construction of the building, and for that purpose they had erected a scaffolding. The building was over thirty feet high. In proceedings against the plumbing contractor to have compensation assessed under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897,

Held, that, as the measuring up of the plumbing work was incidental to and a necessary part of that work, which was itself part of the work of construction, the measuring up of the work was part of the work of construction, and that therefore the injured workman was at time of the accident employed by the undertakers on, in, or about a building which was being constructed by means of a scaffolding, and was therefore entitled to compensation.

Appeal from an award of compensation by Judge Whitehorne at the Birmingham County Court under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

Messrs. Withall & Co., who were builders, agreed with Messrs. Rawlings & Co. to build a factory for them. The contract with Withall & Co. did not include the erection of the necessary machinery and steam-pipes, an independent contract for that purpose being made by Rawlings & Co. with a firm of engineers named Danks & Co. Withall & Co. sub-contracted with Wright & Co. for the execution by the latter of the plumbing work in the factory for a lump sum. In settling the contract price for the plumbing work, the men's time in measuring up the work when finished was included, and under the contract it was necessary that the work should be measured up. The plumbing work was admittedly part of the construction. A fortnight after the plumbing work had been finished, the applicant, who was a plumber in the employment of Wright & Co., and had been employed by them on the plumbing work of the factory, was sent by them with an assistant to the factory to measure up the work, when he stumbled over a furnace rake and fell and broke his arm. At the time of the accident Withall & Co. had finished their work, and the factory had been formally handed over by them to Rawlings & Co., but Danks & Co. were still engaged in fixing the machinery and steam-pipes in the factory, and for this purpose they had erected a scaffolding. The factory at the time exceeded thirty feet in height.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In proceedings to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the county court judge, in giving his decision, said that it was plain that at the time of the accident the building, which exceeded thirty feet in height, was still being constructed by means of the scaffolding which Danks & Co. were using to complete it. That being so, the question was whether the applicant was at the time "employed by the undertakers" on, in, or about the building. In his opinion those words meant in some sense employed in or about the construction. If the undertakers merely sent a man who had been formerly employed on work, then finished, on some message or for some purpose wholly unconnected with the work, it would not be reasonable to hold them liable to compensate him if an accident happened to him while so employed by them. Employed could not mean employed for any purpose or for any time. That brought him to the question whether measuring up was part of the work itself. Was the man, who was employed by the undertakers to measure up constructive work when finished, employed by the undertakers on, in, or about the construction of the building? The undertakers' work was finished and for that very reason it had to be measured up. The question turned on the meaning of the word "construction." The nearest case seemed to him to be Frid v. Fenton, 69 L. J. Q. B. 436, 48 W. R. Dig. 110, where it was held that a building which had been constructed by means of a scaffolding was still in course of construction until the scaffolding was removed, the removal of the scaffolding being part of the work of construction. In his opinion the necessary measuring up of constructive work was an integral part of the construction, and therefore the applicant was entitled to compensation under the Act.

The employers appealed.

H. A. McCardie, for the employers.—The county court judge was wrong in holding that the construction of the building was still going on when the accident happened. The building was finished, and Danks & Co., who were the contractors for fitting up the machinery, and who had put up the scaffolding, were not engaged upon any work of construction at all. The building was therefore not being constructed at the time of the accident. Secondly, if the work being done by Danks was part of the construction of the building, the measuring up of the plumbing work was no part of the work of construction. The plumbing work, which was admittedly part of the work of construction, was finished, and the measuring up of that work formed no part of the work of construction. The employment must be, as the county court judge held, employment by the undertakers, which means in or about the construction. In Frid v. Fenton, 69 L. J. Q. B. 436, 48 W. R. Dig. 110, this court held that the construction of a building is not complete until the scaffolding is removed. But that is a very different case, because a building cannot be said to be complete as long as it is surrounded by scaffolding. The plumbing work was complete before being measured up, and the measuring up added nothing to its completion. The measuring up was therefore no part of the construction, and the applicant was not entitled to compensation.

Cannot, for the applicant, was not called upon.

COLLINS, M.R.—The short facts of this case are as follows: The workman who was injured was employed by the undertakers upon the plumbing work in a factory, the construction of which had been undertaken by another contractor. The brickwork of the factory was to a great extent completed. The building being a factory, machinery and steam-pipes had to be put in, and for that purpose scaffolding had to be used. At the time of the accident the building exceeded thirty feet in height. The plumbing work had been finished, but had not been measured up, and under the contract between the contractor for the building and the plumbing contractor the latter had undertaken to measure up the plumbing work when finished. That was part of the work for which the plumbing contractor was to be paid, and under the contract it was a necessary step in the completion of the plumbing work. While the workman and his assistant were measuring up the work the former met with an accident. The question is whether, at the time of the accident, the workman was "employed by the undertakers on, in, or about a building which was being constructed by means of scaffolding." It is said that, as the plumbing work was finished, and as the building was completed so far as the building contractor was concerned, and as nothing remained to be done except to measure up the plumbing work and to fit up the machinery and steam-pipes, the workman was not at the time of the accident employed on, in, or about the construction of the building. In Frid v. Fenton we decided that a building is still "being constructed" until the scaffolding is taken down—that is to say, that the removal of the scaffolding forms part of the work of construction. The principle of that decision seems to me to cover the present case. The work of measuring up is incidental to and part of the main work of plumbing quite as much as the taking down of the scaffolding is incidental to and part of the construction of the building. The plumbing work in the factory was part of the work of the construction of the building, and the measuring it up is incidental to that work and part of it, and is therefore part of the work of construction. The injured workman was therefore, at the time of the accident, employed on, in, or about the construction of the building. That is the main point in the case. A further point has been taken that the scaffolding was put up, not by the undertakers for the construction of the building nor by the plumbing contractor, but by the persons who were fitting the machinery and steam-pipes, and that this latter work was no part of the construction of the building. This point, however, was not taken before the county court judge. He treated the scaffolding as being at the time used for completing the construction of the building—that is, for the construction of a necessary part of the building itself. So far as the scaffolding was used for the purpose of fitting up the machinery he treated it as being used for the purpose of construction. That was not contested in the county court, and the point was not taken there and is not open now. That being so, it is immaterial that the scaffolding was not put up by the plumbing contractor. For these reasons I think that the decision was right, and that the appeal fails.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is whether the measuring up of the plumbing work is part of the work of construction of the building. It seems to me, from what we know of the contract between the building contractor and the plumber, that it manifestly is. The plumbing work had to be measured up before payment for it was made, and the time occupied in measuring it up seems to me have been a part of the time occupied in the construction. The case of Frid v. Fenton as to the removal of the scaffolding seems to me to be in point. The measuring up of the plumbing work was an essential part of that work, which was itself part of the work of construction of the building. With regard to the other point, I agree with the Master of the Rolls upon it.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the applicant, Judge & Priestley, for Philip Baker & Co., Birmingham.

Solicitors for the employers, Ward, Bowie, & Co., for T. W. Walthall, Birmingham.

Appeal.
(Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) Jan. 16.

CASTLE SPINNING CO. (LIMITED) v. ATKINSON. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation — Redemption of weekly payment — Limitation of sum in request for arbitration—Jurisdiction of arbitrator—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), Schedule I., par. 13.

Where an employer requests an arbitration with respect to the redemption of a weekly payment of compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, he has no right to limit the jurisdiction of the arbitrator by stating in his request for arbitration the highest sum which he is willing to pay by way of redemption.

Appeal from an award of the judge of the Ashton-under-Lyne and Stalybridge County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

On the 17th of July, 1903, Joseph Atkinson, a workman in the employment of the Castle Spinning Co. (Limited), was accidentally injured in the course of his employment.

On the 7th of August the employers and the workman entered into an agreement for the payment by them to him of the weekly sum of 20s. during his incapacity for work resulting from the injury, and a memorandum of the agreement was duly recorded.

After an interval of six months the employers applied to the county court judge, under paragraph 13 of the first schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act, for redemption of their liability for the weekly payment by the payment of a lump sum.

Paragraph 13 of the first schedule is as follows: "Where any weekly payment has been continued for not less than six months, the liability therefor may, on the application by or on behalf of the employer, be redeemed by the payment of a lump sum, to be settled, in default of agreement, by arbitration under this Act, and such lump sum may be ordered by the committee or arbitrator to be invested or otherwise applied as above-mentioned."

The request for arbitration by the employer was as follows: "An arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, is hereby requested between the Castle Spinning Co. (Limited) and Joseph Atkinson with respect to the review and termination, diminution, or redemption limited to the amount hereinafter set forth of the weekly payment payable to the said Joseph Atkinson under the said Act, in respect of personal injury caused to the said Joseph Atkinson by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment." Certain particulars were annexed in which the relief sought was stated as follows: "The applicants say that the respondent is no longer totally incapacitated for work by the said accident, and they, therefore, ask for an order terminating or reducing the said weekly payment. . . . Alternatively, the applicants seek to have the said weekly payments redeemed by the payment of a sum not exceeding £150, which sum the applicants are willing to pay the respondent by way of redemption."

The county court judge by his award fixed the sum to be paid by way of redemption at £150.

The workman appealed.

C. A. Russell, K.C., and Adshead Elliott, for the workman.—The award was made without jurisdiction, for the request for arbitration was made in a form which is not authorized by the Act. The form of request is prescribed in the Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1898, Appendix A, Form 5. The right to apply for redemption of a weekly payment is given by the Act to the employer only, not to the workman. The employer has no right to fetter the jurisdiction of the arbitrator by naming in his request the utmost sum which he is willing to pay. Such a limitation of the arbitrator's jurisdiction is not to be found in the form, neither is it authorized by the Act itself. The proper question to be submitted to the arbitrator is what lump sum he thinks ought to be paid by way of redemption. Here the employers propose to put to him the question whether £150 is enough. If such a limitation were allowed, and if the arbitrator answered that the sum mentioned was not enough, the whole proceedings would be rendered abortive.

Arthur Powell, K.C., and Wingate-Saul, for the employers.—The form used in this case is unobjectionable; it does no harm to the workman, and it safeguards the employer. If it is not allowed no employer will be able to avail himself of the right for redemption without taking a leap in the dark, for the arbitrator may order him to pay a sum which he is not able to pay. The forms given in the appendix to the Workmen's Compensation Rules are merely permissive, and parties may use "forms of the like character with such variations as the circumstances may require": see rule 67.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of a county court judge on an application for the termination, diminution, or redemption of a weekly payment of compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act. The power to redeem a weekly payment depends on paragraph 13 of the first schedule to the Act. [His lordship read the paragraph.] Here, the weekly payment having continued to be made for more than six months, the employers applied to the county court judge. In their request for arbitration they "ask for an order terminating or reducing the said weekly payment"; and in the alternative they seek to have the said weekly payments redeemed by the payment of a sum not exceeding £150, which sum the applicants are willing to pay the respondent by way of redemption. The county court allowed redemption at the sum of £150. It is now contended on the part of the workman that the limitation contained in the request for arbitration of the sum which the employers are willing to pay by way of redemption is something outside the language of the Act, something which was not contemplated by the Act, and that it is an attempt to introduce a new term into the Act. It is suggested that this limitation might have a prejudicial effect on the mind of the arbitrator. In the present case it seems to me to have had no effect whatever on the decision of the county court judge, who has dealt with the case as if no such limitation had been imposed. But the technical question has to be answered whether or not a request in this form is bad because it limits the jurisdiction of the arbitrator. I have come to the conclusion that it is. Having regard to the terms of paragraph 13 of the first schedule, it seems to me that the Act does not contemplate a limited arbitration of this kind. The Act confers a certain privilege on the employer, and on the employer only. The workman has no option but to go on receiving the weekly payments, subject to the right to apply for a review and increase of the weekly payment. He has no right of asking for redemption of the weekly payment by a lump sum. The employer has that right given him, but he must take it on the terms on which it is given. If he avails himself of it, and asks for leave to redeem, he must pay such lump sum as the arbitrator may determine. In my opinion there is no power to fetter the discretion of the arbitrator, or to force the workman to waste time or incur expense in investigating a proposal which may prove abortive. If this were allowed, and if the arbitrator should be of opinion that the sum named was not enough, he would have no power to award what he thought was enough. It seems to me that the Legislature has not conferred on the employer the right of making an experiment as to whether the sum which he is prepared to pay is sufficient. The objection, though a technical one, is one which goes to the jurisdiction, and therefore this award cannot be treated as binding, though, as I have said, there is no reason to suppose the award would have been different if the limitation had not been inserted in the request for arbitration. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

MATHEW and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the workman, Bower, Cotton, & Bower, for J. B. Pownall, Ashton-under-Lyne.

Solicitors for the employers, William Hurd & Son, for Chapman & Brooks, Manchester.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. }
Buckley, J. } Feb. 7, 15.

In re NELSON & CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Winding up—Life assurance—Scheme for reduction of contracts — Other business — Separate accounts—Mixed payments—Pension tea—Inequality of reduction—Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 61), ss. 4 and 22.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

A company sold tea to women at a price above the market price upon the terms that it would grant to various classes of customers in certain events weekly sums as pensions for life so long as the customers bought the tea of the company and remained widows. The company became insolvent, and a petition was presented to have it wound up. The company proposed to continue business, and put forward a scheme for reduction of their contracts to pay the pensions, by which a new company was to be formed, which would sell the tea and pay 75 per cent. of the extra price to the old company, which should insure the payment of the pensions. The reduction proposed was unequal as between the various classes of customers.

Held, that such a scheme of reduction would not be approved, because (1) it involved the pensioners making new contracts with a new company, and therefore was not within section 22 of the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870; (2) the business of life insurance could not be carried out in compliance with section 4 of the same Act, as the premiums to be taken could not be dealt with as separate sums and be carried to a separate account; and (3) the proposed reduction being unequal as between the various classes of pensioners was not authorized by section 22 of the Act.

Petition.

This was a petition that the above company might be wound up by the court on the ground of insolvency.

The company was formed in July, 1901, with a capital of £101,000 in £1 shares. All the shares had been issued and were fully paid up.

Another company, the Nelson Share Syndicate (Limited), at the date of the petition, held all the shares except the seven held by the subscribers.

The objects of the company were (amongst others) (a) To acquire the business of Rasmus Jansen, trading as Nelson & Co., of Louth, tea dealers, and to take over the contracts entered into by Jansen in the business, and to enter into an agreement already prepared between Jansen and the company; and (b) to effect insurances for life, to issue pensions, and carry on the business of insurance generally.

In carrying on his business, Jansen had issued cards by which he offered to grant pensions to widows of a similar description to those subsequently mentioned in connection with the company.

The company adopted the said agreement and took over the liabilities of Jansen, to whom, as vendor, 100,000 fully paid-up shares were issued.

The company deposited a sum of £20,000 in court as required by the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870, it having been decided in a previous action that Jansen's business came within that Act.

In carrying on their business of tea dealers the company issued cards to their customers which stated that they would pay 10s. per week to every woman who had purchased not less than half a pound of their pension tea for fifty weeks before becoming a widow, such payments to continue as long as she remained a widow and bought the the same amount of tea from the company, and also 10s. per week to every woman becoming a widow before buying from the company, if she bought half a pound of tea per week for ten years, so long as she remained a widow and continued buying the tea. And those who bought only a quarter of a pound of tea were to receive 5s. instead of 10s. The cards further stated that the rights of the widows would be limited to receiving those sums rateably out of 75 per cent. of the net profits on the tea, and that they should have no other rights against the company. The chief difference between the cards of Jansen and those of the company was that the former contained no limitation of the pensions to any particular fund. The number of customers of the company increased rapidly, and ultimately reached something like 500,000 or 600,000, while at the date of the petition there were over 19,000 widows entitled to pensions which amounted in the aggregate to a sum of between £8,000 and £9,000 a week. According to the actuarial evidence, which was not controverted, the reserve which the company should have had to meet the pensions thus payable, and the prospective liability, was nearly £30,000,000. The amount, however, could not be accurately determined, and making large deductions, for instance, for 75 per. cent of the persons then buying ceasing to do so, his lordship thought £10,000,000 would be about the lowest proper reserve. To meet this liability the company had available for the annuitants a sum of less than £20,000, the amount deposited being liable to some deductions.

The petition was presented by Mrs. Bower, a widow entitled to 10s. a week under the terms mentioned, and by two other women who were purchasing tea upon the terms of the cards with the view of obtaining pensions. The petition was opposed upon the ground that if the company continued its business, and had the pensions reduced under the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870, according to a scheme which will be found sufficiently described in the judgment, it would be advantageous to all parties.

Eve, K.C., and Ward Coldridge, for the petitioners.

Astbury, K.C., and E. O. Simpson, W. Finlay, Frank Dodd, and Eldridge, for parties supporting petition.

Buckmaster, K.C., and R. Rowlands, for the company.

R. J. Parker, for the Board of Trade.

[His lordship made a winding-up order upon the conclusion of the arguments, and on a subsequent day stated his reasons.]

Feb. 15.—BUCKLEY, J.—This is a petition to wind up Nelson & Co. (Limited) on the ground of its insolvency The insolvency is not, and cannot be, disputed. The only defence has been that, in the interests of the unfortunate persons who are the policy-holders of or entitled to the benefit of annuity contracts in the company, the court should adopt, with or without modification, a scheme which has been put forward, and which is said to be a scheme for the reduction of the company's contracts under section 22 of the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870. The business of Nelson & Co. (Limited) may be described as that of attracting married women to become customers of the company and purchasers of the company's tea, at prices largely above its fair market value by the promise of impossible pensions to be paid to them if and when they became widows. The pension scheme rested upon no actuarial basis of any kind. It ignored the age of the husband on whose death the pension would commence. It ignored the age of the wife during whose widowhood it would be payable. It ignored with some exceptions the health and expectation of life of the husband. The loading which was added to the price of the tea, and which may in a sense be regarded as the premium paid for the annuity contract, bore no actuarial relation whatever to the liability which the company was undertaking. Under no circumstances could it have justified a pension of anything approaching 10s. a week. Even the 8d. a pound overcharged for tea did not go to provide for the annuity contracts; it went into the general business; and under the company's contracts, the policy-holders could look only to 75 per cent. of the profits realized by its employment with the company's other funds in the business.

The result has been to bring the company to a state of insolvency. Upon every ground a stop ought to be put to such a company. In the interest of the pensioners, however, the court is asked to consider a scheme of reduction of contracts under the Life Assurance Companies Acts. A scheme has been brought in. It is, in my opinion, open to insuperable objections upon several grounds. In the first place, it involves that this company shall continue business—a course to which, in the absence of overpowering reasons in the interest of the customers, I should not accede. Secondly, it proceeds upon a footing that a system of business shall be continued by which customers shall be attracted to become purchasers of tea at a price loaded with a sum to represent the premium on the insurance benefit, such sum, however, not being payable as a premium capable of being dealt with in the manner required by section 4 of the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870, but included in a lump sum which is to be dealt with in the manner indicated in the scheme. Stating it in figures, the matter would stand somewhat thus: The tea purchased by the company costs, it is said, 1s. 3d. to 1s. 5d. per pound, and would fairly be retailed at 1s. 8d. per pound. Sale of the tea was made, and would under the scheme continue to be made, at 2s. 4d. per pound, thus providing a loading of 8d. per pound to form the premium income to support the annuity contracts. The scheme involves that a new company called the Nelson Trading Co. (Limited) shall sell the tea and shall pay 75 per cent. of the loading (6d. a pound) to this company (Nelson & Co. (Limited)), which shall, as between the two companies, be the insurer of what is called the insured customer of the Nelson Trading Co. (Limited). A scheme of that kind is, to my mind, not a reduction of contracts of Nelson & Co. (Limited). It is a scheme under which the customer, if he is minded to make a new contract with the Nelson Trading Co. (Limited), is to be entitled to a reduced benefit out of his previously existing contract with Nelson & Co. (Limited). This is not, in my opinion, within section 22 of the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870. That section authorizes a reduction of the contract between A. and the company, but not a provision by which A. shall enter into a new contract with a new company, and as the result of that shall be entitled to a reduced benefit from his contract with the old company. Again, section 4 of the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870, requires that a separate account shall be kept of all receipts in respect of the annuity contracts, and that the receipts shall be carried to and form a separate fund absolutely the security of the annuity-holders. The scheme of business which I am now asked to wind up, and the scheme of reduction which I am asked to approve, is one under which the payment which the assured makes by way of premium is not a separate sum capable of being kept separate and appropriated, as required by section 4. The 2s. 4d. per pound which she pays is what I may call a contributory sum for securing two benefits—the present receipt of one pound of tea, and the expectation of a future sum of money contingent upon widowhood. I do not think that this is consistent with the Act of Parliament. Another fatal objection is that, as counsel for the company conceded, the reduction of the contracts which they propose is a reduction of inequality as between the policy-holders. That which the Act allows is the reduction of all contracts to the relief of the common debtor, but not a reduction which operates in inequality as between the common creditors. I do not mean that absolute arithmetical equality must be ensured, but a scheme which proceeds upon a principle of inequality of reduction is not, I think, within the Act. Again, no sort of benefit is granted to the existing customers of the company which is not granted to new customers, unless it may be a trifling advantage in admitting the old customers to benefits within the first year. Other objections there are of a commercial rather than a legal character. Thus, as a matter of business, it is, I think, idle to anticipate that the new trading company could as a trading company ever legitimately get capital for its undertaking upon the terms proposed—namely, that 95 per cent. of its profits should be handed over under the scheme, and 5 per cent. of its profits should be the only fund for expectation of dividend. Again, there is no practical means of ensuring that the trading company shall not so work its business, or so prepare its accounts, as that its net profits shall be whittled down to practically nothing. A suggestion was made by counsel for the company that some machinery should be provided by which this court, or some authority, should retain control over the price which the company should charge for its tea, and to insure that the present system should not continue, under which the tea dealing company should be bound to buy all its stock from particular persons, of course to their profit. Such suggestions, to my mind, are illusory. Another objection which weighs strongly with me is that the effect of this scheme is to create what I may call a tied insurance business, a system under which customers are to pay too much for their tea upon the terms that the excess shall be taken by them, not to such insurance office as they like, to insure an annuity, but that they shall be tied to Nelson & Co. (Limited), being such a company as I have described, as their insurers. I see no advantage, but every disadvantage, to the customer in this provision. It is said, on the other hand, that to reject any such scheme is to throw away the value of what is called—using a term singularly inappropriate to the facts of this case—the "goodwill" of the company, and that the widows, being confined to 75 per cent. of the profits, can get nothing in the winding up beyond the £20,000. As to the latter, I am not sure that this is so; but I say no more upon the point, for it may well have to be considered in the course of the winding up. I am clear, however, that, even if this be so, it is more to the interest of the policy-holders to put an end at once to this concern, even if that which they get out of the wreck be but a small sum. For these reasons I think that the scheme for reduction of contracts is impossible and cannot be approved, and I therefore, at the conclusion of the argument, pronounced a winding-up order.

Solicitors, L. Weatherley, for Alfred Pearson, Manchester; Helder, Roberts, & Co., for Simpson & Co., Leeds; Baker, Baker, & Co.; Smiles & Litchfield; Oswald Bird & Co.; R. R. Norman; Solicitor of Board of Trade.

Chan. Div. Joyce, J. } Jan. 11; Feb. 4.

MARSHALL v. JAMES. (a.)

Practice—Judgment creditor—Garnishee order absolute—Money paid under it—Order obtained on erroneous allegation of material facts—Setting aside order.

A garnishee order obtained upon an allegation of material facts, which turns out to be erroneous, can be set aside, notwithstanding it has been made absolute.

Moore v. Peachey, 66 L. T. 198, followed.

(a.) Reported by R. FRANKLIN STUBBING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was a motion to discharge a garnishee order absolute.

The plaintiff Marshall entered into partnership with the present applicant, Witham, on the 9th of December, 1903, and carried on business under the name of Marshall & Co.

The defendant James recovered judgment against Marshall on the 9th of March, 1903, in the above action.

Upon an allegation, supported by affidavit, but afterwards found to be mistaken, that Cullen and Teetgen & Co. owed debts to Marshall, the usual garnishee order nisi was made, on the 11th of October, 1904, upon the application of James, and served on the debtors.

It was made absolute on the 14th of November and served upon Cullen's solicitors, Teetgen & Co. having been served with the order nisi, but not appearing. By the order it was ordered that Cullen should pay James the sum of £13 9s. owed by Cullen to the plaintiff, and that Teetgen & Co. should pay James the sum of £21 8s. 4d. owed by Teetgen & Co. to the plaintiff.

Upon the present applicant, Witham, discovering this, he applied to set aside the garnishee order upon the ground that at its date no debt was due from either of the garnishees to Marshall, but that such debts were due and owing to the firm of Marshall & Co., in which he was a partner. It then appeared that Marshall and Witham carried on business as Marshall & Co. and that the debts were really contracted with the firm of Marshall & Co., and so were not payable to Marshall alone. Cullen had not paid anything under the order, but Teetgen & Co. had paid £21 8s. 4d. to James, the judgment creditor. They had not filed any evidence as to mistake upon this motion.

Lincoln Reed, for the applicant.—A garnishee order absolute can be set aside (Moore v. Peachey, 66 L. T. 198, 40 W. R. Dig. 184), the court having an inherent jurisdiction to set aside an order which it has been induced to make by fraud or the suppression, however innocent, of material facts.

R. Nevill, for the respondent James.—Moore v. Peachey was a case where the application was made by the garnishee on the ground of a mutual mistake partially caused by the judgment creditor, and is therefore distinguishable. When the court has made a garnishee order absolute and money has been paid under it the court has no jurisdiction to set the order aside.

He also referred to Burrell & Sons v. Read, 11 T. L. R. 36.

Reed, in reply.—The court can correct a miscarriage of justice and any person injured can come ex debito for relief.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 4.—JOYCE, J.—[After stating the facts set out above, continued:] On the authority of Moore v. Peachey and on general principles I have come to the conclusion that I must do what I can to remedy the injustice done by the garnishee order. There is no particular sanctity about a garnishee order, although it may have been made absolute and is so termed. I think the order as to Cullen must be set aside, but with no order as to costs. As to Teetgen & Co., who have paid £21 8s. 4d. to James, the judgment creditor, who has thus obtained an amount which does not belong to him, the evidence is not quite complete. If they have made a mistake I cannot help them; but if it were proved that they have made a mistake like the bank in Moore v. Peachey I should be disposed to help them. I certainly think that the defendant James is innocent, and I will give no costs against him. [At his lordship's suggestion the applicant Witham agreed with James to receive in full satisfaction half the sum of £21 8s. 4d which James had received from Teetgen & Co.] I therefore discharge the order as against Cullen, and by consent discharge it also as regards Teetgen & Co. on James undertaking to pay £10 14s. 2d. to Witham. There will be no order as to costs. I entirely dissent from the notion that a garnishee order cannot be set aside.

Solicitors for the applicant Witham, Hyman, Isaacs, & Lewis.

Solicitors for judgment creditor James, Mulkin & Co.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy and Ridley, JJ.) Dec. 19.

REX v. KETTLE.
Ex parte ELLIS. (a.)

*Justices—Recognizance entered into on application to state case—Refusal of case—Mandamus—Death of surety—Fresh recognizance—Summary Jurisdiction Act,* 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 43), ss. 3, 5.

Where on an application to justices to state a case the appellant had duly entered into the recognizances required by section 3 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857, and the justices refused to state a case but were afterwards ordered by mandamus to do so, the appellant is not bound under section 5 of that Act to enter into fresh recognizances even although his surety has died in the meantime.

Rule calling on the metropolitan police magistrate sitting at the Woolwich police-court, and the London County Council, to show cause why the magistrate should not forthwith deliver to Mr. James Ellis, the applicant, a certain case stated and signed by the magistrate in an information by the London County Council against Mr. Ellis.

The facts as stated in the affidavits were as follows:

On the 1st of August, 1903, an information in writing was preferred on behalf of the London County Council against Mr. Ellis, the applicant for the rule, for erecting a building in Cedar-grove, Charlton, beyond the general line of buildings, contrary to the London Building Act, 1894, and upon that information he was convicted and ordered to demolish a part of the building and to pay a fine of 40s.

The applicant applied to the magistrate to state and sign a case for the opinion of the High Court, but the magistrate refused to state a case.

On the 17th of August, 1903, some two or three days after the refusal of the magistrate to state the case, the applicant attended personally before the magistrate and stated to him that he desired to enter into recognizances such as the magistrate should require. The magistrate informed him that he should require his own recognizance and that of a surety for the sum of £50. The applicant thereupon on the same day entered into a recognizance for £50 in the form and for the amount required by the magistrate for the prosecution of the special case to be stated by the magistrate, and on the 22nd of August, 1903, the surety, one Mr. Leaver, duly entered into his recognizance as surety for the applicant for the amount of £50 as required by the magistrate.

The magistrate having refused to state a case, the applicant, on the 20th of August, 1903, obtained in chambers a rule for a mandamus to the magistrate to state a case, and this rule was made absolute on the 17th of December, 1903. Meantime, on the 10th of September, 1903, the surety, Mr. Leaver, died, and probate of his will was granted to his executrix, the estate of the surety being sworn at between £9,000 and £10,000; and on the 13th of October, 1903, Mr. Ellis, the applicant, was adjudicated bankrupt.

When the order for a mandamus of the 17th of December, 1903, was served upon the magistrate he intimated that fresh recognizances must be entered into on the ground that the surety was dead. The case was then prepared by the magistrate, and on the 28th of April, 1904, the magistrate said that the case was ready but that it could not be handed over until fresh recognizances were entered into, and he refused to deliver out the case.

The above rule for a mandamus was then obtained to compel the magistrate to deliver the case which had been already stated and signed by him.

The affidavit of the magistrate filed in answer to the rule was as follows:

"I have been served with notice of an order of this honourable court dated the 22nd of July, 1904, giving me a day to show cause why I should not forthwith deliver to James Ellis the case stated and signed by me pursuant to a previous order of this honourable court dated the 17th of December, 1903. . . .

"Two or three days after I had refused to state a case upon the information, Mr. Ellis attended before me and stated that he desired to enter into a recognizance and asked me what security I should require. I told him I should require a recognizance by himself and one surety in the sum of £50. I further told him that he might enter into the recognisance for what it was worth. The recognizance of the said James Ellis was then taken, and a day or two afterwards the recognizance of Mr. Josiah Leaver was also taken. The said recognizances were then annexed to the security book kept at the Woolwich police-court.

"If I had acceded to the application of the said James Ellis to me to state a case I should no doubt have been satisfied to accept the said Josiah Leaver as a sufficient security, but as I refused to state a case it was not in my view necessary or proper that any recognizance should then be taken, and I did not apply myself to the question whether the said Josiah Leaver was a sufficient surety or accept him as a sufficient security.

"Having regard to section 5 of the Act 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, it appeared to me that before delivering the case which I had stated and signed pursuant to the said order of the 17th of December, 1903, I must require a recognizance to be entered into upon that case and sufficient at the time of its delivery.

"I had also great doubt (1) Whether the previous recognizance could be construed as applying to the costs of the case stated by order of this honourable court; (2) whether the said Josiah Leaver's estate could be made liable upon a recognizance which did not come into operation (if at all) until after his decease; (3) whether this kind of recognizance could be enforced against the estate of a deceased surety.

"I offered to deliver the said case to the appellant's solicitors upon a fresh recognizance in the sum of £50 being entered into. As the said James Ellis has been adjudicated bankrupt I consider that such fresh recognizance ought to be entered into by two sureties in addition to the said James Ellis."

"The above are respectively submitted to the court as my reasons for refusing to deliver the said case to the said James Ellis."

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 43), provides:

Section 3.—"The appellant, at the time of making such application—that is, the application under section 2 to the justice or justices to state a case—and before a case shall be stated and delivered to him by the justice or justices, shall in every instance enter into a recognizance, before such justice or justices, or any one or more of them, or any other justice exercising the same jurisdiction, with or without surety or sureties, and in such sum as to the justice or justices shall seem meet, conditioned to prosecute without delay such appeal, and to submit to the judgment of the superior court, and pay such costs as may be awarded by the same. . . ."

Section 5.—"Where the justice or justices shall refuse to state a case as aforesaid, it shall be lawful for the appellant to apply to the Court of Queen's Bench upon an affidavit of the facts for a rule calling upon such justice or justices, and also upon the respondent, to show cause why such case should not be stated; and the said court may make the same absolute or discharge it, with or without payment of costs, as to the court shall seem meet, and the justice or justices, upon being served with such rule absolute, shall state a case accordingly, upon the appellant entering into such recognizance as is hereinbefore provided."

Daldy, for the London County Council, showed cause.—The magistrate was right in holding that fresh recognizances were necessary, and in refusing to deliver the case until such fresh recognizances were entered into. Two questions arise—first, upon the construction of the words at the end of section 5 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857; and secondly, whether the recognizance on the face of it can be held—having regard to the fact of the death of the surety—to bind the surety so as to apply to a different person than the surety himself. There are two ways of entering into recognizances on cases stated—namely, under section 3 and under section 5. It has been held that on a recognizance under section 3 the recognizance can be entered into at any time during the three days allowed for applying for a case. If the magistrate refuses to state a case, and if the court by mandamus orders him to state a case, then section 5 applies; and taking sections 3 and 5 together it was not in any way contemplated that the magistrate, on refusing to state a case, should take a recognizance on the mere chance of the court ordering him to state a case. If the magistrate takes the recognizance, and it afterwards turns out that it never ought to have been taken, then the recognizance comes to nothing. Section 5 deals with the case where the court orders the justice to state a case, and it provides that the justices, on being served with the rule absolute, shall state a case "upon the appellant entering into such recognizance as is hereinbefore provided." The meaning of that is that when the court orders the justices to state a case they are really giving the justices a new jurisdiction, and when a case is stated by order of the court the jurisdiction of the justices to take the recognizances only arises when the rule has been made absolute. In that case both the stating of the case and the entering into the recognizance are to be done after the rule is made absolute. The result is that under section 5 the time when the recognizances are to be taken and the event on which they are to be taken are distinct from what they are under section 3. The recognizances entered into before the magistrate was ordered to state a case were of no avail, and fresh recognizances were required under section 5.

Frank Gover, for the applicant, in support of the rule.—[Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—We wish you to deal with the point whether these recognizances were available to you under section 5.] It is submitted that the recognizances entered into under section 3 were sufficient. Section 5 ought not to be read as saying that the language of section 3 prevents the applicant for a case from entering into recognizances at the time of making the application, though such application is refused. The concluding words of section 5 were intended to apply to the case where the magistrate had refused to state a case, and where no recognizances had been entered into; and if the words "upon the appellant entering into such recognizance as is hereinbefore provided" had not been inserted there would in such a case have been no recognizances at all entered into. It was to guard against a case being stated without any recognizances being entered into; but if recognizances have already been entered into under section 3, then it becomes unnecessary to have any further recognizances under section 5, and the section as to that point does not apply. By rule 15 of the Summary Jurisdiction Rules, 1886, a security book is to be kept, and the full particulars of the securities given are to be duly entered in this book. In the present case these recognizances, which the magistrate had duly taken, had been entered in the records of the court. [He was stopped.]

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In this case, which is certainly one of difficulty, it must be taken, in favour of the person who moved the rule, that security had been given in accordance with section 3 of the Act. I agree with what Mr. Daldy has said, and I can see how material it is, that the security is one which can be enforced. If counsel could have said either that no security was given under section 3, or that the magistrate had no power to take security at that stage because he had not made up his mind whether he would grant a case or not, or because he thought he was going to refuse a case, then I think he would have gone a long way to convince us that this rule should be discharged. It seems to me impossible to say that it was not within the power of the magistrate to take the recognizance at that time. Section 3 says that the appellant, at the time of making such application—that is, the application for a case, and before the case shall be stated and delivered to him by the magistrate, shall in every instance enter into recognizances.

That being so, I think the later cases have put a construction on that section. In the case of Chapman v. Robinson, 7 W. R. 12, 1 E. & E. 25, it was decided that the security was good if it were given within the three days allowed for applying for a case, although not entered into at the time of making the application. The second case, that of Stanhope v. Thorsby, 14 W. R. 651, L. R. 1 C. P. 423, goes further and says that the security need not be given within the three days, but is good if given before the case is issued by the justices, if the application has been made within the three days. But none of those cases throw any doubt on the right and the jurisdiction of the magistrate to take the recognizances at the time of the making of the application. Therefore, as I have said, even taking the magistrate's very fair statement in his affidavit supplementing what the applicant has said, I think we must take it that there was an application made to the magistrate to take the recognizances at a time when it was within his jurisdiction to take them. The only other point is, aye or no, does the fact that the magistrate afterwards refused to state a case and that this court has since ordered on a rule absolute the case to be stated, create any difference and necessitate further recognizances? I admit that section 5 affords some ground for the argument of counsel who opposed the rule, because it says: "The justice or justices upon being served with such rule absolute shall state a case accordingly upon the appellant entering into such recognizance as is hereinbefore provided." That provision was obviously necessary in order to prevent the applicant from claiming the case on the rule without having given security; and under the circumstances it seems to me that the words "as is hereinbefore provided" may well be satisfied, not only by the form and nature of the security, but also by saying that it is a security which is to be taken in the way contemplated by section 3. Upon that construction it would rather help the argument of counsel in support of the rule, because he says that section 5 is to be effective if the appellant has fulfilled what is the condition required by section 3. Therefore, it seems to me, taking the facts now before us, that there was a security given in accordance with section 3, and that security is effective for whatever it may be worth against the persons who became either principal debtor or surety for the principal debtor, and the condition is the same—namely, to prosecute the appeal and pay the costs of the application on a case being stated. In those circumstances it seems to me impossible for us to say that the magistrate was right in refusing to deliver out the case without a further security being given by the appellant, whatever might have happened assuming that there had been no security given under section 3. I think, therefore, that this rule should be made absolute.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion. Although it has been decided that it is sufficient if the recognizances are in fact entered into before the case is stated and delivered out, it seems to me to be clear—and I do not think counsel in opposition to the rule challenges the contention—that under section 3 it is perfectly correct, if I may say so, to tender, and there is nothing in the section to prevent the magistrate from accepting the entering into recognizances at the time of the application for a case. The application may or may not be granted at the time it is made. Indeed, the application is made within a certain time—three days—and in writing, so that the applicant may very well not know whether the case will be granted, but he has persons who are willing to enter into recognizances. When we look at the form of the recognizance it is conditioned to be liable as bail, if I may say so, to a certain extent, and refers to a case that is to be stated. The magistrate having in this case taken the recognizance afterwards declines to state a case. The recognizance so taken was not taken in the slightest degree in contravention of the statute, but was offered and taken at the time of the application. Is not the recognizance so taken a valid recognizance, having regard to that case, although the magistrate declined to state it at the time, and this court has to be invoked to direct him to state the case in respect of which the recognizance had been offered and taken? When we come to look at section 5, I see nothing in that section which justifies the contrary contention. This court has power under section 5 to decide that the case must be stated. The court makes the rule absolute for the statement of the case, and the magistrate on being served with the rule absolute is to state the case "upon the appellant entering into such recognizance as is hereinbefore provided." That provision is, in my opinion, clearly inserted to meet the case, which is a common case, that where a magistrate has decided and has refused to state a case, no one thinks of offering to enter into recognizances, nor is any recognizance taken; and, but for those words at the end of section 5, it might be that there would be a rule absolute to state a case without any recognizance having ever been entered into at all before the case is delivered and dealt with. Therefore it was necessary to make that provision. Is there anything in this section, when fairly read, that practically vacates the value of the recognizance entered into at the time, or practically at the time, of making the application for the case, because the magistrate ultimately determines not to state a case, and the action of this court has to be invoked? I think there is not. If a recognizance is duly entered into to abide certain consequences in the event of a case terminating unfavourably to the appellant, it seems to me there is no jurisdiction for us to say that that is a recognizance which can only be treated as a nullity.

RIDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. I confess the case affords some difficulty, but I agree with the judgments of my learned brethren. It must be remembered that the recognizance that was entered into on the first occasion is as good now as it was then, not having any regard to objections that may arise as to the decease of a surety. As to that, I think it does not relieve the surety, but the surety is under the same obligations now as when the recognizance was entered into. The appellant is to prosecute without delay, to submit to the judgment of the court, and pay such costs as may be ordered. The mere lapse of time, the fact that before the magistrate does state a case an application has to be made to the superior court to obtain a rule to order him to do so, does not relieve the surety who has entered into this recognizance, and the recognizance, therefore, is as good now as it was at the time when it was entered into. That observation may have some bearing on the merits of the decision. I agree that the rule should be made absolute.

Rule absolute, with costs against the county council.

Solicitors in support of the rule, Henry Gover & Son.

Solicitor in opposition to the rule, W. A. Blaxland.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy and Ridley, JJ.) Dec. 19.

WESTHORPE v. POWLEY. (a.)

Naval reserve—False statement on entering—Naval Enlistment Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 69), s. 16—Naval Volunteers Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 73), s. 17—Royal Naval Reserve (Volunteer) Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 40), ss. 15, 16.

Section 16 of the Naval Enlistment Act, 1853, does not apply to a person who makes a false statement on entering, or offering to enter, the Royal Naval Reserve, which was created by the Royal Naval Reserve Act, 1859.

Case stated by justices for the borough of Great Yarmouth, in the county of Norfolk.

On the 21st and 28th April, 1904, the justices when sitting as a court of summary jurisdiction heard and determined an information which charged the respondent with making on the 23rd of February, 1904, a false statement in writing on offering himself to enter the naval service of his Majesty, contrary to section 16 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 69 (the Naval Enlistment Act, 1853).

The following facts were proved or admitted:

The appellant, Leonard J. Westhorpe, was an officer in his Majesty's Customs, and was authorized by virtue of his appointment under the regulations hereinafter mentioned, to enrol duly qualified applicants in the royal naval reserve. The royal naval reserve was established by the statute 22 & 23 Vict. c. 40 (the Royal Naval Reserve (Volunteer) Act, 1859), and is governed by regulations issued under that statute.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 23rd of February, 1904, the respondent Powley applied in person to the appellant to be enrolled in the royal naval reserve, and signed a printed form which was read over to him, and which contained the statements: (1) That the respondent had not already made application to be enrolled in the royal naval reserve at that (Yarmouth) or any other port; and (2) that his age was 30—both of which statements were false.

On behalf of the respondent it was contended upon the above facts that as at the date of the passing of the statute creating the offence (namely, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 69) there was no force of naval reserve in existence, the penal section (section 16) could not apply. Also it was contended that the expression "naval service of her Majesty," in 16 & 17 Vict. c. 69, referred to the royal navy only, and could not be held to include the royal naval reserve, on the grounds that the royal naval reserve was not at the date of the earlier Act and is not now a part of the "naval service."

For the appellant it was contended that inasmuch as the royal naval reserve was under the control of and paid by the Admiralty, and its members when under training were under the command of his Majesty's naval officers, the force must come within the description "naval service"; that the very nature and objects of the force brought it within the words in question and it was within the mischief intended to be met by the section, and that the words "naval service" must be taken to mean the naval force of his Majesty as constituted for the time being.

The justices were of opinion that at the date of the Act (16 & 17 Vict. c. 69) there was no force of naval volunteers in existence, the first body coming under that description being constituted by 16 & 17 Vict. c. 73 (the Naval Volunteers Act, 1853), and that section 16 interpreted as a penal section could not be construed to apply to a non-existent body without further words. That, referring to 16 & 17 Vict. c. 73, which is entitled "an Act for the establishment of a body of naval coast volunteers, and for the temporary transfer to the navy, in case of need, of seafaring men employed in other public services," there is no reference to c. 69, but section 17 extends the laws relating to the government of the navy to volunteers on board ship or otherwise under instruction, training, or exercise.

That an Act, 22 & 23 Vict. c. 40, referred to in the argument, appeared to be in many respects a repetition of c. 73, giving the volunteers an additional name, "Royal Naval Volunteers," but not apparently carrying the case further against the respondent, who, not then being under instruction, training, or exercise, was charged with having attempted to re-enlist for, a second period of service after the completion of the first without mentioning the latter, and not with the offence under section 16 of the Royal Naval Reserve (Volunteer) Act of 1859.

The justices accordingly held that section 16 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 69, did not extend to persons applying to enter the royal naval reserve, and dismissed the information.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the decision of the justices was right, and whether the words "naval service" in that section included the royal naval reserve, or persons offering themselves for service in it.

Section 16 of the Naval Enlistment Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 69), an Act to make better provision concerning the entry and service of seamen, and otherwise to amend the laws concerning her Majesty's navy, provides:

"Every person who, upon entering or offering himself to enter the naval service of her Majesty, shall make or give any false statement, whether orally or in writing, with intent to deceive any officer or person authorized to enter or enlist seamen or others in or for such naval service, shall be deemed a rogue and vagabond within the intent and meaning of the Act of the fifth year of King George the Fourth, chapter eighty-three, and shall upon conviction thereof be punished accordingly; and all the provisions of the said Act, and of any Act amending the same, shall take effect and apply as if a person so offending as aforesaid had, by the said Act of the fifth year of King George the Fourth, been declared a rogue and vagabond within the true intent and meaning of that Act."

On the same day, the 15th of August, 1853, the Naval Volunteers Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 73)—"an Act for the establishment of a body of naval coast volunteers, and for the temporary transfer to the navy, in case of need, of seafaring men employed in other public services"—was passed, and under it "the royal naval coast volunteers" were authorized to be raised "by voluntary entry (from among seafaring men and others who may be deemed suitable for the services in which such volunteers may be employed)." Section 7 provides:

"All the laws and customs for the time being in force for the government of her Majesty's ships, vessels, and forces by sea, and applicable to any person in or belonging to the fleet, or to any person being in actual service and full pay, and part of the crew of any of her Majesty's ships or vessels, shall be applicable in like manner to every volunteer during such period as he shall be on board any ship or vessel for the purpose of instruction, training, and exercise, or shall be otherwise under instruction, training, and exercise, and to every such volunteer, and to every officer and man of the coastguard, of her Majesty's revenue cruisers, seaman-rigger, or other person required to serve in the navy under this Act during such time as he shall be in actual service either on board any ship or vessel or otherwise under this Act. . . ."

The Royal Naval Reserve (Volunteer) Act, 1859 (23 & 23 Vict. c. 40)—"an Act for the establishment of a reserve volunteer force of seamen, and for the government of the same"—authorized the raising of "the royal naval volunteers," consisting of "men to be raised by voluntary entry from among seafaring men and others who may be deemed suitable for the services in which such volunteers may be employed."

By section 15—similar in terms to section 17 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 73—the laws relating to the government of the navy were extended to volunteers while on board ship for the purpose of, or while under instruction, training, and exercise, and to such volunteers and others when in actual service; and by section 16: "If any person shall enter or attempt to enter the royal naval volunteers as a new volunteer more than once during the whole or any part of the same period of service, he shall for every such act forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding twenty pounds."

William Wills, for the appellant.—The information was laid under section 16 of the Naval Enlistment Act, 1853, and the justices were of opinion that that section did not apply as the force called the royal naval reserve, in respect of which the respondent was charged, did not exist at the time of the passing of that Act in 1853. It is submitted that the justices took too narrow a view of the meaning of the words "naval service" in section 16, and that those words are to be taken in a wider sense than that placed upon them, though the respondent contended that those words "naval service" must be taken in their ordinary meaning. The Act deals principally with the terms of enlistment in the navy, and the preamble states that (amongst other objects) it was to amend the law concerning the "manning" of the navy, which is a very general term. Then section 16, which is the one in question, contains the words "in or for such naval service," that is, to enter persons "in," or enlist them "for" the service, which are very wide words, and section 18 refers to "naval coast volunteers," showing that the Act was not confined to men in the ordinary service of the navy—that is, of the navy and marines. Then comes the Act 16 & 17 Vict. c. 73, passed on the same day, which enabled this force of naval coast volunteers to be raised and which made no provision as to the punishment of persons falsely entering into it, thus leaving such punishment to be dealt with under section 16 of the earlier Act. Section 3 relates to the training of volunteers, and sections 4 and 5 contain the words "actual service," indicating that the antithesis of actual service is potential service. Then by section 8 a volunteer is to be protected from "service in the royal navy," and the fair inference from those words is that the Legislature regarded the volunteer as being in a modified sense in the service of the royal navy. The whole distinction is as to the liability to active service and the liability to be called upon to serve, which the volunteer is at all times under during the term (sections 13, 14, 16, and 17). In that Act we have a force very similar to the one now in question authorized to be raised by an Act passed in the same year and on the same day, and it does not provide for the punishment of a man who makes a false statement in joining it, and it would be very expedient that it should do so if the matter were not provided for in the earlier Act. Then, coming to the Act 22 & 23 Vict. c. 40, under which these naval reserve volunteer forces were raised, by section 4 the Crown can call these reserves into actual service and for active duties. A man who is in the naval reserve is none the less in the "naval service" because he is not at the moment on actual duty. He is liable to be called out for actual duty, and the position of a man in that reserve is like that of a servant of a master who is going abroad and who does not want the services of the servant for the time being, but who keeps the servant in his employment. The words "naval service" are quite capable of covering the service of these men, and there is no reason why the words should be restricted in the way adopted by the justices.

The respondent did not appear.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—Counsel for the appellant has most properly brought to our attention everything we ought to consider in dealing with this case. I have, however, come to the conclusion that the decision of the magistrates was right. The respondent was summoned under section 16 of the Naval Enlistment Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 69), the opening words of which are: "Every person who, upon entering or offering himself to enter the naval service of her Majesty, shall make or give any false statement . . . with intent to deceive any officer," and so on, "shall be deemed a rogue and vagabond," and so on. I certainly think that the statement of the proposition as stated in the case, if it meant to say that nothing could be naval service of his Majesty within the meaning of this section which was not naval service at the time the Act was passed, and that therefore the section did not apply, would be going too far. It is quite possible that subsequent legislation, and possibly something other than legislation, would make the naval reserve service naval service of his Majesty. I myself am pressed with the fact that in the same year Parliament passed an Act for the establishment of naval coast volunteers, and counsel for the appellant was obliged to contend that if a person upon joining that body of naval volunteers established under the Act of 1853, c. 73 had made a mis-statement, he would have been liable to penalties under section 16 of the Act of 1853, c. 69. I think that contention goes too far. I think that the Act of 1853, c. 73, by section 17, to which reference has been made, did apply all the law applicable to the navy during the time that the men were serving, and did subject persons to certain penalties, but, inasmuch as we are dealing in this case with a criminal offence, I think it would have been extremely difficult to argue successfully that section 16 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 69 applied to the force which was created or established under the Act passed in the same session on the ground that the persons entering that force were all to be regarded as in the naval service of his Majesty for the purpose of that section. Then when we come to the Act of 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 40), under which was created this force of the royal naval reserve, which the respondent offered to enter, the Act, in section 1, speaks of the force about to be created as consisting of men to be raised by voluntary entry from among seafaring men. In section 15 it provides that all the laws and customs for the time being in force for the government of his Majesty's ships, vessels, and forces by sea and applicable to persons in the navy, should be extended to volunteers under the Act during such period as they should be on board ship for the purpose of instruction, training, and exercise. There again we have a repetition of the provisions in section 17 of the Act of 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 73), that all the laws and customs for the time being in force with respect to men serving in the navy should be applicable to the volunteers during such period as they should be on board ship. Sections 16, 17, and 18 all impose penalties upon persons in respect of these matters; and section 16 does to a certain extent touch this very subject-matter, because, although counsel contended that it might possibly apply to other cases, it did impose a penalty upon a person entering or attempting to enter the royal naval volunteers as a new volunteer more than once during the same period of service. I quite agree that it does not follow that that shows that exhaustive penalties were being enacted for certain breaches of what was thought to be right on the part of those entering the force. As we have in this section—section 16—to construe the words "naval service," and as the section creates a criminal offence, I think we must be satisfied, there being no express enactment, that by necessary implication the purview of this section has been extended to the case of a volunteer of the naval reserve. Without overlooking what counsel for the appellant has properly urged as to the importance of there being regulations and restrictions in regard to these matters, and quite feeling that regulations might be made which to a certain extent might and would prevent wrong persons from entering this service, and might even subject them to certain consequences, still I am of opinion that we ought not to hold that the effect of section 16 of the Naval Enlistment Act of 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 69), which makes it a criminal offence to make a mis-statement on entering the naval service of his Majesty, is to apply to a man who does not enter the naval service, but who only renders himself liable to be called in as a volunteer for that purpose. I think the decision of the justices was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree.

RIDLEY, J.—I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the appellant, Treasury Solicitor.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Mathew, L.J.) March 13.

WHITE & CO v. CREDIT REFORM ASSOCIATION AND CREDIT INDEX (LIMITED). (a.)

Practice—Interrogatories—Action for libel—Plea of privilege—Name of informant.

In an action against a trade protection association for libel for having published a statement as to the plaintiffs' solvency, the plaintiffs applied for leave to administer two interrogatories, the first asking whether the defendants before publishing the statement complained of made any and what inquiries as to the truth thereof, and from whom they obtained the information on which they relied in making the statement; and the second asking the defendants to give by reference to their books or otherwise the names of the companies, firms, and persons to whom the book containing the statement complained of was shown by them or their agents. The defendants objected to the last part of the first interrogatory and to the second interrogatory. The judge at chambers having allowed them,

Held, that as the plaintiffs could ask as to the inquiries made by the defendants before publishing the statement complained of, the name of the person giving the information on which they relied in making the statement was material as to the value to be attached to the information, and that therefore the interrogatory was allowable; but that the second interrogatory was oppressive and ought not to be allowed.

Appeal from an order of Bray, J., at chambers, allowing certain interrogatories in an action to recover damages for libel.

The defendants, who were a trade protection association, issued a publication called The Credit Index and a Key Card to be used with it. The credit index contained the names of various traders. Against the name of each trader were placed an alphabetical letter and a number. According to the key card the alphabetical letter indicated the estimated pecuniary strength of the trader against whose name it was placed, and the number indicated the general credit which might be given to the trader in his business. A letter and number were set against the plaintiffs' name, and in respect of that the present action was brought. No special damage was alleged in the statement of claim. The plaintiffs, in their particulars of publication, alleged that the matter complained of was published by the defendants to their canvassers and to numerous persons, firms, and companies who had been solicited or induced to purchase or peruse the book. The defendants, in their statement of defence, denied that the words complained of were libellous, or that they bore the meaning alleged, and in the alternative they pleaded that they published the words complained of in good faith and without malice and under such circumstances as rendered the occasion of such publication privileged. In the particulars delivered by the defendants of the plea of privilege they said that the credit index and key card were issued only to subscribers, being traders and others, to whom the pecuniary strength and general credit of the persons and firms included therein were matters of interest and importance, and upon condition that the subscribers should return the index to the defendants at the expiration of the period for which the same was subscribed.

The plaintiffs, in answer to an interrogatory as to whether they contended that the defendants in publishing the words complained of were actuated by malice towards them, and, if so, upon what facts and circumstances they relied as showing actual malice, said that they contended that the defendants made no proper inquiries and were possessed of no information or particulars concerning the pecuniary strength and credit of the plaintiffs, and, although pretending to have honestly and bonâ fide made full, careful, sufficient, and recent inquiries as to the plaintiffs' pecuniary strength and credit, the defendants had in truth and in fact made no such inquiries, and the defendants published the particulars complained of recklessly, indifferent as to whether the same were true or false, and for the purpose of obtaining for themselves large pecuniary profits. The plaintiffs applied for leave to administer certain interrogatories to the defendants, of which the two following, as amended by the learned judge, were in question: (1) "Did the defendants before publishing the said credit index and key card take any and what precautions or make any and what inquiries as to the truth of the said particulars, or make any and what inquiry at all with respect to such particulars? From whom did the defendants obtain the information on which they relied in making the statement complained of?" (2) "Give by reference to your books or otherwise the names of the companies, firms, and persons to whom the same have been supplied, or shown by or through the defendants or their agents?" The defendants took objection to the last part of the first of these two interrogatories—namely, "From whom did the defendants obtain the information," &c.—and to the second interrogatory. The interrogatories, before being amended by the judge, were disallowed by the master, but the learned judge allowed both interrogatories as above, and gave leave to appeal.

Norman Craig, for the defendants.—It is admitted that the decision in Elliott v. Garrett, 50 W. R. 504, [1902] 1 K. B. 870, covers the first part of the first interrogatory, and that that part of the interrogatory is allowable. The second part, however, ought not to be allowed. Upon an issue of privilege and express malice, it is not allowable to ask the names of the persons from whom the defendants obtained the information upon which they made the statement complained of. It is mere cross-examination for the purpose of discrediting the information. The plaintiffs have no right to interrogate in the hope of discovering a case of which they have no present knowledge. Hennessy v. Wright, 36 W. R. 879, 24 Q. B. D. 445*n*, was an action for libel to which a plea of fair comment was put on the record. In such a case malice would destroy that defence, as it would a defence of privilege. The court, however, there held that interrogatories asking for the name of the informant could not be given. The last part of the interrogatory is therefore not allowable. [He also referred to Gibson v. Evans, 23 Q. B. D. 384; Parnell v. Walter, 38 W. R. 270, 24 Q. B. D. 441; McColla v. Jones, 4 Times L. R. 12; McKenzie v. Steinkopff, 6 Times L. R. 141.] The second interrogatory is oppressive and irrelevant, because it asks the defendants to give the names of all their subscribers. The answer would be of no use to the plaintiffs. The defendants were willing to state the number of their subscribers, and that the publication was issued to none but subscribers. The dictum of Lindley, L.J., in Dalgleish v. Lowther, 48 W. R. 37, [1899] 2 Q. B. 590, at p. 593, is relied upon in support of that interrogatory, but that dictum does not support it.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

He also referred to Stern v. Sevastopulo, 11 W. R. 862, 14 C. B. N. S. 737.

H. A. McCardie, for the plaintiffs.—The part of the first interrogatory which is objected to is allowable as tending to support the plaintiffs' allegation that the defendants had no proper information in their possession before they published the matter complained of, and thus to destroy the plea of privilege. The source of the information is vital, because if it came from a notorious liar it would be such that no one ought to rely upon it. [He referred to Marriott v. Chamberlain, 34 W. R. 783, 17 Q. B. D. 154.] The second interrogatory is not oppressive.

Norman Craig, in reply.—Gibson v. Evans shows what Marriott v. Chamberlain really decided.

He also referred to Blanc v. Barrows, 12 Times L. R. 521.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from an order made by Bray, J., at chambers as to two interrogatories, both of which the master disallowed, but which the learned judge allowed with modifications. The action is for libel in respect of a statement in a publication issued by the defendants which, by certain indications, assigned a certain degree of solvency to the plaintiffs, and which the plaintiffs said reflected injuriously upon them. There was a plea of privilege. The first interrogatory is as follows: [His lordship read the interrogatory.] In order to see whether that is a proper interrogatory, it is necessary to consider the position of the parties. The cause of action is the alleged publication of the statement complained of. The answer, so far as material, is that it was published in good faith and without malice and under such circumstances as rendered the occasion of such publication privileged—that is to say, that it was published to persons to whom the pecuniary strength and general credit of the persons named therein were matters of interest and importance. It is contended that it is irrelevant to any issue in the case to inquire as to the names of the persons from whom the information was obtained. To begin with, it is clear law since the decision in Elliott v. Garrett that the main substance of the information must be given. The interrogatory in that case, which was allowed as being relevant to the issue of malice on a plea of privilege, was: "What information, if any, had you that induced you to believe that the words were true, or what steps, if any, had you taken before speaking the words to ascertain whether they were true or not?" Therefore the state of mind of the person publishing the alleged libel is the legitimate subject-matter for inquiry. If so, why stop short there? The issue is as to the mind of the person publishing the alleged libel. Surely it is an important factor in that inquiry to ascertain, not merely what inquiry in fact that person made, but also who were the persons to whom his inquiry was addressed. In a discussion as to the motive of the person publishing the alleged libel, it is essential to know all the facts, and in order to know all the facts it is obvious that it is necessary to know from whom he obtained the information. If the information was obtained from a person who could have no knowledge upon the subject and the person to whom it was given published it as if it were based upon sufficient information, that might be cogent evidence of malice. To sever the question as to the information from the question as to the position and authority of the person from whom the information was obtained seems to be quite illogical. The two cannot be severed. That is the general principle which is applicable to this case. But it might be that certain countervailing rights would have to be taken into consideration. If there was any suggestion of an illegimate motive in putting the question, that suggestion must be considered. It might be that the party putting the question was really seeking to assert rights against the person who gave the information. If there were any good reason for thinking that the interrogatory was put from such a motive, the law would not allow it to be put as being oppressive and illegitimate. In the absence of any circumstances suggesting such an inference, the state of the person's mind who published the matter complained of is the paramount consideration. There is no suggestion of any countervailing circumstances here, and therefore the interrogatory is legitimate. The learned judge allowed it, and the circumstances not only do not countenance, but really rebut, any suggestion of an inference that the interrogatory is put for the purpose of bringing an action against other persons. Its object is to test whether a ground of privilege exists. The appeal, therefore, as to the first interrogatory fails.

With regard to the second interrogatory, there is one large principle underlying the whole law as to interrogatories—namely, that they must not be either oppressive or outside the legitimate subject-matter of interrogatories. To ask persons conducting a business of this kind to give "the names of the companies, firms, and persons to whom the same have been supplied or shown by, or through the defendants or their agents," in order that by chance some single name of a person may be discovered who has no interest in the matter, is oppressive. This interrogatory, therefore, will not be allowed. The appeal accordingly as to that interrogatory succeeds.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. With regard to the first interrogatory, the object of it is to discover whether the statement complained of was founded upon information which the defendants obtained, and, if it was, whether it was information of such a kind that the defendants ought to have acted upon it. The best way to test the value of the information is to ascertain the person from whom the information was obtained. I agree with the Master of the Rolls that this interrogatory ought to be allowed. With regard to the second interrogatory, it seems to me to be clearly oppressive. There is no reason to suppose that it would benefit the plaintiffs, and no reason has been shown for allowing it.

Order varied.

Solicitor for the plaintiffs, A. E. Fenton, for T. A. Needham, Manchester.

Solicitors for the defendants, Baker, Baker, & Co.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Feb. 9, 10.

KENT COUNTY COUNCIL v. MAYOR AND CORPORATION OF FOLKESTONE. (a.)

Highway — Repairs — Extraordinary traffic — Damages — Limitation of time for action — Statutes — Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 77), s. 23 — Locomotives Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 29), s. 12 — Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 61), s. 1.

An action against a public authority to recover damages for an injury to a highway must be brought within six months next after the act, neglect, or default complained of, or in case of a continuance of injury or damage within six months after the ceasing thereof, by virtue of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1896, s. 1. This statute is not expressly or impliedly repealed by section 12, sub-section 1 (b), of the Locomotives Act, 1898, which provides a limitation of twelve months when an action is brought by a highway authority to recover extraordinary expenses incurred by it in repairing a highway by reason of extraordinary traffic thereon.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Darling, J., in an action brought by the plaintiffs as the highway authority to recover extraordinary expenses incurred by it in repairing a main road by reason of the damage caused by extraordinary traffic thereon by or in consequence of orders of the defendants.

It appeared that the defendants commenced about December, 1902, to widen a highway within their borough, and that for this purpose traction engines for hauling stone and material were taken along the main roads, to which they caused damage for the repair of which extraordinary expenses were incurred by the plaintiffs. The work was still continuing when action was brought, and the actual damage was done in the early part of 1903 and within the period of twelve months before suit brought in February, 1904.

It also appeared that the hauling was done by a contractor therefor, who had entered into a contract for a year from the 1st of April, 1902, and that he had completed his work by the 23rd of March, 1903.

The amount claimed by the plaintiffs was £520 odd.

The principal defence was that the hauling was finished more than six months prior to action brought, and that the damage was done more than twelve months before action commenced, and that therefore the action was barred either by virtue of the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 77), s. 23, as amended by the Locomotives Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 29), section 12, sub-section 1 (b), which provides that: "Proceedings for the recovery of any expenses incurred after the passing of this Act shall be commenced within twelve months of the time at which the damage has been done, or where the damage is the consequence of any particular building contract, or work extending over a long period, shall be commenced not later than six months after the completion of the contract or work"; or, by virtue of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 61), s. 1, which is as follows: "Where after the commencement of this Act any action, prosecution, or other proceeding is commenced in the United Kingdom against any person for any act done in pursuance, or execution, or intended execution of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority, or in respect of any alleged neglect or default in the execution of any such act, duty, or authority, the following provisions shall have effect (inter alia): (a) The action, prosecution, or proceeding shall not lie or be instituted unless it is commenced within six months next after the act, neglect, or default complained of, or, in case of a continuance of injury or damage, within six months next after the ceasing thereof."

At the trial Darling, J., found that the traffic was extraordinary and assessed the damages provisionally at £300, but after consideration gave judgment for the defendants, on the ground that the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, s. 1, had not been repealed by the Locomotives Act, 1898, and that accordingly the defendants were entitled to six months limitation thereunder. His lordship held, however, that the plaintiffs were entitled to £50 damages as representing the amount of damages done within twelve months if the limitation of time within which action should be brought was twelve months under the later Act.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Dickens, K.C., and Theobald Mathew, for the appellants.—The Public Authorities Protection Act does not apply. Hauling was not done in execution of any public duty more than indirectly. The six months run from default in payment, not from act of damage.

They cited Ambler v. Bradford Corporation, [1902] 2 Ch. 585, 51 W. R. Dig. 43; Milford Docks Co. v. Milford Haven Urban District Council, (1901) 65 J. P. 483; Hill v. Thomas, 42 W. R. 85, [1893] 3 Q. B. 333; Gerard v. Kent County Council, 46 W. R. 111, [1897] A. C. 633.

Hume Williams, K.C., and Hansell, for the respondents.—Widening of the road was an act done in pursuance of a public duty. The limit of time for action is six months; but, if for twelve months, the time must run from the date of the last injury in February, 1903.

They cited Hill v. Thomas; Midland Railway Co. v. Withington Local Board, (1883) 11 Q. B. D. 788, 32 W. R. Dig. 122; Egham Urban District Council v. London County Council [1900] 2 Q. B. 751; Whitebread v. Sevenoaks Highway Board, [1892] 1 Q. B. 8, 40 W. R. Dig. 94.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree with much of the judgment of Darling, J. Especially do I agree that the Public Authorities Protection Act of 1893 has not been repealed by the Locomotives Act of 1898; and that those Acts do not conflict by reason of the fact that they respectively provide different periods of limitation, the latter Act with regard to the general public, and the former with regard to a special class which the Legislature has thought fit specially to protect. When Darling, J., had decided that the Act of 1893 applied, it was unnecessary for him to deal with the other points which had been raised. But I differ from him, and think the Act of 1893 had no application at all to the facts of the present case, for this reason, that the contractor who did the damage was in no sense the servant of the defendant corporation. Under the Act of 1878 no proceeding could have been taken against the defendants; they required no protection, because the act in question was not done by them. In my judgment the court has nothing to do with the Act of 1893. We, therefore, deal with the points which were not dealt with by Darling, J.—viz., the date from which the limitation runs under section 12 of the Act of 1898. This Act amended the Act of 1878, by which a remedy was given by summary proceeding, the object being the recovery of certain expenses by the road authority. The words in section 12, sub-section 1 (c), of the Act of 1898, "by or in consequence of whose order" were substituted for the words "by whose order," in section 23 of the Act of 1878. The remedy is altered from a summary proceeding to action in the High Court. The action is to be for damages for the injury to the road, and not merely to recover the amount of the expenses of repairing, though a certificate of the expenditure is a condition precedent to the action. I do not accept the view that the time of limitation did not begin to run until the end of all the works for widening the road. Whatever the words "extending over a long period" might potentially include, there must be a unity of the work. In the present case it is my view that the work in respect of the hauling of the stone was not one with the improvement works. I think the limitation was intended to be twelve months from the day of the damage, the subsequent words being inserted merely for the purpose of extending the twelve months in cases in which that period would act oppressively. It would not be right to say that the plaintiffs could recover nothing, and I think they are entitled to recover £50 in respect of the damage done within twelve months. It has been suggested that the latter part of section 12 (b) was intended to apply only when the action was brought against a person "in consequence of whose order" the damage has been done. There is nothing in the words to justify such a reading of them, and I cannot so limit the words. The appellants will recover £50 damages, and have their costs of the appeal, but no costs in the court below.

(a.) Reported by HENRY STEPHEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ROMER and STIRLING, L.JJ., concurred.

Solicitors for appellants, Church, Adams, & Prior, for Charles Turner, Maidstone

Solicitors for respondents, Holt, Beever, & Cowdy, for A. F. Kidson, Folkestone.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Jan. 23, 24; Feb. 6.

BOW v. HART. (a.)

County court — Jurisdiction — Infringement of trade-mark—Franchise—Injunction—County Courts Acts. 1865 (28 & 29 Vict c. 99), s. 1; and 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 56—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Acts, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 62 69 (4), 71, 72, 75, 76, 77, 81 (5) (12), 90 (1) (2) (3), 92; and 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 50), s. 18.

The county court has no jurisdiction under section 56 of the County Courts Act, 1888, to try an action to restrain infringement of a trade-mark, such an action not being a personal action within the meaning of that section or of section 58 of the repealed County Courts Act, 1846. Nor is such an action included in the equitable jurisdiction conferred by the County Courts (Equitable Jurisdiction) Act, 1865.

The right obtained by registration of a trade-mark is not a franchise; though it is incorrect to say that a franchise cannot be created by Act of Parliament.

Decision of the Divisional Court (ante, p. 218, [1904] 2 K. B. 693) reversed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy, J.), which is reported ante, p. 218, [1904] 2 K. B. 693, reversing the decision of the county court judge of Kent.

(a.) Reported by R. HILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The action was brought in the county court at Rochester for an injunction and an account or damages—the latter being laid at £35—in respect of the alleged infringement of the plaintiff's registered trade-mark "Freedom" used in connection with certain articles of food.

The defendant gave notice of objection to the jurisdiction, and also that he intended to contest the validity of the plaintiff's trade-mark and to apply to the High Court for the purpose of having it expunged from the register.

The county court judge held that as by reason of this notice the action became one in which the validity of the trade-mark was in question, he had no jurisdiction to try it, and he refused to make an order.

The Divisional Court reversed the decision, and the defendant appealed.

Beddall and S. R. Earle, for the defendant.—The county court judge was right in holding he had no jurisdiction. The right gained by registration of a trade-mark is a franchise, and the action is therefore within the exceptions in section 56 of the County Courts Act, 1888. The intention of the Legislature was to withhold jurisdiction from the county court in cases where something was at stake beyond mere damages—e.g., the right to hold a market, besides the mere amount of the tolls—the good name of the plaintiff in an action for slander, and not only the damages claimed. A trade-mark is in pari materiâ with a patent, and the latter was held to be a franchise in Reg. v. County Court Judge of Halifax, 39 W. R. 492, [1891] 1 Q. B. 793, affirmed 39 W. R. 545, [1891] 2 Q. B. 263. Till the passing of the Patents, &c., Act, 1883, there was no property in a trade-mark, and the only action available was for passing off: Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Loog, 29 W. R. 699, 18 Ch. D. 395, 412, per James, L.J. The Act of 1883 gave a privilege which did not exist before, the condition of enjoyment being registration, which after five years was conclusive evidence and during that period primâ facie evidence of the right (section 76). [STIRLING, L.J.—In 1863 Lord Westbury held there was property in a trade-mark in Leather Cloth Co. v. American &c., Co., 12 W. R. 289, 4 De G. J. & S. 137, 142] [ROMER L.J., referred to Lord Cottenham's judgment in Millington v. Fox, 3 My. & Cr. 338, 352.] [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., referred to Lord Langdale's judgment in Perry v. Truefitt, 6 Beav. 66, 73.] [ROMER, L.J.—What evidence is there of the right during the first five years after registration? Must not the owner rely on his prior user?] The primâ facie right to prove a title by registration is itself a franchise. The right accrues during that time and at the end of five years is an exclusive right, which it never was before the statute. The Act of 1883, as extended by later Acts, forms a general code of law relating to patents, designs, and trade-marks, and the "court," wherever referred to therein, is defined by section 117 to mean the High Court. This is so also with the interpolated section 77A, introduced by section 18 of the Patents, &c., Act, 1888, and under which the court or a judge may certify as to a trade-mark in the same way as may be done in regard to a patent under section 31.

They also cited Reddaway v. Banham, 44 W. R. 638, [1896] A. C. 199, 215, per Lord Macnaghten.

Spokes, for the plaintiff.—No doubt the High Court has complete control over the registration of a trade-mark, but the county court may still have jurisdiction to try an action for its infringement. In that part of the Act of 1883 which relates to patents the language clearly shows that the High Court alone has jurisdiction; but it is otherwise with the part relating to trade-marks. The county court can grant an injunction where no damages are claimed or where they do not exceed £50. Since the Judicature Act, 1873, a passing-off action could be brought in the county court, and the Patents, &c., Act, 1883 did not interfere with that jurisdiction. It did not, it is true, expressly confer jurisdiction, but that was done by section 56 of the County Courts Act, 1888. The only one of the exceptions in that section which could possibly be said to apply is that of a franchise, and the right to a trade-mark is not a franchise though the grant of a patent is so, as is shown by the wording of the grant in Form D in the first schedule to the Act of 1883. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—We think that a trade-mark is not a franchise, but if you say a franchise cannot be created by Act of Parliament, I say emphatically we do not agree with you.] Section 56 is a useful enactment when the action to be tried is of a simple character, and the effect of it ought not to be cut down. It would always be possible to transfer to the High Court an action which is not simple.

Beddall replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., read the judgment of the court as follows: This is an appeal from a Divisional Court of the King's Bench Division, which reversed the decision of the judge of the Rochester County Court. The question in the case is whether the county court judge had jurisdiction to try an action brought in respect of an alleged infringement by the defendant of the plaintiff's registered trade-mark. In that action the plaintiff claimed an injunction to restrain the defendant from infringing the trade-mark, and also an account or damages. The claim for damages was, however, abandoned. At the trial it was urged that the county court had no jurisdiction—first, because the registration of a trade-mark under the Act of 1883 amounts to the grant of a franchise, and section 56 of the County Courts Act, 1888, which defines the jurisdiction of county courts, excludes from the cognizance of the county court any action in which the title to a franchise shall be in question, and that the defence raised by the defendant in this case put the plaintiff's right to his trade-mark in issue; and, secondly, on the ground that actions for infringement of trade-marks can only be brought in the High Court. The learned county court judge was of opinion that registration of a trade-mark is not the grant of a franchise. He had some doubt as to whether an action for infringement of a trade-mark could be brought in the county court even in a case where no question as to the right of the plaintiff to the trade-mark is in issue, but he made the following order: "It appearing that the defence to this action puts in issue the question of the plaintiff's right to the exclusive use of his registered trade-mark, and his right to have such trade-mark continued on the register, which is a question which this court has no jurisdiction to decide, I do not think fit to make any order in this action." The Divisional Court reversed this decision, and held that the county court judge had jurisdiction, and we have to consider whether the Divisional Court is right.

We approach the case with diffidence, because we agree with Lord Alverstone that it raises a question of considerable importance and difficulty, a question, indeed, as to which the Chief Justice himself expressed his anxiety that his decision should be reviewed by the Court of Appeal. The case is certainly one of difficulty, but we think that in the Court of Appeal we have had the advantage of arguments on points which were not raised in the Divisional Court. The Lord Chief Justice and Kennedy, J., both agreed with the county court judge that a trade-mark is not a franchise within the meaning of the exception from county court jurisdiction contained in section 56 of the Act of 1888. We agree. The decision in Reg. v. The Halifax County Court Judge, [1891] 2 Q. B. 263, on a question of franchise only applied to actions relating to infringements of patents, which actions were excluded from the cognizance of the county courts, because a patent right is a franchise within the meaning of section 56 of the Act of 1888. We think that the registration of a trade-mark does not give to the owner of the trade-mark a privilege granted by the Crown in right of its prerogative. Registration of a trade-mark under the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, only affects the rights of proprietors of trade-marks in legal proceedings for infringement, and the conditions under which actions for infringement can be brought, and the effect of proof of registration in support of the plaintiff's case. There is nothing, it will be observed, in sections 75, 76, and 77, which deal with the effect of registration, to suggest a grant of a privilege in derogation of the common law rights of other subjects of the Crown. The Act assumes that in a sense there may be property in a trade-mark, and provides for the protection of that property by a statutory system of registration, and regulates the proceedings to obtain registration or to object thereto, and the correction of the register, and regulates legal procedure. But this is all that this Act or the amending Act of 1888 seems to us to do in respect of trade-marks. But, even though the registration of a trade-mark under these statutes does not operate as the grant of a franchise, and therefore does not make an action for infringement of a trade-mark fall within the exception in section 56 of the County Courts Act, 1888, as being an action in which the title to a franchise is in question, yet it may be that the jurisdiction of the county court is excluded by the express terms of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Acts. Great reliance was placed by counsel for the plaintiff upon the definition of "the court" in section 117 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, and upon the fact that in sections 62, 69 (4), 71, 72, 81 (5) (12), 90 (1) (2) (3), 92, the word "court," in the sense of the High Court of Justice in England, is used in respect of trade-marks, and an argument was also based upon the fact that, by section 18 of the Act of 1888, it is provided that in the action for infringement of a registered trade-mark, a judge may certify that the right to the exclusive use of the trade-mark came in question, and that if the court or a judge so certified, then in any subsequent action certain consequences as to costs should follow; and it was urged that, as it was manifest that this certificate could only be given in the High Court, this pointed strongly to the conclusion that an action for the infringement of a registered trade-mark could only be brought in the High Court of Justice. We think that there is considerable force in these arguments, especially as the definition of "the court" is stated to be, "in and for the purposes of, this Act," that is, the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883. We do not, however, think that the decision in Reg. v. The Halifax County Court Judge is conclusive in favour of these contentions, although, in our opinion, it tends strongly in that direction. It may be, however, that the decision of the Court of Appeal in that case was based upon the special provisions in the Act with regard to the trial of patent actions. But there is a further point to be considered, and that is, that, even assuming that the definition of "the court" in the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, does not exclude the jurisdiction of the county court in actions for infringement of trademarks, yet one has to examine the County Courts Acts to see if by those Acts any jurisdiction is given to the county courts in actions for the infringement of trade-marks. It is said that the jurisdiction is given by section 56 of the County Courts Act, 1888, which in substance is identical with section 58 of the repealed Act of 1846, the sum of £50 in the later Act being substituted for the sum of £20 in the earlier Act. The words relied upon as giving jurisdiction, under either Act, are the words, "all personal actions where the debt, demand, or damage" (in the later Act), "debt or damage" (in the earlier Act) "is not more than," &c. Prior to the Judicature Act, 1873, there was a difference between the common law courts and the equity courts with respect to actions to enforce the right to trade-marks. This is well pointed out in Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Wilson, 24 W. R. 1023, 2 Ch. D. 434, by Mellish, L.J., who says (at p. 454): "To give a right of action at common law the thing must have been done fraudulently, it must have been intended to deceive. But the courts of equity said, if you have purchased goods with another man's trade-mark upon them, although you may have done it perfectly honestly, not knowing that it was another man's trade-mark, or if you have manufactured goods for somebody else who has ordered you to manufacture them with a certain trade-mark upon them, and you have manufactured the goods with that trade-mark upon them, perfectly honestly and not knowing that you were doing anything wrong in putting that trade-mark upon them, yet, nevertheless, you cannot be allowed to put the goods into the market with that trade-mark upon them, because the effect of it will be that the goods will pass from hand to hand as being goods manufactured by the person whose trade-mark it is, and therefore you shall be restrained from doing that." That case was appealed to the House of Lords (26 W. R. 664, 3 App. Cas. 376) and the decision of the Court of Appeal was reversed; but Lord Cairns says, with reference to the point now under consideration (p. 391): "That there have been many cases in which a trade-mark has been used, not merely improperly, but fraudulently, and that this fraudulent use has often been adverted to and made the ground of decision, I do not doubt, but I wish to state in the most distinct manner that, in my opinion, fraud is not necessary to be averred or proved in order to obtain protection for a trade-mark." The present action is not based on fraud; it seeks to restrain (in the language of Lord Cairns) an "improper" as distinguished from a "fraudulent" use of the trade-mark. Such relief was, prior to the Judicature Acts, only given in courts of equity, and consisted in an injunction and an account of profits: damages could not be awarded until after the passing of the Chancery Amendment Act, 1858. Now, in 1846 the county courts had no equitable jurisdiction, and the common law courts could not have entertained an action for an injunction to restrain the infringement of a trade-mark, while the courts of equity, although exercising this jurisdiction, could not have given damages, and, even after the passing of the Chancery Amendment Act, 1858, could only have given damages by way of a subsidiary alternative. By section 1 of the Act of 1865, an Act to confer on the county courts a limited jurisdiction in equity, the power and authority of the High Court of Chancery in certain suits and matters were conferred on the county courts, but this Act certainly did not confer upon the county courts authority to entertain an action for an injunction or to give damages under the Chancery Amendment Act, 1858. We find, therefore, nothing in the County Courts Acts to confer this jurisdiction. Then it is said that the jurisdiction is given by the Judicature Act, 1873, which gives, by section 24, to the High Court, whether in the King's Bench Division or the Chancery Division, all the power and authority exercised by the Court of Chancery; and it is said that the county court, having the jurisdiction to entertain a personal action, where the debt, demand, or damage is not more than £50, can, by section 56 of the Act of 1888, entertain the present action and grant an injunction to restrain the defendants from infringing the plaintiff's trade-mark. We cannot agree. Such an action would not have been a personal action within the meaning of that word in section 58 of the Act of 1846, nor do we think that it comes within the meaning of the same word in section 56 of the Act of 1888. We think, therefore, that the county court judge had no jurisdiction, and rightly refused to make any order in this action; and it follows that the decision of the King's Bench Division must be reversed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Churchman & Winser; Carter & Bell.

Appeal.
(Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) Jan. 19.

O'BRIEN v. DOBBIE & SON. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation — Building — Scaffolding — Ladder — Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, it appeared that the deceased workman was employed on the work of constructing or repairing a building more than thirty feet in height, and that he and his fellow workmen made use of a ladder by standing on the rungs for the purpose of enabling them to do certain parts of the work. Apart from the ladder nothing in the nature of scaffolding was used in the work. The county court judge found that the ladder was used as a scaffolding, and held that it was a scaffolding within the meaning of the Act.

Held, that the decision of the county court judge could not be interfered with.

Appeal from an award of the judge of the Liverpool County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant for compensation was the widow of a deceased workman whose death had resulted from accidental injuries sustained by him in the course of his employment.

The employers had undertaken the work of converting into a shop a building which had been previously used as an ordinary dwelling-house. The building was over thirty feet in height. The workmen engaged in the operation made use of a ladder—that is to say, they from time to time stood on the rungs of the ladder for the purpose of enabling them to do certain parts of the work. Apart from this ladder nothing in the nature of scaffolding was used in the work. The deceased man was standing on one of the rungs of the ladder engaged on his work when he accidentally fell and received the injuries which resulted in his death.

The question was whether the work was being done "by means of a scaffolding" within the meaning of section 7, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act.

The county court judge, in giving his decision, said: "I think it is made out to my satisfaction that the building was being constructed by means of a scaffolding. I think it is evident in this particular instance that the ladder was used as a scaffolding. It had been used before and on the same day for the same purpose—that is, for a man to stand upon to do some work which was necessary in the building, and, in my opinion, that constitutes it a scaffolding within the meaning of the Act." He accordingly made an award in favour of the applicant.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The employers appealed.

Ruegg, K.C., and Hugh Fraser, for the employers.—The finding of the county court judge that this ladder was a scaffolding cannot be supported. A ladder per se is not and cannot be a scaffolding. Hoddinott v. Newton, Chambers, & Co. (Limited), 49 W. R. 380, [1901] A. C. 49, shows that the question whether a particular erection constitutes a scaffolding is not a mere question of fact on which the finding of the county court judge is final. Lord Macnaghten said: "It is a mixed question of fact and law. When the facts are ascertained it is a question of law on which the Court of Appeal is entitled, and I think bound, to express an opinion." It is a matter of practical importance that county court judges should now have the opinion of the Court of Appeal on the question whether a ladder pure and simple can be a scaffolding. There is a dictum of the Master of the Rolls in Veazey v. Chattle, 50 W. R. 263, [1902] 1 K. B. 494, that a ladder may be scaffolding; but there is no actual decision to that effect; and the House of Lords in Hoddinott v. Newton, Chambers, & Co. (Limited) did not overrule the earlier decision of the Court of Appeal in Wood v. Walsh & Sons, 47 W. R. 504, [1899] 1 Q. B. 1009, that a ladder by itself cannot be a scaffolding.

Tobin, K.C., and W. Greaves Lord, for the applicant, were not called upon to argue.

COLLINS, M.R.—The question raised in this case is one which has often been discussed—viz., whether a ladder can under any circumstances be deemed to be a scaffolding within the meaning of section 7, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act. The county court judge has not given a mere decision without explanation, but he has set out the reasons why he has arrived at the conclusion that in the circumstances of this case this particular ladder was a scaffolding. He said: "I think it is evident in this particular instance that the ladder was used as a scaffolding. It had been used before and on the same day for the same purpose—that is, for a man to stand upon to do some work which was necessary in the building, and in my opinion that constitutes it a scaffolding within the meaning of the Act." We cannot interfere with the finding of the learned county court judge unless he has arrived at it by misdirecting himself on some point of law. Now, has he misdirected himself? In order to say that he has misdirected himself in this case we should be bound to affirm that under no circumstances could a ladder pure and simple, without additions to it, be a scaffolding; that a ladder, as a matter of law, was incapable of being a scaffolding. But, as we have said more than once before, it is impossible to extract from the decisions of the House of Lords any principle which would have the effect of excluding a ladder per se from the category of possible scaffolding. I agree that it must now be taken that the question whether a particular arrangement is a scaffolding or not is not a pure question of fact. I think it is a question on which a jury, if the case were tried by a jury, would require some guidance from the judge. In my opinion a practical direction to a jury would be as follows: If a ladder were used exclusively for the purpose of giving access to a particular place, it ought to be held not to be a scaffolding, but if a ladder were used throughout the process of constructing or repairing a building exclusively for the purpose of enabling workmen to rise to a certain height and then and from that height to carry on the work of constructing and repairing, using one or other of the rungs as a standpoint from which to carry on their work, then it might properly be held to be a scaffolding. I cannot exclude the system of two uprights with rungs connecting them from the category of possible scaffoldings. The question to which of the two uses the ladder had been applied must be a question of fact, and that would be the question for the consideration of the jury. It might well be that an isolated case of a particular man on a particular occasion standing on the ladder while he was doing a certain amount of work would not constitute it a scaffolding. The question the jury would have to ask themselves would be this, to what use the ladder had been applied throughout the work. In my opinion the learned county court judge did not misdirect himself in arriving at the conclusion that this ladder was a scaffolding. The appeal will therefore be dismissed.

MATHEW and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the applicant, Helder, Roberts, & Co., for John A. Behn, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the employers, Faithfull & Owen, for T. B. Eastley, Liverpool.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Buckley, J. — March 17.

PAWLEY v. PAWLEY. (a.)

Married woman—Restraint on anticipation—Removal—Costs—Married Women's Property Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 63), s. 2.

Where a married woman possessed of separate estate, subject to restraint upon anticipation, was a plaintiff in an action which was dismissed with costs,

Held, that the onus is on the married woman to show that the jurisdiction under section 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893, to remove the restraint upon anticipation should not be exercised; but that the order will not be made as a matter of course.

Motion.

By the judgment delivered on the 9th of December, 1904, in an action in which Lucy Dresel, a married woman, was named as one of the plaintiffs, it was was ordered that the action be dismissed with costs, such costs when taxed to be paid by the plaintiffs to the defendant, as to the plaintiff Lucy Dresel out of her separate property as thereinafter mentioned, and not otherwise; and it was ordered that execution therein against the plaintiff Lucy Dresel be limited to her separate property not subject to any restraint upon anticipation, unless by reason of section 19 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, such property should be liable to execution notwithstanding such restraint; and liberty was given for the defendant to apply as to enforcing payment of the said costs when taxed, as regards the plaintiff

(a.) Reported by H. H. KING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lucy Dresel, out of any of her property which was subject to restraint on anticipation and otherwise as he might be advised.

The costs were taxed and certified at £125 11s. 6d., and the defendant was unable to obtain payment of them.

Lucy Dresel was entitled under the will of C. Pawley, deceased, to the income during her life of a share in the testator's estate, for her separate use without power of anticipation.

The trustees of C. Pawley's will, of whom the defendant was one, had about £200 income accrued due to the plaintiff Lucy Dresel in their hands.

The defendant moved on notice of motion to Lucy Dresel for an order (1) that he be at liberty notwithstanding the restraint upon anticipation to apply income accrued or accruing due to the plaintiff Lucy Dresel in his hands as a trustee of the said will in payment of (a) the sum of £125 11s. 6d. and interest, the amount of his taxed costs of the action, and (b) the defendant's taxed costs of this application; (2) that if necessary the defendant be appointed receiver of the said income up to the value of £125 11s. 6d. and interest, and the amount of the defendant's taxed costs of this application.

Cozens-Hardy, for the motion. — The application is made under section 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893, which says that in any action instituted by a married woman the court before which such action is pending shall have jurisdiction to order payment of the costs of the opposite party out of property which is subject to a restraint on anticipation, and may enforce such payment by the appointment of a receiver and the sale of the property, or otherwise as may be just. That jurisdiction has been frequently exercised: In re Godfrey, Thorne-George v. Godfrey, 43 W. R. 244, 72 L. T. 8; Cummins v. Perkins, 47 W. R. 138, 214, [1899] 1 Ch. 16. The onus lies on a married woman who has unsuccessfully brought an action to show why costs ought not to be made payable out of property subject to a restraint.

He also cited Hood-Barrs v. Cathcart, 43 W. R 560, [1895] 1 Q B. 873; Crickitt v. Crickitt, [1902] P. 177, 50 W. R. Dig. 147; Seton on Judgments, vol. 2, pp. 886, 887; Annual Practice, 1905, vol. 2, pp. 365, 366.

Lucy Dresel, in person.—I was joined as plaintiff in the action without my consent, and I told the solicitor who acted in the matter that I disclaimed all responsibility.

BUCKLEY, J.—On the 9th of December, 1904, the trial took place of an action in which one of the plaintiffs was Lucy Dresel, a married woman. The action was dismissed, the plaintiffs being ordered to pay the defendant's costs, and liberty being given to the defendant to apply as to enforcing payment of the costs as against Lucy Dresel out of any of her property which was subject to restraint upon anticipation. The costs were taxed at £125 11s. 6d., and this is an application under section 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893, to enforce payment of these costs out of her separate property subject to restraint on anticipation. No principle is laid down in the reported cases for the guidance of the court upon the hearing of these applications. If the court, merely because a married woman has brought an action and failed and has been ordered to pay her opponent's costs, can remove the restraint on anticipation in order that the successful defendant may obtain payment of his costs, any married woman can fritter away everything she has by becoming a professional litigant. It is not, in my opinion, a matter of course to make an order for payment of costs out of separate property subject to restraint. In the present case the judgment left it open for the defendant to apply for such an order. No grounds have been shown either for or against the removal of the restraint. Primâ facie the person who has obtained an order for costs against another person is entitled to have his costs paid, and the onus is on a married woman ordered to pay the costs to show that the doctrine of restraint upon anticipation ought to be applied in her favour to the prejudice of the person who has obtained an order for payment of costs. In the present case the married woman does not sustain that onus. She has handed in an affidavit to the effect that she did not consent to the proceedings in which she appeared as a plaintiff being taken. But I cannot consider this allegation in view of the fact that the order on her to pay costs is binding on me. It may or it may not be that she has some ground of complaint against the solicitor who commenced proceedings in her name; it is not for me to say whether she has or has not any claim against him. I make the order asked for on the present application.

Cozens-Hardy.—The applicant being one of several trustees, it would be advisable to take the order appointing him receiver without remuneration and without giving security on the lines of form 16 in Seton on Judgments, vol. 2, p. 887.

Solicitors for the applicant, Sandom, Kersey, & Knight.

Chan. Div.
Swinfen Eady, J. } Feb. 21.

In re SPARK'S LEASE.
BERGER v. JENKINSON. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Covenant not to underlet without licence—Licence not to be "unreasonably withheld."

Where there was a covenant not to assign or underlet without the landlord's written consent, "such consent not to be unreasonably withheld,"

Held, under the circumstances, it was reasonable for the landlord to stipulate for a similar covenant between the undertenant and himself.

Originating summons.

The landlord of a building occupied a part of it himself and underlet the remaining part to a tenant. There was a covenant by the tenant not to carry on or permit certain trades, and not to assign or underlet without the landlord's written consent, "such consent not to be unreasonably withheld." There was only one entrance to the building.

The tenant proposed to underlet, and eventually the landlord offered to grant the licence if the undertenant would agree not to assign or underlet without his consent, such consent not to be unreasonably withheld.

This summons was issued by the tenant to determine the question whether the landlord was entitled to insist on this condition.

The case was adjourned to enable the landlord to state in writing the exact licence he was prepared to grant.

It was subsequently agreed that the landlord should be a party to the underlease, and should have a direct covenant from the under-tenant.

The case came on again on the question of costs.

Martelli, for the tenant.

Eve, K.C., and Daniel Jones, for the landlord.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

SWINFEN EADY, J., in giving judgment, said: As the landlord occupied part of the building and had let off another part with a covenant by the tenant not to assign or underlet without the landlord's written consent, such consent not to be unreasonably withheld, it was reasonable for the landlord before granting the licence to underlet, to ask for what purpose the portion to be underlet was to be used, and to stipulate for a similar covenant between the undertenant and himself. The tenant's contention was not well founded, and he must pay the costs of the summons.

Solicitors, Downey & Linnell; Boyce & Son.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Kennedy, JJ.) March 24.

REX v. GRIMWADE AND ANOTHER (JUSTICES OF IPSWICH).
REX v. DODDS AND OTHERS (JUSTICES OF BIRKENHEAD). (a.)

Licensing law—Undertaking—Renewal of licence—Beerhouse—Mandamus—Licensing Act, 1904 (4 Ed. 7, c. 23), s. 9.

Upon an application for the renewal of an existing on-licence, the licensing justices have power under section 9 of the Licensing Act, 1904, to require the licence-holder to give such reasonable undertakings, as the justices deem fit, as a condition to the renewal of the licence, provided that, by section 9, sub-section 3, of the said Act, the aforesaid power cannot be exercised in respect to licences to which section 19 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, and section 7 of the Wine and Beerhouse Amendment Act, 1870, apply.

REX v. GRIMWADE AND ANOTHER.

Rule calling upon the justices of Ipswich to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue commanding them to hear and determine according to law an application for the renewal of the licence of a beerhouse licensed before May, 1869.

The Boiler-makers' Arms was a beerhouse licensed prior to the 1st of May, 1869. Upon an application for the renewal of the licence, the justices purporting to act under section 9 of the Licensing Act, 1904, hereinafter set out, in a considered judgment made the following order: "refuse to renew the licence unless the applicant give an undertaking that he would not sell beer for cash over the counter."

Section 1 of the Act of 1904 enacts: "The power to refuse the renewal of an existing on-licence on any other ground than the ground that the licensed premises have been ill-conducted . . . shall be vested in quarter sessions instead of the justices."

Section 9, sub-section 2, enacts: "If the justices of a licensing district refuse to renew an existing on-licence on the ground that the holder of the licence . . . has failed to fulfil any reasonable undertaking given to the justices on the grant or renewal of the licence, the justices shall be deemed to have refused the licence on the ground that the premises have been ill-conducted: Provided that where the justices, on the application for the renewal of an existing on-licence, ask the holder to give an undertaking as aforesaid, they shall adjourn the hearing of the application and cause notice of the required undertaking to be served upon the registered owner of the premises, and give him an opportunity of being heard. (3) Section 19 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, and section 7 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1870, are hereby repealed, and, in the application of this Act to licences to which the said section 19 extends, the grounds mentioned in section 8 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, shall be substituted for the grounds mentioned in this Act as the grounds on which the power to refuse the renewal of an existing on-licence is reserved to the justices of a licensing district."

The said justices did not appear by counsel, as they were advised that no fund existed out of which the fees of counsel might be defrayed. By permission of the court, the affidavit filed by them was read. They submitted the following material grounds why the rule should be dismissed: (1) That the applicant and the owners had an alternative remedy by appeal to quarter sessions, which course had been taken, and an appeal was now pending. Therefore the court should should refuse a mandamus on the authority of Reg. v. Justices of Bristol, 9 Times L. R. 273; Reg. v. Justices of Lancashire, L. R. 8 Q. B. 146; Reg. v. Charity Commissioners of England and Wales, 45 W. R. 336, [1897] 1 Q. B. 407; Reg. v. Registrar of Joint Stock Companies, 36 W. R. 695, 21 Q. B. D. 131. (2) That they had exercised the discretion given generally under the Licensing Acts, and especially under the Licensing Act, 1904, s. 9.

Avory, K.C. (Henlé with him), for the owners.—There is no appeal to quarter sessions unless the justices refuse to renew the licence. In this case the justices have in fact actually renewed the licence, but directed the clerk to retain it until the required undertaking is given; that is not a refusal in fact, and if we go to quarter sessions, the case might be well dismissed on that ground. The cases referred to in the affidavit of the justices only go to show that unless the remedy by mandamus is in some way more convenient, the appeal must go in the ordinary way to quarter sessions: Reg. v. Bowman, [1898] 1 Q. B. 663, 46 W. R. Dig. 83. [Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—We have frequently in this court acted on the grounds that a grant on condition may be treated as a refusal, but you had better address yourself to the real point in the case.] Sub-section 2 of section 9 is incorporated into section 1 of the Act, 1904, which enumerates the only grounds upon which the justices can now refuse to renew an existing licence. But sub-section 3 of section 9 explicitly enacts that the grounds mentioned in section 8 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, are substituted for the grounds mentioned in the Act of 1904 in the case of beerhouses licensed prior to May, 1869. In this case the justices have not refused on one of the grounds mentioned in the said section 8 of the 1869 Act, and the rule must be made absolute.

REX v. JUSTICES OF BIRKENHEAD.

Rule calling upon the justices of Birkenhead to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue commanding them to deliver up to the applicant his renewed licence in respect of the premises known as the Commercial Hotel, and situate at No. 123, Beckwith-street, Birkenhead, which said licence was granted by the said justices to the said applicant on or about the 1st day of March, 1905.

In this case the justices also purported to act under section 9 of the 1904 Act, but this case is distinguished from the above-mentioned Rex v. Justices of Ipswich, in that the application was in respect of an ordinary on-licence, and section 9, sub-section 3, therefore did not apply. The affidavit of the justices disclosed that after careful inquiry in their district they had come to the conclusion that precautions must be taken with a view to putting an end to the following evils which are found to be prevalent in connection with the sale of intoxicating liquors: (1) The sale of intoxicating liquor on credit; (2) the sale of intoxicating liquor to children; (3) the introduction of various games on the premises with a view of increasing the sale of intoxicating liquor; (4) the failure in many cases of licence-holders to devote attention to their business; (5) the use of back-door entrances to the premises; (6) the existence of societies accumulating funds to be expended on intoxicating liquor.

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Before the passing of the Act of 1904 it was the practice of the justices to obtain undertakings, that the applicant would not permit any of the aforesaid evils to exist in respect of his premises. At the general licensing meeting held on the 1st of January, 1905, the justices announced that no licence would be renewed unless the applicant entered into an undertaking not to permit any of the said evils to arise in connection with the premises for which the licence was required, and that the undertaking would be indorsed upon the licence. The justices then adjourned the meeting to the 15th of January, 1905, in accordance with the proviso to section 9, sub-section 2, of the Act, 1904, in order that notice might be served on the owner of the premises, to give him an opportunity of being heard. At the adjourned meeting, after hearing counsel, the justices, in giving judgment, said, inter alia: "We have decided that the Act does give us the power. We renew the licences on the condition of the undertakings being given, otherwise the licence will remain in the hands of the clerk." No appeal had been lodged to quarter sessions, and the time for appealing had passed.

Asquith, K.C. (with him Low, K.C., and Shepherd Little), showed cause.—It is admitted on both sides that the undertakings are reasonable, so that no question can arise on that point. It has been the practice for years all over the country to give similar undertakings, and the legality has never been tested. It is necessary to notice this, because it is by the recognition of the practice that a meaning is given to section 9. [WILLS, J.—It was never an undertaking that was given in reality. But if the requirements of the justices were not fulfilled the result would be that the licence was refused upon the next application for renewal.] If section 9 of the new Act only referred to undertakings which had been once given, or given voluntarily, the provision might be put into the waste-paper basket, because nobody would be so foolish as to give an undertaking without which the justices would have no discretion to refuse to renew the licence except on the grounds referred to in section 1. For this reason the Act provided that notice should be served upon the registered owner of the premises, for the licence-holder might well give any undertaking, no matter how prejudicial to the owner, in order to secure the renewal of his licence. The section does not work harshly against the licence-holder, as it is provided that the undertaking is to be reasonable. Indeed, if a person refused to give an undertaking which was reasonable, the justices, in accordance with the dictates of common sense, might well find that he was not a fit person to have his licence renewed. I reserve the objection that the rule should be dismissed on the ground that the true course was by appeal to the whole body of justices acting in and for the borough (section 8, sub-section 2, of the Act of 1904).

Bodkin, (F. E. Smith with him), for the applicant.—To deal with this question adequately it is necessary to consider the history of undertakings. In only two cases is there power to impose conditions on the renewal or grant of licences, and in both cases it can only be done by the consent of the licence-holder, and at his request: (1) Six-day licences, under section 49 of the 1872 Act; (2) early closing licences, under section 7 of the 1874 Act. But a custom sprang up of imposing conditions, and if these conditions were broken the applicant was refused his licence at the next meeting. Those undertakings were assented to voluntarily by the licence-holders; there was no power to force them upon them, nor does section 9 now create such a power. The section has abundant effect; if the applicant has entered into an undertaking in the past, or should do so in the future, then the jurisdiction of the justices is grounded. The proviso has a rational meaning; it might happen that the applicant might consent to give an undertaking which the owner could not submit to—e.g., to brick up a back door, where the owner had covenanted with his lessor not to do so.

Pickford, K.C. (Rigby Swift with him), for the owner.—The court seems impressed with the use of the word "reasonable." That was inserted for the protection of the owner in case the licensee recklessly gave an unreasonable undertaking. The section is of great value. If the applicant refuse to give the required undertaking, the justices, under section 1, sub-section 2, can refer the matter to quarter sessions. [KENNEDY, J.—Yes; but if your construction is correct, then at the most the licence can only be refused upon payment of compensation. That is very different from the contention of the justices, which, if correct, would enable them to refuse without compensation.] You cannot impose an "undertaking"; the mere use of the word shows that the Legislature intended it should be assented to. In fact, the language of the statute is "an undertaking given to the justices." [WILLS, J.—The Legislature meant more than that. In the proviso you have the words "ask to give an undertaking" and "the required undertaking." That is drawing nearer to the word "impose."] Upon any other construction of the statute, an applicant for the renewal of a licence would be placed in a worse position than an applicant for a grant of a new licence under section 4. [WILLS, J.—The conditions referred to in that section have nothing to do with undertakings of this nature. They have relation to monopoly values in the general interest of the public.] The justices, without this section, still have the same indirect power to obtain undertakings as they had prior to the Act. Before the Act the justices did not refuse to renew on the grounds that the undertakings were not given, but whenever the justices might have refused the renewal upon legal grounds, then they said, "We have the power to refuse to renew under the peculiar circumstances which have arisen, but if you enter into this undertaking we will look the matter over." The position is precisely the same now.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In the first case I think the objections must prevail. Sub-section 2 of section 9, coupled with section 1 of the Act of 1904, modify the law as to the jurisdiction of the justices in connection with the renewal of licences under particular circumstances. But sub-section 3 of section 9 expressly keeps alive the provisions of section 8 of the Act of 1869 with regard to beerhouses before 1869. [The learned judge read the sub-section set out above.] It seems, in my view, with regard to these beerhouses the powers of the justices are still confined by the earlier legislation, and nothing is added by the Act of 1904 to the jurisdiction of the justices. I think the rule must be made absolute.

In respect to the other case, in dealing with this kind of legislation, where we can see what seems to be the clear intention of the Legislature, and the purposes intended to be carried out, we ought not to divert that clear purpose and destroy the powers which would contravene the purpose by acting upon a narrow view of the expressed words, though I admit the words would seem to afford ground for the argument urged before us by Mr. Pickford and Mr. Bodkin. I think that this legislation cannot be understood without bearing in mind the existing practice which was well known and is correctly stated, I have no doubt, by Mr. Bodkin. In regard to statutory conditions I think he was right in saying there were only two, viz. (1) under section 49 of the 1872 Act in regard to closing on Sunday, (2) under section 7 of the 1874 Act in respect to early closing. But there had been, as was admitted by Mr. Bodkin in stating the case for the applicant, a long and well-known existing practice, whereby the magistrates had been in the habit of saying to applicants "We shall require you to enter into an undertaking if we are to grant the renewal of the licence." We are pressed to say that these undertakings were voluntary, and of no effect in law. In dealing with the matter as a mere question of law to a certain extent I agree, but I think that inasmuch as in the great majority of cases the statement made by the bench that they would require an undertaking to be given would practically mean a statement that the licences would not be renewed unless the undertaking were given, it amounts to a condition, because the requirement was such that they would not have got their licences renewed unless they gave the undertaking. Now, if one appreciates that state of things, I think it quite possible to see how the framers of this Act, which I do not doubt was hotly contested in the House of Commons, slipped into the use of an expression which, if construed in the strict sense in which Mr. Pickford wants us to construe it, would have the effect of destroying the old practice and making this legislation of none effect. I think one requires to look at the whole Act. Sub-section 1 of section 1, though it removed from the licensing justices the question of general discretion, left to them the power of refusing to renew on the ground "that the premises have been ill-conducted, or grounds connected with the character or fitness of the proposed holder of the licence." Therefore, what I may call the individual house, apart from the question of the number of public-houses in the neighbourhood, the conduct of the house and character of the holder are still left to the justices. Then we come to sub-section 2 of section 9, which to a certain extent extends the purview of the words "ill-conducted." The section provides that "if the justices refuse to renew . . . on the ground that the holder has failed to fulfil any reasonable undertaking given to the justices on the grant or renewal of the licence. . . ." Now, stopping there, Mr. Pickford asks us to say that the section is only intended to apply to the case in which the justices have asked the applicant to give an undertaking. Then it is said, if in a subsequent year the justices found the licensee had failed to fulfil the undertaking, they could decide that the house was ill-conducted. The words are open to the construction Mr. Pickford puts upon them, but I am bound to say the legislation would be absolutely worthless. I cannot see, on such a construction of the Act, how anybody would give an undertaking if he could get the licence without it. I proceed with the section: "Provided that where the justices . . . ask the licence-holder to give an undertaking as aforesaid they shall adjourn the hearing of the application and cause notice of the required undertaking . . ." I cannot help thinking that the draughtsman of this Act of Parliament in using the word "require" had got in his mind the existing practice. It is something the justices require the licensee to give as a condition of renewal. The undertaking is not made to depend solely upon the consent of the licence-holder. It is possible the publican will promise almost anything if he is going to get his licence. Hence it must be a reasonable undertaking, and the justices must adjourn "the hearing of the application" to give the registered owner of the premises an opportunity of being heard. I come to the conclusion that the justices have got the power to say "If we renew this licence, you (the licensee) must give this reasonable undertaking, subject to the owner being heard as to the question of it being reasonable." In this particular case no question of reasonableness arises. We are asked to say that this construction is not correct because section 4 of the Act uses the word "condition" on the grant of a new licence, and if it was meant to use the word "undertaking" in the sense I have used it, we should have found the word "condition." I must say I think the word "condition" concerns really conditions as regards the tenure and property and conditions which have in view other sections of the Act dealing with monopoly value. It is quite true the section speaks of "good management," but the conditions to be imposed to secure to the public any monopoly value, having regard to proper provisions for suitable premises and good management. I do not think section 4 was intended to touch the matter with which we are dealing. Now the fair interpretation of section 9 is that the justices may require a reasonable undertaking to be given, and as I have taken this view after full argument, then if I am wrong, and if another construction is to be put upon the section, it must be by a higher authority. I do not think we must narrow this sub-section. I have had some doubt whether the magistrates have so acted that we ought to discharge this rule. It was pressed upon us, and there was some ground for the contention that the magistrates did not refuse to renew the licences. But we have always stated, and we have acted upon it in more than one case, that a renewal with a condition attached to it is a conditional renewal or is a conditional refusal if the condition is not complied with. If I am not right, some question may arise as to whether the justices have sufficiently refused this licence, but I point out that no substantial harm has been done. The applicants have thought fit to allow the time for appealing to go by. Entertaining the view I do, that the justices had the power to deal with this case, I do not think we ought to send the case back, especially as the applicants took no steps to have the appeal heard. For these reasons I have come to the conclusion in this very important matter that the rule has failed and must be discharged with costs.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion with regard to both cases. I have nothing to add to what my lord has said in respect to the first case, because it appears to me that sub-section 3 of section 9 is clear, definite, and unmistakable. The magistrates have no power to refuse the renewal of the licence except on the four grounds mentioned in section 8 of the 1869 Act.

With regard to the other case I think it undoubtedly raises a question of considerable difficulty. The difficulty arises from the imperfect draughtsmanship of the Act, or more likely owing to the circumstances under which Acts of Parliament are passed in England, which so often makes it absolutely impossible that the whole legislation should be carefully collated at the time the Act is passed and consolidated into an absolutely harmonious expression. I am very much pressed in my own judgment by the consideration that if we are to read section 9 as we are urged to do by Mr. Pickford and Mr. Bodkin, then this section is simply an extravagantly idle piece of legislation, because I cannot get to the frame of mind in which Mr. Pickford appears to be on the matter, that there would be any possibility of anybody giving an undertaking of this character. The effect of giving such an undertaking would be this: if the undertaking given at the grant or renewal were broken, the justices would be at liberty to refuse the renewal of the licence under circumstances which would prevent compensation attaching. On the other hand, if he refused to give such an undertaking he would be subject to no such disability and no such disadvantage. And looking at human nature as it is, I cannot conceive that anybody would be so foolish in fact as to give such an undertaking where the only consequence would be to subject himself to a substantial disadvantage, and therefore it would reduce this piece of legislation to an absolute absurdity or to that which would be only applicable to the existing licences which were actually current at the time the Act was passed. Nobody would doubt but that this was meant to last more than a year. I do not think that any construction which would drive us to that consequence can be given, unless it is impossible to interpret the language by any other construction. Now the word "required" is used in the second paragraph of sub-section 2. [The learned judge read the proviso.] The "required undertaking" means what it says, an undertaking which is required. How can they require if there be no power to enforce it either directly or indirectly. Require is a word which implies the existence of some means or other of making the requirement operative. I need not go into the history of the manner in which these undertakings came into being, to which my lord has referred, except for the purpose of saying that it does explain how the phraseology should have run into a wrong course. It is rather a matter of form than anything else whether the proper way of looking at it is that the magistrates having the power to require, have really the power of attaching a condition to the licence, or whether the proper way of looking at it is this, they are not bound to act until the undertaking is given. It is a pure matter of form and is only material for the purpose of seeing whether an appeal would lie. To my mind an appeal would clearly lie, as it is something which touches the renewal of the licence. I come to the conclusion that we should be be doing wrong if we did not do our best to give a reasonable construction to the Act and prevent it from being a nullity. It seems to be a beneficial piece of legislation.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I can say nothing further, because there is nothing which is required to be said, with respect to the first case.

The second case is one of difficulty; I concur entirely with the view which has been taken by my lord and brother Wills. I just wish to add a few words as to the point to which Mr. Pickford in his very clear argument laid special stress. I refer to the provisions in the same Act of Parliament, viz., section 4, sub-section 2, which deals with the grant of a new licence, and the imposition of certain conditions. His argument was that it seemed unreasonable that in regard to the powers of the justices in granting new licences, while they might attach conditions, there was no provision, as in section 9, sub-section 2, to be found, that if those conditions be not fulfilled the justices should be deemed to refuse the licence on the ground that the premises were ill-conducted. In other words, it is unreasonable that in section 9, in regard to renewal, there should be a result which has not been conceded to the non-fulfilment of the conditions which the justices might impose on granting a new licence. To my mind there is nothing in that argument, and for this reason, that with regard to the conditions which may be imposed under section 4, there is no limitation as to the character of the condition. There the justices may attach to the grant of a new licence such conditions as they think proper. There is no limitation such as is attached to the powers given under section 9. The only undertaking to which they apply is a reasonable undertaking, and where a reasonable undertaking is given, the Legislature has thought fit to enact—as I should have thought only commensurate with common sense—that in the event of the breach the justices might refuse the renewal on the grounds that the premises had been ill-conducted; whereas under section 4 there is no qualification at all as to the conditions which may be imposed on the grant of a new licence, for the Legislature has left entirely to the discretion of the justices what they shall impose, and as there is no qualification as to unreasonable terms, there is not imposed as a consequence of the breach the same penalty as where the statute required reasonable terms. The only matter which troubled me at all, as to which I should have been sorry to have come to any other conclusion than I have, was whether the justices by the course they have taken have not precluded themselves in their judgment from saying "We refuse this licence." It occurred to me that it might be said there had been no determination in point of form which would have admitted of an appeal; but on reflection it appears to me there is nothing in that point. It seems to me the applicants might have gone to quarter sessions by treating this as a refusal to renew. My lord has expressed that view, and I do not see why they could not have appealed, as persons who had been aggrieved in respect to an act on the renewal of a licence. I am of opinion the rule should be discharged.

Rex v. Grimwade: Rule made absolute.

Rex v. Dodds: Rule discharged with costs.

Solicitors for applicant (1), Field, Roscoe, & Co., for Leighton & Aldous, Ipswich.

Solicitors for applicant (2), Godden, Son, Holmes, for Thomson, Hughes, & Mathison, Birkenhead.

Solicitors for justices (2), Lloyd-George, Roberts, & Co., for Gerrard Copeland, Town Clerk of Birkenhead.

K. B. Div.
Warrington, J. } Feb. 13, 18.

TILLING (LIMITED) v. DICK, KERR, & CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Highway — Obstruction — Tramway reconstruction — Maintenance of tramcar traffic—Public authority—Statutory powers — Implied powers — Contractors — Action six months after damage—Tramways Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 78), s. 25—London County Tramways (Electrical Power) Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. ccxxxviii.), s. 6—Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 61).

The London County Council owned and worked certain tramways. They had power by a special Act to reconstruct the tramways for their electrification, but had no express statutory power to provide for the maintenance of the tramcar traffic meanwhile, or to put any rails in the streets raised above the surface. The defendants contracted with the council to carry out the reconstruction, and to provide during the work for the continuance of the tramcar traffic. For that purpose they placed a line of rails in the streets raised above the street level which, unless authorized by statute, was a nuisance. The omnibuses of the plaintiff company sustained damage in passing over these raised rails.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the raised rails were not necessary for the reconstruction, and were not therefore authorized by the special Act, but were a nuisance, and that the damage caused was actionable.

Held, also, that as the defendants were independent contractors they were not protected by the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c 61), although the acts complained of were done more than six months before the issue of the writ.

This was an action by an omnibus company for damages for injuries caused to their omnibuses by obstructions placed in the streets by the defendants, who were reconstructing tramways in London under contract with the London County Council.

The London County Council prior to the year 1900 purchased under statutory powers the South London Tramways of the London Tramways Co. By the London County Tramways (Electrical Power) Act, 1900, provision was made for the substitution of electrical for horse traction on their tramways. Section 6 of the Act provided that "for the purpose of working the tramways by electrical power" the London County Council "may reconstruct or make such alterations of the tramways and may execute all such works on or in connection therewith in, over, or under the streets or roads in which the same are laid as may be necessary for adapting the same to be so worked," provided that in certain cases certain consents were obtained. The Pimlico, Peckham, and Greenwich Street Tramways Act, 1869, which authorized the construction of the tramways in question (by sections 6 and 37), and the Tramways Act, 1870 (by section 25), provided that the uppermost surface of the tram rails should be on a level with the surface of the street, and that the rights of the public to pass over or along the streets should not be abridged save as in the Acts provided.

For the purpose of converting the South London tramways to a system of electrical tramways, in December, 1902, the London County Council entered into a contract with the defendants by which the latter undertook the work connected with the conversion, as described in the contract and in a specification annexed, at a certain price. The contract and specification contained provisions casting upon the defendants the duty of observing the provisions of the statutes, and the responsibility for all the damage caused by the interference with traffic or otherwise. Clause 13 provided for the continuance of the tramway traffic during the alterations, stating (inter alia) "the contractors shall provide all flush or raised temporary junctions and turnouts for diverting the horse-car traffic so that it can be carried on for both the up and down services on the track not in process of construction, and they are to lay flush or raised temporary lines as required between the turnouts." The plaintiffs were a company whose omnibuses plied for hire over the roads in the district in question. They complained that in carrying out the work the defendant company had placed tramrails raised as to project above the surface of the road in various places in the district, and that in crossing over these raised tramrails on various occasions their omnibuses had been damaged, and they gave particulars of sixty-nine cases of the kind. The plaintiffs claimed from the defendant company the amount of the damage thus sustained by them.

At the trial a portion of the Romney-road, opposite the Royal Naval College at Greenwich, was taken as an example of what had been done by the defendant company. For the purpose of maintaining the traffic on the double line of rails, and with a desire at the same time to interfere as little as might be with the ordinary traffic, the defendant company had laid between the kerb on one side of the road and the permanent tramway a temporary line of rails, at the same time closing altogether the other half of the road. The one half which was open for traffic was thus occupied by one of the two permanent lines and the temporary line. The temporary line was constructed of rails with a bevel on either side from the ground to the height of two inches or thereabouts, and with a groove in the top to take the flange of the wheel; the uppermost surface of the rails was therefore not on a level with, but was above the surface of the street. At intervals there were clamps and nuts projecting above the surface of the raised rails. At the two ends of each section so dealt with, called "turnouts," a junction was made between the temporary line and the permanent way.

His lordship found as facts that the raised rails placed by the defendant company were an obstruction to the highway and caused damage to the plaintiffs' omnibuses, and also that it would have caused great public inconvenience to interrupt the service of cars, and that less real interference to the ordinary traffic was caused by the construction of a turnout as described than by carrying on the tram service on a single line with crossovers at intervals.

By their defence the defendant company pleaded that the acts complained of were done by them under the powers conferred by the statutes above mentioned, and that the causes of action arose more than six months before the issue of the writ, and that the action was therefore barred by the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893.

Avory, K.C., and J. A. Simon, for the plaintiff company.—Neither the London County Council nor their contractors were authorized to put upon the streets raised rails either for permanent or temporary purposes. The temporary line was not necessary for the reconstruction, which could have been carried out without it. They were placed for the convenience of the tramway traffic during the alteration. The case therefore falls within Rapier v. London Tramways Co. [1893] 2 Ch. 588, 41 W. R. Dig. 154, and not within London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Co. v. Truman, 34 W. R. 657, 11 A. C. 45. The defendant company are not protected by the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, as that Act only applies to the public authority itself and its officers. This is shown by its title, which must be read as part of the Act: Fielding v. Morley Corporation, 47 W. R. 295, [1899] 1 Ch. 1. The defendant company are not officers of the public authority: Stringer v. Barker, W. N. 1879, p. 127. The Act was not meant to apply to persons acting for their own profit (Attorney-General v. The Proprietors of the Margate Pier and Harbour, 48 W. R. 518, [1900] 1 Ch. 749), and this is also shown by the judgments in The Ydun, [1899] P. 236, 47 W. R. Dig. 166, and in Parker v. London County Council, 52 W. R. 476, [1904] 2 K. B. 501. Independent contractors do not come within the Act: The County Council of Kent v. The Mayor, &c., of Folkestone, ante, p. 371.

Ruegg, K.C., and J. P. Glasgow, for the defendant company. — The temporary rails were reasonably necessary in connection with the work of reconstruction, and as such are justified, upon the principle of London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Co. v. Truman. The defendant company are protected by the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893. That Act extends to servants of the authority: Greenwell v. Howell, 48 W. R. 307, [1900] 1 Q. B. 535. The defendant company were the agents of the London County Council, which was liable for their acts: Penny v. Wimbledon Urban District Council, 47 W. R. 565, [1899] 2 Q. B. 72.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 18.—WARRINGTON, J.—The plaintiffs are omnibus proprietors using the roads on which the work was done. I find as a fact that the raised rails were an obstruction to the highway and caused damage to the plaintiffs' omnibuses. There is evidence, which I accept, that it would have caused great public inconvenience to interrupt the service of cars, and that less real interference to ordinary traffic is caused by the construction of a "turnout" than by carrying on the tram service on a single line with "crossovers" at intervals. The first question is, Were the acts of the defendants authorized by the statutes? It is, I think, clear that the acts of the defendants would be a cause of action to the plaintiffs unless they were so authorized; and, further, that if the acts in question are authorized expressly or by necessary implication, the defendants would be excused, although the doing of them may occasion a nuisance, public or private. It is contended that the works constructed by the defendants are works necessary for adapting the tramways to be worked by electricity, and are, therefore, authorized by section 6 of the London County Council Tramways (Electrical Power) Act, 1900. I cannot adopt the defendants' construction; in my opinion the works they have constructed are not necessary for adapting the tramways to be worked by electricity, but were necessary (if at all) for maintaining the tramcar service uninterrupted. Works for this purpose are, in my judgment, not covered by the Act, and the defendants are accordingly not protected by it.

Then arises the question whether, as to the causes of action which arose more than six months before the date of the writ, the action is barred by the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893. The full title is as follows: "An Act to generalize and amend certain statutory provisions for the protection of persons acting in the execution of statutory and other public duties"; and the first section runs thus: [His lordship read the section, and continued:] It has been held that the protection of the Act extends to the officers of a public body and to persons acting under their direct mandate (Greenwell v. Howell and Another), but there is no case deciding that it extends to independent contractors doing under contract and for their own profit the works which the public body is authorized to do. In the absence of authority I should have been prepared to hold that contractors undertaking work for their own profit are not within the protection of an Act passed as this is "for the protection of persons acting in the execution of statutory and other public duties." I am glad to find that this view is supported by the decision of the Court of Appeal in County Council of Kent v. Mayor, &c., of Folkestone. In my opinion, therefore, the plaintiffs are entitled to the relief they ask. It is agreed that the damages are to be ascertained by some form of reference. The defendants must pay the costs up to and including judgment. I propose, therefore, to make declaration that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover damages in respect of the matters complained of in this action, and to refer it to the official referee in rotation to ascertain the amount of such damages.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Solicitors, Hicklin, Washington, & Pasmore; William Hurd & Son.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy and Ridley, JJ.) — Feb. 1.

WILSON v. JUSTICES OF CREWE. (a.)

Licensing Law—Justices—Jurisdiction—Licence, What amounts to—Alehouse Act, 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61), ss. 4 and 14.

Sections 4 and 14 of the Alehouse Act, 1828, must not be read as separate enactments. Section 14 enumerates the special cases referred to in section 4: "In the cases hereinafter directed."

The non-sale of excisable liquors in a place kept as an inn is not conclusive in law that the place is not being kept as an inn so as to deprive the licensing justices of the jurisdiction given to them under section 4 of the aforementioned Act. The question is one of fact.

Reg. v. Cotham, [1898] 1 Q. B. 802, explained.

Special case stated by the court of quarter sessions for the county of Chester.

The Earl of Chester's Own Inn was a fully-licensed public-house kept by one Darbyshire, who in the early part of 1904 became a bankrupt.

In March of that year Herbert John Wilson, hereinafter called the respondent, applied to the justices of Crewe for the transfer of the licence with the consent of Darbyshire's trustee in bankruptcy. It was refused, partly on the ground that the respondent was not a fit and proper person.

The respondent appealed on the 6th of April to the court of quarter sessions, when the transfer of the licence was granted on terms—viz., that he should not exercise the licence, the object being to keep alive the licence till a more suitable person could be secured. In pursuance of this understanding the order of the court was sent direct to the clerk of the justices of Crewe. The respondent, not possessing the order, was prevented from taking out an excise licence, and in consequence could not retail excisable liquors. The house in fact was kept closed till October, but the key had been given to the respondent on the 7th of March. He subsequently put furniture into the house, gave directions to have it painted, made arrangements with benefit societies to hold meetings in the house, and did other acts to indicate his intention to use the place as it had been used.

On the 28th of June he applied to have the licence transferred to one Spencer. It was dismissed, on the ground that under section 4 of the Alehouse Act, 1828, the justices had no power, as the transfer must be from a person who "theretofore kept" the inn, whereas the respondent had not kept the inn, which had been closed for some months, and in respect to which there was no existing excise licence actually taken out.

The respondent again appealed to the court of quarter sessions, which allowed the appeal subject to the special case stated for the opinion of the court, whether the justices under the circumstance aforementioned had any jurisdiction to grant the transfer of the licence. There was a further question submitted, as to whether the correct course should not have been by mandamus instead of appeal to the court of quarter sessions, but by agreement the point was not argued.

Low, K.C. (Ellis Griffiths with him), for the appellants, the justices of Crewe.—This application to transfer the licence was made under section 4 of the Alehouse Act, 1828. The respondent was never granted a licence in any real sense, because the justices held the order, so that he could not take out the licence. As to what amounts to a licence see Tower Justices v. Chambers, 52 W. R. 541, [1904] 2 Q. B. 903, and the Master of the Rolls, at p. 913: "A licence involves the idea of a person who is to be the licence-holder." The justices could not regard the respondent as the holder of the licence for a further reason, that under sections 1 and 4 their jurisdiction is only to grant the licence to a person deemed fit and proper, whereas the justices and the court of quarter sessions considered the respondent did not fulfil these requirements. Again, it is essential under section 4 that the respondent Wilson should have kept an inn. He did not do so. The inn was shut from January to October. Wilson could not have sold excisable liquors had he desired to do so. Section 37 gives the definition of an inn: "Houses in which shall be sold by retail any excisable liquor to be drunk or consumed on the premises." The important point is that the house was not "theretofore kept as an inn" at the time of the application: Mackrell v. Brentford Justices, 48 W. R. 648, [1900] 2 Q. B. 387. Further, the respondent had not been in occupation of the premises, the house having been closed. Reg. v. Cotham, 46 W. R. 512, [1898] 1 Q. B. 802, is decisive on both these points, where the justices had granted a licence by way of transfer from a person who was not, and had not been, in occupation of the premises, and no excisable liquors had been sold for some years. Even if it be suggested that the application is under section 14 of the aforesaid Act, yet there is no jurisdiction, because Wilson must have had a licence before the section applies.

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Marshall, K.C. (Trevor Lloyd with him), for the respondent.—It is unnecessary to discuss whether the respondent was a fit and proper person, because the first appeal to the court of quarter sessions, where the licence was granted on terms, is not impeached. Cotham's case is under section 4, whereas I am entitled to treat this application as under section 14, the application being perfectly general It is true the applicant is the respondent and not Spencer, but there is not a word in section 14 that suggests the application must be by the new tenant: Reg. v. Justices of Liverpool, 32 W. R. 20, [1883] 11 Q. B. D. 638. The respondent did keep an inn so far as he could, and he at all times showed his intention to keep an inn by his acts. In Cotham's case the house was used for some years as a draper's shop.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This case raises points of difficulty. The questions that have been argued before us may practically be confined to two. First, whether the justices had or had not any jurisdiction under section 4 or 14 of the Alehouse Act, 1828, to grant a licence to Spencer by way of transfer from Wilson upon the ground that the house in respect to which the transfer was sought to be made had not been kept as a beerhouse such as would give to the justices the jurisdiction necessary at the time of the application. Secondly, assuming Wilson was not such a person who could transfer, whether this application must not be treated as an application by Spencer to have a licence transferred to him and not merely an application by Wilson to transfer. The last point was not raised by the justices. First, it has been argued that Reg. v. Cotham lays downs the principle that if a house has not been kept as an inn at the time of the application, the house was not one in respect to which a transfer could be made. The facts are not in dispute. [The learned judge then stated the facts as set out above.] It is said that at the time of the hearing of the second appeal to the court of quarter sessions the respondent was stated to be a person to whom a licence would not be granted, but that it was granted to keep the licence alive in order that a transfer might be made by him to a proper person. I state that fact in order that it may not be overlooked if the matter is taken further. In pursuance of that state of things the order was sent to the clerk of the justices, and not to Wilson himself, and in due course Spencer, who is seeking to get the licence, makes an application. The justices thought they had no jurisdiction.

An appeal was made to the court of quarter sessions, which granted the licence, but not under section 14. The first point raised by the court of quarter sessions in the special case, whether as a matter of procedure an appeal actually lay to that court, has not been argued before us. We must deal with the second point. The difficult consideration is to rightly decide whether or not, under the circumstances, the case comes under the principle laid down in Cotham's case, or whether it can be distinguished in law or in fact from that case. I think that temporary non-selling of liquors could not be a bar to the justices acting under section 4 or section 14. Both sections 4 and 14 must be regarded. You cannot treat them as separate enactments. They both deal with the power of the justices to transfer the licence; section 14 deals with special cases arising out of the general case dealt with in section 4. I should think that as regards jurisdiction under the two sections it would be difficult to contest that not selling excisable liquor for a limited period of time was a bar to the jurisdiction. I will mention a case to which I referred in the argument. So far back as 1883, in Reg. v. Justices of Liverpool, it was held that a person applying in respect to a house where there had been no sale for a considerable time was entitled to apply. That decision was followed by Lord Coleridge in Symons v. Wedmore, 42 W. R. 301, [1894] 1 Q. B. 401. It is not a decision on the express point, but it assumes the point. Also, in the case of Baldwin v. Justices of Dover, [1892] 2 Q. B. 421, 41 W. R. Dig. 115, the same decision was interpreted and followed, so that the authority is a permanent one. It seems to me, therefore, that non-sale would not be conclusive. It seems to me a question of fact. The magistrates have dealt with this question of fact. Wilson was certainly endeavouring to carry on the place as an inn. Wilson was applying for a licence. He was keeping the house as a house which had been used as an inn, and as far as he did anything at all he used it as an inn would have been used, for he contrived in various ways to keep the premises recognized as an inn. When the court of quarter sessions in June granted him a licence, they did it upon terms, which show the premises were going to be renewed as an inn, because they make it a sort of condition that he or some other person should apply for a transfer to a fitting person.

I am troubled by the reasoning in Cotham's case, because, if I had come to the conclusion that Wills, J., or Kennedy, J., had intended to lay down as a principle that any substantial interruption of the sale of excisable liquors was not keeping the place as an inn in the sense of a place where liquor was sold, I should have felt bound to obey that ruling, though not without criticism. I cannot help thinking that Wills and Kennedy, JJ., were really speaking with reference to matters of fact, viz., that a licence had been granted in respect to a place which was not and had not been kept before as an inn. It was an extravagant proposition, as Wills, J., pointed out, to contend that the application came within section 4 where for thirteen years the place had been used for the purpose of carrying on a draper's business. I do not think it was necessary to lay down a general principle in regard to that matter. Kennedy, J., bases his judgment equally on the facts: see p. 807. I come to the conclusion that the learned judges decided the case on the facts, and we ought not to hold that a general principle was laid down which would prevent the justices admitting an application in the case of continuous occupation coupled with an interruption in the sale of excisable liquors.

Lastly, is Mr. Low entitled to say that the terms under which the court of quarter sessions made the order and what was done with the order show that Wilson was a person who could not transfer. If this was an application by Wilson to transfer it is possible that the machinery did not cover this case. But Mr. Marshall is right in saying that section 4 and section 14, being looked at together, the magistrates might have dealt with it as an application by Wilson or by Spencer under section 14. It appears to me, however, that for the purpose of the last hearing Wilson was the licensed holder. The justices had granted him the licence and upon terms. If that be not the case I think we should be entitled to treat it as an application on behalf of Mr. Spencer coming under section 14. I have decided this question as a question of fact, and I do not think it contravenes any principle which has been laid down as a principle of law in the cases referred to. This appeal must be dismissed.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree, and should wish to add a few words on the relation of section 14 to section 4 of the Alehouse Act, 1828. I think Mr. Bruce Williamson is correct when he states on p. 73 (Law and Practice of Licensing Sessions): "The words in the above section" (i.e., section 4) 'in the cases and in the manner and for the time hereinafter directed,' refer to section 14 of the same Act. That section ought there to be read in conjunction with section 4." It limits the jurisdiction of the justices to those cases specified in section 14. Section 4 constitutes the tribunal which grants transfers in cases coming under section 14.

RIDLEY, J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Taylor, Hoare, & Co., for Fletcher, Northwich.

Solicitors for the respondent, E. W. & Bruce Beal, for C. E. Speakman, Crewe.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

K. B. Div. (Bigham, J.) Jan. 17.

In re FITZGEORGE.
Ex parte ROBSON. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Proof—Guarantee of interest on debenture—Extinction of debt by operation of law—Continuing liability of guarantor.

The bankrupt had guaranteed the interest on a debenture in a limited company which was afterwards dissolved, the debt being thereby extinguished.

Held, on the bankruptcy of the guarantor, that the debenture-holder was entitled to prove as a creditor on the guarantee, as the debt had been discharged by operation of law and not by any act of the creditor.

Appeal against the rejection of a proof.

In August, 1892, the debtor gave to one Robson a guarantee that he would pay the interest due under a debenture for £3,000 in a limited company, should the company make default in payment of such interest, until the principal sum secured by the debenture should be repaid by the company.

In 1893 the company made default in payment of interest, and Robson thereupon enforced his debenture, which only realized £933.

In 1894 the company went into liquidation, and in 1895 it was dissolved under section 143 of the Companies Act, 1862, and thenceforth ceased to exist.

From 1894 to 1902 the debtor made payments to Robson on account of the interest under his debenture.

In 1902 the debtor became bankrupt, and in January, 1903, Robson presented a proof against the estate for £129 2s. 8d., being the interest due to that date, and also claimed that the trustee should estimate the capitalized amount of the debtor's liability to pay interest as guaranteed upon the principal sum of £2,067 remaining due under the debenture, and admit the proof for such amount.

The trustee rejected the proof on the ground that by the dissolution of the company the debt had gone, and therefore the liability for interest was also gone.

Robson appealed.

Carrington, for the appellant.—It must be admitted that the debt is gone, but as it has not gone by any act of the creditor, but simply by operation of law, the liability under the guarantee still subsists: In re London Chartered Bank of Australia, 42 W. R. 14, [1893] 3 Ch. 540.

Hansell, for the respondent.—The guarantee is simply for interest payable in respect of a debenture until the principal is repaid, and so long as the company is liable. The effect of the dissolving of the company is that there is no debt or debtor in existence, and interest cannot be payable upon a debt that has ceased to exist. [BIGHAM, J.—The creditor has done nothing to discharge the debt, why should he lose the benefit of the guarantee] I agree if the guarantee were for the debt, but it is only for the interest. [BIGHAM, J., referred to Ex parte Jacobs, 23 W. R. 251, L. R. 10 Ch. 211.]

Carrington was not called upon to reply.

BIGHAM, J.—In this case the creditor is entitled to prove for the value of his guarantee, whatever that may be. It has been argued that because the debt has gone the liability to pay interest has gone also. I do not agree to that proposition; the debt has not gone by any act of the creditor, but by operation of law, therefore the obligation under the guarantee is untouched. That obligation is that regular payment of the interest shall go on until the debt is repaid by the company. The debt has not been paid, and under the circumstances which have arisen it never will be paid, therefore the obligation under the guarantee remains, and the proof upon the guarantee must be admitted for a sum to to be ascertained.

Appeal allowed; the proof was admitted for a sum agreed between the parties.

Solicitors for the appellant, Paice & Cross.

Solicitors for the trustee, Tarry, Sherlock, & King.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (Ireland). } May 10, 1904.

McCARTNEY v. LONDONDERRY AND LOUGH SWILLY RAILWAY. (a.)

Water—Riparian owner—Abstraction of water—Purposes for which taken.

A railway company owning a small strip of land adjoining a natural stream have no right to abstract water for the purpose of supplying the locomotive engines of their railway; and a lower riparian owner is entitled to an injunction to restrain the company exercising such an alleged right, even though he suffers no substantial injury.

Decision of the Court of Appeal in Ireland reversed.

Sandwich (Earl) v. Great Northern R ilway, 27 W. R. 616, 10 Ch. D. 707, overruled.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal in Ireland (Lord Ashbourne, L.C., and Walker, L.J.; Fitzgibbon, L.J., dissenting), which affirmed that of the King's Bench Division.

The respondent railway company were the owners of strips of land adjoining a stream into which they inserted a pipe and diverted the water into a tank on their land about half a mile away, and by this means supplied their engines with water for forty miles of railway. The appellant, who was a riparian owner lower down the stream, stopped up the pipe; and the respondents brought an action against him for a declaration of their right to convey the water through the pipe and for an injunction. The action was tried by Holmes, L.J., without a jury, and judgment was given for the appellant with costs, which was reversed by the King's Bench Division.

M. Drummond, K.C, and D. S. Henry, K.C. (P. Law Smith with them), all of the Irish Bar, for the appellant.

Ronan, K.C. (of the Irish Bar), and S. T. Evans, K.C. (John Leech with them), for the respondents.

M. Drummond, K.C., replied.

THE HOUSE took time for consideration.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case the question arises between a millowner and a railway company, the latter claiming the right to take the water of a stream which the millowner uses to supply the power for his mill. The case was originally tried before Holmes, L.J, who decided in favour of the mill-owner; but the issues between the parties have become a little confused from admissions made on both sides, but which do not appear on the pleadings, or, indeed, by any written admission at all.

The railway company brought an action seeking to restrain the mill-owner from obstructing the railway company's alleged right in what the statement of claim described as a natural stream The mill-owner, in his plea, denied that it was a natural stream, and alleged that in fact it was an artificial water-course. There was ample evidence of this, and the learned judge who tried the cause found as a fact that it was an artificial watercourse made by the defendant and his predecessors in title, and had been used by him for a long time. For some unexplained reason this finding has been got rid of, I know not how, and the case has been argued upon the hypothesis that the stream is a natural stream, and another concession made, without pleading or written admission of any kind, that the action of the defendant in obstructing the plaintiffs' works was justified, unless the plaintiffs possess the right they claimed to abstract and use without in any way returning to the stream as much water as they require for the locomotives on their line of railway up to 15,000 gallons. Some effort was made in the argument to minimize the amount which the railway company claim to have a right to take, and, indeed, the Court of King's Bench in Ireland preface their judgment by a recital, which is apparently intended to limit the user; but it does not do so, nor, as FitzGibbon, L.J., pointed out, is it easy to see what operation that recital can have.

The railway company claim a right to place in the stream a pipe which, if used to the full capacity, would take 15,000 gallons a day, but of which they say their present requirement would be satisfied with a third of that quantity. Notwithstanding the recital, it appears to me the judgment of the Court of Appeal would entitle them to take as much as they wanted up to the extent of 15,000 gallons. The pipe would take 15,000 gallons per day. The railway company claim to keep their pipe such as it is, together with an admission that they may want more than they at present take; and the Court of Appeal have affirmed the judgment of the King's Bench. But Holmes, L.J., also decided that, even if the stream were a natural stream, the defendant was entitled to the verdict, inasmuch as the plaintiffs were not entitled to the use of the stream in the manner claimed. I am of opinion that Holmes, L.J., was right. It seems to me that any other decision would be in conflict with the decision of this House in the case of Swindon Waterworks Co. v. Wilts and Berks Canal Navigation Co., 24 W. R. 284, L. R. 7 H. L. 697. In that case Lord Cairns, with the complete assent of Lord Hatherley and Lord Selborne, gave an elaborate exposition of riparian rights, which, though not a new decision, was nevertheless supposed to have settled and almost codified the law upon the subject.

Now it is necessary to consider what it is the railway company do, because that is what they claim a right to do. By a pipe placed in the stream at a point where they own some land adjoining the stream they fill a tank with water to be used in the boilers of their locomotive engines. The engines, of course, consume the water in the course of their journeys; the railway itself is forty miles in length, but is connected with other railways over which their engines run for a much greater distance. If the question were the reasonableness in respect of quantity, I should think it a most unreasonable thing that the use of a stream passing through a very small area of riparian land should be made to extend to forty miles of country, or wherever else the exigencies of the railway service might require. Speaking of it simply in respect of quantity, I think it more unreasonable than supplying drinking water to an asylum built on the banks, which has been held to be unlawful. But, in truth, it is not a question of the quantity at all. I now apply Lord Cairns' words, which I think are literally applicable here: "The use which they" (in this case the railway company) "claim the right to make of it, is not for the purpose of their tenements at all, but is a use which virtually amounts to a complete diversion of the stream . . . it is a confiscation of the rights of the lower owner." It is to be observed that Lord Cairns used this language when a water company who were riparian proprietors had taken water to supply their customers in a neighbouring town, but in which case it was found as a fact that the complaining plaintiffs were not damaged at all.

For another reason the question of damage here has become immaterial. The railway company set up a right to do what they have done. It is not here a question of an injury being so trifling that a court of equity will accordingly not interpose by the remedy of an injunction. Here they not only set up a right, but actually ask for a declaration of their right to do what they have done.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

I have said that the judgment of Lord Cairns had codified the rights of riparian proprietors, and I used that phrase because I do not think there is any novelty in the decision. It certainly has been the law as understood in England for more than half a century. The only part of the judgment of FitzGibbon, L.J. (who has admirably dealt with every other part of the case), with which I am unable to concur is that in which he expresses the opinion that Bacon, V.C.'s, judgment—Sandwich (Earl) v. Great Northern Railway, 27 W. R. 616, 10 Ch. D. 707—was right upon the facts proved before him. I cannot agree to that. It may be that the Vice-Chancellor would have been justified in refusing an injunction and leaving the plaintiff to his remedy at law, but unfortunately he uses language which seems to affirm the right of the railway company to carry the water along their line, and justifies this as a riparian use. To this I cannot assent. For the reasons I have given I think this is not a riparian use at all, and, except upon the ground I have suggested, I must say I think the decision was wrong.

I move that the appeal should be allowed, that the judgment of Holmes, L.J., be restored, and that the respondents do pay to the appellant the costs both here and below.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I prefer the judgment of FitzGibbon, L.J., and what now remains of the judgment of Holmes, L.J., to the opinion of the learned judges from whom they differ.

Holmes, L.J., who tried the case at the Derry Assizes without a jury, rested his decision on two grounds. In the first place he came to the conclusion that the stream about which this litigation has arisen was really an artificial watercourse, and that McCartney and his predecessors in title had had the control and management of it from a point above the proposed intake of the railway company for a period beyond living memory. In the second place, assuming the stream to be a natural watercourse, he held the thing which the railway company proposed to do was not within the rights attached to riparian ownership.

For some reason or other which I do not understand the first ground of decision was abandoned in the Court of King's Bench and in the Court of Appeal. I regret the course that was taken. The matter seems to me to be worthy of serious consideration, and I cannot altogether accept the view of one of the learned judges of the Court of Appeal, who dealt with the question and disposed of it summarily and without argument. However, the point is not open now. The appellant must be held to the concession made on his behalf, and the case must be tried as if McCartney's mill-race were to all intents and purposes a natural stream. Even so, if it had not been for the judgment of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland and the great preponderance of judicial opinion in Ireland, I confess I should have thought the case very plain and covered by authority.

There are, as it seems to me, three ways in which a person whose lands are intersected or bounded by a running stream may use the water to which the situation of his property gives him access. He may use it for ordinary or primary purposes, for domestic purposes, and the wants of his cattle. He may use it also for some other purposes—sometimes called extraordinary or secondary purposes—provided those purposes are connected with or incident to his land, and provided that certain conditions are complied with. Then he may possibly take advantage of his position to use the water for purposes foreign to or unconnected with his riparian tenement. His rights in the first two cases are not quite the same. In the third case he has no right at all.

Now it seems to me that the first question this House has to consider is, under what category does the proposed user of the railway company fall? Certainly it is not the ordinary or primary use of a flowing stream, nor is it, I think, one of those extraordinary uses connected with or incidental to a riparian tenement which are permissible under certain conditions. In the ordinary or primary use of flowing water a person dwelling on the banks of a stream is under no restriction. In the exercise of his ordinary rights he may exhaust the water altogether. No lower proprietor can complain of that. In the exercise of rights extraordinary but permissible, the limit of which has never been accurately defined and probably is incapable of accurate definition, a riparian owner is under considerable restrictions. The use must be reasonable. The purposes for which the water is taken must be connected with his tenement, and he is bound to restore the water which he takes and uses for those purposes, substantially undiminished in volume and unaltered in character. What the railway company propose to do is to abstract a certain portion of the water of the stream, to carry it along their own property to a tank half-a-mile off, and then to consume it in working their locomotive engines. They have more than forty miles of railway of their own, and they have running powers over the lines of other companies. They have no intention of restoring to the stream a single drop of the water they mean to abstract, nor is it possible for them, under the circumstances, to do anything of the kind. Is that a user which, though extraordinary, is yet legitimate and permissible? I should say, certainly not. So far as the interests of the lower proprietors are concerned, they mean to efface and blot out, as it were, that portion of the stream which they propose to abstract. They mean to do so for their own gain—to save themselves the expense of paying for the water required for the purposes of their business or gathering it for themselves. And they claim to do this as of right. It seems to me that they might just as well claim to sell the water. And, indeed, counsel for the respondents did not shrink from that position. He boldly contended that they would be perfectly justified in selling the water, or doing anything they pleased with it, provided the lower proprietor was not practically injured. By way of clenching this argument, counsel pointed out that the learned judge at the trial expressed no opinion as to the extent to which McCartney's water power would or might be diminished by what the railway company proposed to do. And he succeeded, I think, in showing that there was no reported case in which the court had interfered where the injury complained of was so inconsiderable as that which would be likely to occur in the present case. That may be very true, but all the cases to which he referred were cases where the injury complained of was done in the exercise, or assumed exercise, of an authorized and permissible user. That seems to me to make all the difference.

I said I thought this case was covered by authority. It seems to me to be entirely covered by the decision of this House in the case of Swindon Waterworks Co. v. Wilts and Berks Canal Navigation Co. There Lord Cairns, L.C., gave a judgment as to the rights of riparian owners so complete and exhaustive that I venture to say no case has since come before the courts, not excepting the case of Kensit v. Great Eastern Railway, 32 W. R. 885, 27 Ch. D. 122, which might not have been disposed of by the application of one or two sentences taken from it, and that perhaps without any very great loss to the general stock of legal knowledge. The Swindon case presented two aspects. The navigation company sued as canal proprietors with statutory powers. They sued also as riparian owners in respect of a tenement called Wayte's tenement, on which formerly there had been a mill. The waterworks company, who were upper proprietors, had diverted a portion of the stream for the purposes of their business. His lordship pointed out that such an appropriation of the water did not come within the range of those authorities, which deal with cases of extraordinary user permissible under certain conditions. "Those were cases," said his lordship, "where the use made of the stream by the upper owner has been for purposes connected with the tenement of the upper owner. But the use which here has been made by the appellants of the water, and the use which they claim the right to make of it, is not for the purpose of their tenements at all. . . . That is not a user of the stream which could be called a reasonable user by the upper owner; it is a confiscation of the rights of the lower owner; it is an annihilation, so far as he is concerned, of that portion of the stream which is used for those purposes, and that is done, not for the sake of the tenement of the upper owner, but that the upper owner may make gains by alienating the water to other parties who have no connection whatever with any part of the stream." Then his lordship points out that the navigation company as riparian owners had clearly a right to complain of what was done by the waterworks company, if what was so done by them was insisted upon as a thing which they had a right to do. After the claim of right it was impossible, he said, that the court could do otherwise than decide the issue which was thus raised between the parties. "It is a matter," he added, "quite immaterial whether, as riparian owners of Wayte's tenement, any injury has now been sustained or has not been sustained by the respondents. If the appellants are right, they would, at the end of twenty years, by the exercise of this claim of diversion, entirely defeat the incident of the property, the riparian right of Wayte's tenement. That is a consequence which the owner of Wayte's tenement has the right to come into the Court of Chancery to get restrained at once, by injunction, or declaration, as the case may be." The other learned lords—Lord Hatherley and Lord Selborne—entirely agreed. Lord Hatherley observed that enough had been made out to justify the interference of the Court of Equity. "A very slight amount of evidence," he added, "of the actual amount of damage done would be sufficient to justify an injunction; and the declaration of right to be made by the court is absolutely necessary, in consequence of the assertion of right made by the appellants." And so this House altered the order of the Court of Appeal by declaring the rights of the navigation company, as owner of Wayte's mill, to the flow of the stream down to their tenement, "subject to the ordinary and reasonable use of the said stream and waters by the riparian owners higher up upon the said stream"; and then there was added an express declaration, which was not to be found in the order of the Court of Appeal, to the effect that the proposed user by the waterworks company was not within such ordinary or reasonable use. As riparian owners the navigation company were not injured in the very least in present enjoyment, but yet it was as riparian owners that they were held entitled to this declaration in their favour negativing the pretended rights of their opponents.

The question in that case in regard to the rights of the navigation company as owners of Wayte's tenement and the pretended rights of the waterworks company was precisely the same question as that which has arisen in the present case. The railway company claim the right to do that which they propose to do. That was admittedly the question at the trial before Holmes, L.J., and therefore it was not incumbent upon McCartney to do more than to show a very slight case of actual or probable injury. He has shown a certain amount of injury—not very substantial, I admit, but still I think quite sufficient—sufficient to entitle him to damages at law when a claim of right is set up, and sufficient therefore to entitle him to a declaration in equity. It may well be, if I may refer to a suggestion thrown out by Lord Cairns in the Swindon case, that if the railway company had said, "We do not claim a right at all, but what we propose to do is such a trivial matter that it cannot do you any practical injury," the court might have thought fit not to interfere; but that is not the line which the railway company took. They claimed a right; they admitted that if that issue was found against them their whole case must fail. The question of right was not merely the sole question at the trial. It was really the sole question at issue before the Court of King's Bench and the Court of Appeal. And those courts have made a declaration of right, but a declaration I think in favour of the wrong party. They have declared in effect that the railway company are entitled to abstract and consume for purposes unconnected with the tenement which gives access to the stream a portion of the waters of the stream which can by no possibility be restored to it. That declaration seems to me to be contrary to principle and precedent.

I do not think it necessary to say anything more. But I may venture to add that the law laid down in this House in the Swindon case was no new doctrine. It is stated clearly and precisely by Parke, B., in the Court of Exchequer in Embrey v. Owen, 6 Ex. 353, and by Cresswell, J., in delivering the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in Sampson v. Hoddinott, 5 W. R. 230, 1 C. B. N. S. 590.

I have only to add that in my opinion it would be extravagant to suggest that the system of the Londonderry and Lough Swilly Railway Co. and the lines of other companies over which they have running powers form one single riparian tenement, or that the railway company, by virtue of contact with this stream at one point, possess throughout their system, and all through the lines of other companies over which they have running powers, rights analogous to those possessed by persons who dwell on the banks of a river in respect of their riverside property. It may be difficult to say how far the rights of the railway company as riparian owners extend, but they can hardly go to such a length as that.

I am of opinion that the judgments of the Court of Appeal and the Court of King's Bench ought to be reversed, and the judgment of Holmes, L.J., restored, and that the respondents ought to pay the costs both here and below. But, in order to prevent any dispute in future, I think it would be well to preface the order by a declaration of opinion that the railway company are not entitled to use the stream in question for the purpose of supplying their locomotive engines with water.

Lord LINDLEY.—It is not now disputed that the stream from which the railway company desire to take water is, or at all events must be regarded as, a natural and not an artificial stream, nor is it disputed that the railway company are the proprietors of the strip of land on which their line is constructed where it crosses the stream. For a short distance, therefore, the railway company are the proprietors of a few feet of land next the stream. They put down a three-inch pipe by which they intended to draw water from the stream in order to fill a tank some distance off, from which they could supply their locomotive engines with water. This pipe was on their own land, and the defendant had no right to interfere with it unless he was entitled to do so in order to protect his own water rights as a riparian proprietor lower down the stream, where he had a water-mill. In order, however, to protect those rights he took up the pipe, and it was admitted at the trial that he was justified in what he did if the railway company were not entitled to use the water in the manner proposed. Holmes, L.J., who tried the case, held that the defendant was justified in what he did. The Divisional Court took a different view and reversed his decision, and the Court of Appeal affirmed the decision of the Divisional Court, FitzGibbon, L.J., however, dissenting.

It was proved at the trial that the defendant's mill was an old mill and required a flow of 7,000 gallons of water per minute to work it. To work for one hour, therefore, 420,000 gallons would be required. The total quantity of water reaching the mill in dry weather was about 627,000 gallons per day, and of this quantity 500,000 gallons only came down the stream as far as as the mouth of the railway company's pipe. The remaining 127,000 gallons entered the stream lower down. On the other hand, it was proved that the pipe would carry off 15,000 gallons a day if allowed to run unchecked. The railway company gave evidence that they did not want more than 5,000 gallons a day, and that they only had ten locomotives a day to fill. But their witnesses admitted that more would probably be wanted shortly. The practical result of the evidence was that in dry weather the defendant wanted all the water he could get, and that if the railway company drew off only 5,000 gallons a day his mill would be stopped for less than a minute a day; and that if they drew off 15,000 gallons a day it would be stopped for less than three minutes a day. Holmes, L.J. did not apparently decide the case upon the ground that the defendant would sustain serious damage, but on the wider ground that the railway company had no right to take water from the stream for the purpose of supplying their locomotives with water. The Divisional Court and the Court of Appeal were of opinion that the railway company were entitled to take water for their locomotives, provided they did not seriously interfere with the working of the defendant's mill; and they considered that the interference would be too slight to amount to an infringement of his rights.

The water which the railway company contend they are entitled to take is wanted for use over the whole line, including the little strip of land which immediately adjoins the stream and is crossed by it. But the whole line cannot be regarded as riparian property; and the quantity of water required for use on the short strip which immediately adjoins the stream is too small to be of any consequence to either party. The right to take that much is not worth discussing, and may be conceded; but the concession will not decide the important question which this House has to determine. Although the damage suffered, or likely to be suffered, by the millowner is small, yet it is plain that, if the railway company are not entitled to retain and use their pipe as intended, but are nevertheless allowed to do so without interruption for twenty years, they will be infringing the millowner's rights all that time, and will, at the end of the twenty years, gain a prescriptive right to continue such use for ever. Such an invasion of his rights the mill-owner is entitled to prevent. This has been long well settled. In the note to Mellor v. Spateman, 1 Wms. Saund. 346*a*, it is said: "Wherever any act injures another's right, and would be evidence in future in favour of the wrongdoer, an action may be maintained for an invasion of the right without proof of any specific injury." This principle has been repeatedly recognized and acted upon in cases involving water rights—for example, Sampson v. Hoddinott, and Harrop v. Hirst, 17 W. R. 164, L. R. 4 Ex. 43. The principle must be borne in mind when reliance is placed on judicial decisions in cases in which it was unnecessary to allude to it. The principle was conceded and recognized in Kensit v. Great Eastern Railway, which was decided on the ground that what was there complained of was not in excess of the defendants' rights and never could grow into a prescriptive right, inasmuch as all the water taken from the stream was returned to it undiminished in quantity and undeteriorated in quality. This was the ratio decidendi of that case.

The question for decision is therefore reduced to this—namely, will the use of this pipe by the railway company infringe the mill-owner's rights? Or, in other words, are the railway company entitled to use this pipe for the purposes for which they have put it down? Two cases only have arisen in which the right of a railway company to take water from a stream for its locomotive engines has called for judicial decision. One is Attorney-General v. Great Eastern Railway, 18 W. R. 1187, in which Lord Romilly expressed his opinion that a railway company having a line adjoining a stream had no right to take water from it for supplying their locomotives. The other is Sandwich (Earl) v. Great Northern Railway, in which Bacon, V.C., decided that they had. In the first of these cases, which was affirmed by Lord Hatherley, L. R. 6 Ch. 572, the abstraction of the water seriously impeded the navigation of the stream, and Lord Hatherley decided the case on that ground. In Sandwich (Earl) v. Great Northern Railway, no substantial damage was proved, and the Vice-Chancellor considered that the railway company was entitled to take what water they wanted, so long as they did not inflict any substantial damage on other riparian owners. He held, in short, that the railway company were not exceeding their own rights, and were not infringing the rights of the plaintiff. This decision is in favour of the railway company in the present case. I cannot, however, think it right in point of law. It is, in my opinion, impossible to reconcile it with the principles laid down and acted on by this House in Swindon Waterworks Co. v Wilts and Berks Canal Navigation Co. In that case a water company had bought a mill by a stream, and took water from it to supply a neighbouring town. They were held not entitled to do this, although the plaintiffs, who were lower riparian owners, were not in fact damaged by the defendants' operations. Lord Cairns there stated the law as to the water rights of riparian owners, and it is unnecessary to do more than to refer to his judgment.

The railway company in this case became riparian owners simply by buying a small strip of land crossed by the stream. They thereby acquired the water rights, whatever they were, of the owner of the land so bought, but they acquired no greater rights than he could give them in respect of that land. These rights did not include the right to take water from the stream for consumption off the land the possession of which conferred his rights. He could not lawfully take water from the stream in any appreciable quantity and sell it for use miles away, or, indeed, use it himself at a distance from his riparian tenement without returning it to the stream. Such a user can only be justified by a grant from lower riparian owners or by prescription. This I take to be now settled by Stockport Waterworks Co. v. Potter, 3 H. & C. 300, by the decisions of the Court of Appeal and of your lordships' House in the Swindon case and by Ormerod v. Todmorden Mill Co., 31 W. R. 759, 11 Q. B. D. 155. The intended use of the water in this case by the railwaycompany was reasonable enough from their point of view, but such use would have been in excess of their rights and an infringement of the rights of the defendant.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed, and that the judgment of Holmes, L.J., should be restored, and that the railway company should pay the costs here and below.

Appeal allowed; judgment of Holmes, L.J., restored with costs here and below; declaration that the respondents are not entitled to use the water of the stream for the purpose of supplying their locomotive engines with water; cause remitted to the Irish King's Bench Division.

Solicitors, Greene & Underhill, for Hugh C. O'Doherty, Dublin; William Webb & Co., for James E. O'Doherty, Dublin.

Court of Appeal.

Appeal.
(Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) Jan. 24.

In re HULL AND LADY MEUX'S ARBITRATION. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Farming agreement—Crops to be consumed on farm—Destruction by fire—Whether contract broken.

Tenants held a farm under agreement, one of the clauses of which bound them to stack on the premises all the hay and corn arising from the farm, to consume on the farm (inter alia) all the hay, straw, and chaff arising therefrom, and to carry out and spread the resulting manure on the land. An accidental fire having destroyed some of the crops so stacked,

Held, that the clause was only for the regulation of acts of husbandry when such acts were capable of being performed, and that if no such acts could be done it had no application. Therefore there had been no breach of the tenants' agreement to consume crops and spread manure.

Appeal from a decision of the county court judge of Wiltshire, given on a special case stated in an arbitration under the Agricultural Holdings Acts, 1883 to 1900.

By an agreement dated the 25th of February, 1901, and made between Lady Meux, the landlady, of the one part, and Robert Hull and John Newman, the tenants, of the other part, for the letting from year to year of a farm at Christian Malford, near Chippenham, the tenants were bound, inter alia, "to manage and cultivate the whole of the land in a good and husbandlike manner, keeping the same in good heart and condition. Also to stack upon the premises all the crops of hay and corn arising from the farm, and to consume on the farm all the hay, straw, chaff, and turnips, and other green crops arising therefrom, and to carry out and spread upon the farm in regular succession all the dung and manure arising therefrom."

During the tenancy an accidental fire took place, which destroyed a quantity of hay and straw stacked in accordance with the agreement. On the tenancy coming to an end, by notice, on the 25th of March, 1904, the tenants made a claim for compensation in respect of the unexhausted value of feeding stuffs purchased since the fire to the amount of £124 1s. 1d., and the landlady claimed, besides certain arrears of rent, £137 for breaches of contract, which sum included the loss of manurial value of the hay and straw destroyed by the said fire.

These claims were referred to arbitration, and, the arbitrators being unable to agree, an application was made to the county court judge to order a special case to be stated, which was accordingly done, the question for decision being whether under the circumstances there had been a breach of the tenant's contract as above set forth in respect of consuming crops and spreading manure.

The county court judge, in giving judgment, said that on the whole he was of opinion that the law applicable to the facts was that acted on in the cases which had been cited before him on behalf of the tenants, e.g., Taylor v. Caldwell, 11 W. R. 726, 3 B. & S. 826; Howell v. Coupland, 24 W. R. 470, 1 Q. B. D. 258; Krell v. Henry, 52 W. R. 246, [1903] 2 K. B. 740—namely, that where in a contract the continued existence of a thing or a set of circumstances is essential for the performance of the contract, and the thing or set of circumstances accidentally ceases to exist, both parties are discharged from liability. Here the existence of the hay and straw was necessary in order that they might be consumed, and that existence was therefore an implied essential condition of the contract. On the landlady's part cases had been cited where there was a covenant to repair and keep in repair premises, and such a covenant seemed at first sight very similar to the one now in question, but there was this essential difference, that where a tenant entered into a covenant to repair and keep in repair he contemplated the possible occurrence of a fire which would oblige him to repair under his covenant by practically rebuilding the premises unless he had protected himself by putting in the words "with the exception of fire." For the landlady it was said that the present covenant was practically the same thing, and that it would be fulfilled if the tenant bought other foodstuffs and consumed them instead of those grown on the farm. His honour could not adopt that reading. If he did he would not be taking the real meaning of the words, but would be putting in others which did not exist in the covenant. It was argued that performance of the contract was not impossible, because the tenants could have bought hay and straw from somebody else, but that would not be fulfilling the contract. The covenant to repair a house was fulfilled where new materials were bought, but in that case such purchase was necessarily involved in the covenant, for a house could not be repaired without buying materials; but in the present case all the tenants undertook to do was to consume on the farm that which had been grown thereon. For these reasons the landlady's claim was not tenable.

The landlady appealed.

Holman Gregory (W. H. N. Bagot with him), for the appeal.—The possibility of a fire occurring must have been in the contemplation of the parties, just as it was long ago held to be in the case of a covenant to repair, and keep in repair, a house. Indeed, the present is a stronger case, because the risk of fire in a stackyard is much greater. The question must be whether it was not in the contemplation of the parties that the produce of the farm was to be consumed thereon in any case. In In re Arthur, Arthur v. Wynne, 28 W. R. 972, 14 Ch. D. 603, a covenant in absolute terms to insure within two years the life of the covenantor for the benefit of his wife and children was held to have been broken where the insurance was delayed till a few days before the expiration of the period, when the life was found to be uninsurable. The destruction of these particular crops did not put an end to the contract, for it cannot be said they were the foundation of it, like the view of the coronation procession in Krell v. Henry, 52 W. R. 246, [1903] 2 K. B. 740, 751. The case is the same as that of a covenant to keep in repair a house which is accidentally destroyed by fire: Bullock v. Dommitt, 6 T. R. 650.

(a) Reported by R. HILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

He also cited Nickoll v. Ashton (the judgment of Vaughan Williams, L.J.), 49 W. R. 513, [1901] 2 K. B. 126.

F. E. Weatherly, for the tenants, was not called upon.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In my judgment this appeal fails. We need not, I think, have recourse to any implied condition that on the failure of something that was in existence at the time of the contract, as in Taylor v. Caldwell, 11 W. R. 726, 3 B. & S. 826, or of something that was to come into existence, as in Howell v. Coupland, 24 W. R. 470, 1 Q. B. D. 258, the further performance of the contract shall be excused. There is no need to apply the principle stated by Blackburn, J., in the case first named (3 B. & S., at p. 833), although I am very far from saying that if the words of the contract were such as to necessitate the application of that principle, this is not a case in which that principle ought to be applied.

The view I take of the case is this. We have a contract for the letting of a farm, containing conditions intended to ensure the proper cultivation of the land, one great object being that the crops shall be so dealt with that the land shall not be impoverished. It seems to me that this contract provides in a series of respects set forth therein that the tenant should undertake to deal with the farm in accordance with a recognized system, and the particular clause we have to deal with is one imposing on the tenant the obligation to stack on the farm the crops arising therefrom, to consume the same on the farm, and to carry out and spread on the land the manure produced thereby. In my judgment, according to the proper construction of this clause, its words only relate to things which have existence on the farm—to things only which can be dealt with actively or left passively for the benefit of the farm. The covenant to stack, to consume, and so on, relates only to such crops as are capable of being so dealt with. It is, according to my understanding, only a regulation of acts of husbandry when the state of things is such that the acts are capable of being done, and if no such acts can be done the clause has no application. In my opinion the county court judge was right.

ROMER and STIRLING, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Upton & Britton; Collyer-Bristow & Co., for Wood & Awdry, Chippenham.

Appeal.
(Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) Jan. 21.

SIMPSON v. EBBW VALE STEEL, IRON, AND COAL CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Coal mine—Certified manager—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7 (2).

A certified manager of a coal mine was paid a salary of £400 a year, payable monthly, and provided with a house rent free and coals for domestic use. While engaged in his duties in the mine he met with an accident, which proved fatal.

Held, that the widow was not entitled to compensation, because the position held by the deceased man was not that of a "workman" within the meaning of that term, as used in the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. Whether a man was a "workman" or not depended upon the particular facts in each case, and in the present instance there was ample evidence upon which the county court judge could come to the conclusion that the deceased man was not a "workman," and the employers therefore not liable to pay compensation.

Appeal from an award made by the county court judge sitting at Newport (Monmouthshire) in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant for compensation was the widow of the late certified manager of the Prince of Wales Colliery, Monmouthshire, which was one of the collieries owned by the respondents. The evidence given in the county court was to the effect that in the course of his duties as manager he had gone down on the 4th of December, 1903, into the pit and there met with an accident which resulted in his death; that his duties frequently took him underground, but that he did no manual labour in the mine. As certified manager he received £400 a year, paid monthly, which remuneration was to increase year by year, and was not liable to adjustment on the sliding scale, as were the wages of colliers. In addition to the £400 a year he had a house found him rent free and a free supply of house coal.

The county court judge held that the position held by the deceased man was not what could properly be described as that of a "workman" in the sense that the term was used in the Act of 1897, and, therefore, that his widow did not come within the benefit of the Act.

From that decision the present appeal was brought.

S. T. Evans, K.C., and John Sankey.—The benefit of the Act is to apply to all workmen except such as by reason of the nature of the employment or for some other ground stated are expressly excluded. A certified mines manager is not specially excluded, and the deceased man having met with the accident in the course of an employment to which the Act applies, his widow is entitled to compensation. In the present case the wages that the deceased man earned were no doubt above those usually commanded by a workman, but in many mines the certified managers get less than it is possible for a collier to earn. By the definition in the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, a workman within that Act must be employed in manual labour, but the words of the Act of 1897, "whether by way of manual labour or otherwise," show that the Legislature contemplated the inclusion in the word "workman" of persons holding positions in which the services rendered were other than those of manual labour. [MATHEW, L.J.—If the remuneration paid the deceased man was a wage or wages, how would you assess his average weekly earnings?] The amount of compensation that the widow is entitled to is £300, because that is the maximum in case of death. In the case of disablement, if 50 per cent. of the injured man's yearly salary exceeded £1, that would be the maximum which he could claim. [MATHEW, L.J.—Suppose the man's salary here had been £4,000, a sum often drawn by a managing director of a company, does it seem reasonable that his widow, if entitled to compensation at all, should only receive £300, or, in case of the accident not proving fatal, his compensation should not exceed £1 a week? For the first two weeks the workman has no claim.] If it was the intention of the Legislature to limit the benefit of the Act to that class of man who is paid a living wage only each day or each week, words to that effect would have been found in the Act. Here the two conditions imposed by the statute —the employment to be one to which the Act applies and the accident arising out of and in the course of that employment—being fulfilled, the applicant is entitled to an award in her favour. [They cited Vamplew v. Parkgate Iron and Steel Co., 51 W. R. 691, [1903] 1 K. B. 851; Hedley v. Pinkey & Sons Steamship Co., 40 W. R. 113, [1892] 1 Q. B. 58.] The deceased man rose from being a pit-boy, and was still a fellow workman with the other colliers. Wilson v. Merry, L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. 326, decided that a workman did not cease to be a fellow workman merely because they were not all equal in position of station or authority. Here the deceased man's duties took him almost daily into the mine. He ran the same risks as the other colliers, and was therefore entitled to the benefit of the Act giving colliers compensation in case of injury or death by accident.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Ruegg, K.C., and Albert Parsons, for the employers. —The key to the question who is a workman within the meaning of the Act of 1897 is to be found in section 1, sub-section 2 (a), and Schedule I., clause 1 (b). If it be a question of fact in each case, then it is for the county court judge to say whether the injured man was or was not a workman. He has found in this case that the deceased man was not a workman, and his decision, there being ample evidence to support it, cannot be set aside by this court. There must be some limit put upon the word, otherwise a professional man commanding his hundred a year, if injured while in the course of his employment with the railway or mine would be entitled to claim compensation for accident. The class of persons to whom the deceased belonged, like directors, managers, and professional men generally, are not "workmen" because they are not the servants of their employers in the ordinary sense in which the term "master and servant" is used to define the relative position of master and man. The doctrine of common employment has no application to the work done by a manager of a railway or mining company. The word "workman" must be construed in its ordinary and popular sense. While it was no doubt intentionally enlarged by the words "whether by way of manual labour or otherwise," it cannot reasonably include a man holding the position of master of his department, which would be wholly inconsistent with such a person coming within the scope of the Act passed to give the benefit of insurance to that class of workmen who, from want of knowledge or want of means, are unable to make use of the advantages offered by an ordinary insurance office.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal against an award of his Honour Judge Owen, sitting at the Newport (Monmouthshire) County Court, in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The applicant was the widow of a man who held the position of certified manager of one of the mines belonging to the respondents, and the question was whether a person holding such a position came within the definition or description of those persons to whom the Legislature intended that the benefit of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, should apply. The county court judge held that the deceased man did not come within the scheme of the Act; and that being the ground of his decision, we have to consider, in the first place, the terms of the Act itself.

To begin with, the title of the Act is given as "an Act to amend the law with respect to compensation to workmen for accidental injuries suffered in the course of their employment." Now, the law with respect to compensation to workmen which it was proposed by this statute to amend was to be found in certain then existing statutes passed for the benefit of workmen, and although the orbit in which this Act was to apply was enlarged, nevertheless it was in my judgment restricted to workmen as that term is used in the Act itself. Section 1, sub-section 1, throws considerable light on who are workmen. It enacts that "if in any employment to which this Act applies personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman his employer shall, subject as hereinafter mentioned, be liable to pay compensation in accordance with the first schedule of this Act." It is obvious that the standard which the Legislature intended to set up was that the person who was to be entitled to claim compensation must be a workman, for a person might be employed and yet not be a workman within the Act. The definition given of workman in section 7 (2) is this: "Workman" includes every person who is engaged in an employment to which this Act applies, whether by way of manual labour or otherwise, and whether his agreement be one of service or apprenticeship or otherwise and is expressed or implied, is oral or in writing." There again, that which is being defined is "workman." The element "workman" is not eliminated, although the description "workman" is said to be capable of including, and does include, a person engaged in an employment to which the Act applies—that is another cardinal condition—whether by way of manual labour or otherwise. That makes it possible for the person who cannot vouch that the labour he was engaged in was manual nevertheless to be a workman. We have it on the highest authority that in construing this Act we are, so far as possible, to give the ordinary grammatical meaning to the words. It is very easy to give illustrations of people who, in ordinary parlance, might very well be described as workmen, and whose labour is not manual; and I think it very possible that the genesis of the explanation of the definition is that there had been decisions which had put a somewhat narrow construction upon the word "workman" in the earlier Acts, such, for example, as in the case of a conductor of a tramway, who was held not to be a workman because he was not engaged exclusively in manual labour. There would be no difficulty whatever in treating persons who stood in that kind of position, earning weekly, fortnightly, or monthly wages, as being within the term "workman," according to the standard which the man in the street, if I may use the word, would set up, notwithstanding the fact that they were not exclusively or mainly engaged in manual labour. But although the definition is extended by the Act, the person to be benefited is still to be a workman in the ordinary sense of the term, and none the less so because you find words extending the description so as to cover labour other than manual. Are you to call the solicitor to a railway company or the solicitor to an estate a person who might come under the definition in the Act? Unless you limit the word "workman" as I have suggested, there seems to me no logical halting place at which the line can be drawn. The whole scheme of the Act rests upon the fundamental general interpretation that an ordinary uninstructed person would put upon the word workman. Throughout, the Act presupposes a position of dependence. It treats the persons to be benefited, all as in a sense inopes consilii, persons for whom the Legislature must do that which they are not in a position to do effectually for themselves, either for want of general education or the want of means. The Act is dealing with persons who are not supposed to be likely to be well off, or likely to be thoroughly instructed in these matters, or to make careful and prudent provision for themselves. Therefore the Act is really giving a sort of State assurance to people who the Legislature supposed were not in a position to provide against accidents for themselves. There would be no common sense in extending that kind of protection to persons drawing good salaries and in a totally different position of life. It would be difficult to lay down the exact line to divide the two classes as a matter of law, but it would be perfectly easy in a given case for a jury to say on which side of the line a particular person came.

If you look through the Act it seems to me clear that the words used in section 1, sub-section 2 (a) would not be applicable to a person receiving a salary of £400 a year and a house, or, as it may be in other cases, a salary of double or treble that amount. Those words do not seem to me to deal with such a case as that at all. Again, turning to the provisions as to compensation, we find that in the case of temporary injury the man cannot, under any circumstances, have more than £1 a week, and that sum, judging by the scheme which is laid down in the rest of the Act, is taken roughly as representing the maximum of half the man's wages. Can it be supposed that the Legislature in putting down figures of that kind had in its mind to make the scheme of compensation applicable at all to a person whose income might be hundreds a year. Yet that is what we have to suppose if the definition clause should be taken to cover everything that could by any possibility be embraced in its grammatical construction. It is obvious to me that some limit must be placed on it. Then comes the question, where is the limit to be put? The Act speaks of "wages" and "earnings," and these words coupled with the other provisions of the Act show the Legislature was dealing with the class of persons whose remuneration might be adequately described by those words. It seems to me impossible that those words would include the remuneration of a person in a position of this deceased man. I agree with the judgment of the county court judge. There seems to me to be abundant evidence in this case, as he has pointed out, that this man did not come within the particular description which this particular Act, taking it as a whole, must be taken to intend when it attempts to define the word "workman." It is impossible to lay down an absolute line, or to say that a judge must direct a jury if he has a jury, or to direct himself if he has not a jury, as to the line within which a man is a workman. Here so far as it is a question of fact the county court judge has found that the deceased man was not a workman.

In my judgment the decision of the learned county court judge was right and this appeal fails.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Despite the strenuous argument addressed to us on the part of the appellant, I have not been able to entertain any doubt as to what our decision ought to be. I think the county court judge was perfectly right, and I adopt the words of his judgment. It was said that if we introduced any limitation into the description of workman mentioned in the Act we should be legislating, and that we had no right to legislate. That argument might be used in retaliation when we are called upon to legislate by extending this Act of Parliament intended for the protection of workmen to every contract of service. I decline to legislate in that sense. The Act of Parliament has to be construed mainly from the title of the Act. Throughout its provisions there is the same indication and intention that it should be applied to workmen in the ordinary sense of that term—to men who are ordinarily paid by weekly wages.

The provision as to the fortnight during which no compensation may be claimed has been already referred to; but when we examine the provisions of Schedule I., clause 1 (b), we find that the weekly payment during the incapacity after the second week is not to exceed "50 per cent. of his average weekly earnings . . . such weekly payments not to exceed one pound." The next provision, in clause 2, fixing the amount of the weekly payment is most significant. Is it credible that the Legislature meant by the words "or otherwise" inserted in the definition of "workman" to extend the Act to every contract of service. Mr. S. T. Evans had the courage of his argument. He did not hesitate to say it applies to every person who is under a contract of service with his employer. It therefore would apply to a manager of a bank, the engineer in an important undertaking, and to the solicitor who is paid a large salary by his employer—in point of fact to everybody. I confess it seems to me that that construction would lead to manifest absurdity.

Now, what definition ought to be put upon these words, "workman includes every person who is engaged in an employment to which this Act applies, whether by way of manual labour or otherwise"? Surely that means by manual labour or by labour other than manual—physical exertion other than manual. That gives an adequate interpretation to the phrase used, and it brings that phrase and that portion of the Act into entire harmony with the rest. In the particular case we have in the clearest way a description of what the deceased man was doing at the time the accident occurred; he was in control and superintendence of the mine, and that obliged him to descend to the mine, and while there he sustained the injury in question. Does that translate him into a workman? He was not a workman when he went down. Did he become a workman when he was in the mine and exerting himself in the manner he did for the purpose of superintendence and control? I cannot entertain any doubt about the matter, and without further dwelling upon it and referring to the later Act of 1900, which supports the same interpretation, I come to the conclusion that the appeal fails.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and but for the great importance of the case I should be content to say I entirely adopt the judgment of my lord.

I confess that to me the question is one of considerable difficulty—difficulty arising from the very unhappy mode in which that which is called a definition is framed in this Act of Parliament. I doubt whether in an Act of Parliament of this kind this is strictly a definition clause. It is not what "workman" means, but "workman includes" something, and that seems to me to render it more easy for us, more obligatory upon us to consider what is the real governing idea and meaning of the term employed in the Act. You start with this, that there can be no liability unless there is employment. That is the one firm rock we have in construing this Act—that there must be an employment, there must be a contract of service of some kind. But we are dealing with that class of people who ordinarily are called workmen. We know that there are also certain people just on the verge, who may or may not, according to the strict definition, such as has been adopted in former Acts, be held to be properly included in that term. Therefore we should be entitled to say, remembering that the governing idea is that of a workman, the effect of this clause is simply to somewhat enlarge the ambit of the phrase, and not to narrow it by saying a man is not a workman if he is engaged otherwise than in the discharge of duties of manual labour—for instance, it may be by manual labour or otherwise, and whether the agreement is one of service or apprenticeship or otherwise. It is a singularly unhappy piece of legislation, because an apprenticeship is surely a contract of service and I have not heard yet any explanation and I have been able to satisfy myself that there is any reasonable explanation to be given to those words "or otherwise." I regard this as not strictly speaking a definition, but merely as an indication that in dealing with a word of common meaning you are to include in the class of workmen a certain number of people who on a very narrow construction might be excluded from it. Moreover, here we have that which is not properly called "wages" given to the man, but a salary of £400 a year. I do not say that that alone is conclusive; I do not say that there might not be a workman paid by a salary; but I am not prepared to say that we are not at liberty to impose any limitation to the generality of the word "wages" taken by itself in construing the class to which this Act applies. Speaking for myself I think it might be competent for the county court judge to have found as a matter of fact that this manager was a workman. It seems to me to be a case very near the line; but if it be a question of limit, if every person who has an employer is not necessarily included, then it is for the county court judge to find as a matter of fact whether the particular person was or was not included.

In the present case it is impossible, it seems to me, to differ from the county court judge, holding as he did, that the manager of this mine was not a workman within the definition of the Act.

I agree the appeal should be dismissed with costs

Solicitors for the applicant, Metcalfe & Sharpe, for T. S. Edwards, Newport, Mon.

Solicitor for the respondents, H. P. Becher, for Vaxie Simons, Pontypridd.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) And Chan. Div. (Joyce, J.) — March 10; Aug. 1, 1904.

In re LEWIS.

LEWIS v. LEWIS. (a.)

Executor—Legatee—Conditional gift—Beneficial interest of executor on breach of condition—Estoppel—Duty of executor to give notice of legacy.

Where a legacy is given upon a condition, an executor who takes a beneficial interest in the legacy on the breach of the condition owes no duty to the legatee to give notice of the terms of the legacy.

Dictum of Lord Hardwicke in Chauncy v. Graydon, (1743) 2 Atk. 616, 619, discussed.

A testatrix appointed as executor her son A., and bequeathed a leasehold house to her son B., who was then abroad, and directed that if he did not return and claim it it should go to A. Subsequently to the death of the testatrix, A. wrote to B.: "A house has been left you, and according to the will it is to be in my hands until you claim it." But A. did not inform B. of the gift over, and B. died abroad without having claimed the house.

Held (affirming Joyce, J.), that A. was not estopped by the letter from claiming under the gift over, because (1) there was no sufficiently precise representation that B. was absolutely entitled; (2) it was not proved that B.'s non-return was the consequence of the representation.

By her will dated the 17th of February, 1893, Mary Lewis, of 63, Eirw-road, Porth, appointed her son Edward Lewis, the defendant, her executor, and made the following bequest: "I give and bequeath my leasehold house, No. 63, Eirw-road, aforesaid unto my son Evan Lewis, now abroad, and direct that in case he should not return and claim the said house the same shall accrue unto my son Edward Lewis aforesaid."

The testatrix died on the 15th of May, 1897, and her will was proved by the defendant.

At this time her son Evan Lewis was resident at Chubut, in Patagonia, and the following letter, written in Welsh, was sent to him on 16th of August, 1897, by the defendant through his agent: "By now the will has been proved and a house has been left you and £56 13s., which is under my care that is your brother, and according to the will the house and the money are to be in my hands until you claim them."

The defendant, neither in this letter nor at any other time, informed Evan Lewis of the gift over of the house in the event of his not returning to claim it.

On the 5th of April, 1898, defendant by his agent wrote a further letter to Evan Lewis offering £140 for the house.

Evan Lewis died intestate on the 25th of February, 1899, at Chubut, without having become aware of the gift over.

This action was brought by the administrator of Evan Lewis for a declaration that, having regard to the omission by the defendant to disclose the gift over, the plaintiff was absolutely entitled to the house.

A charge of fraud alleged by plaintiff in his statement of claim was abandoned at the trial.

The action was heard before Joyce, J., on the 10th of March, 1904.

R. Rowlands, for the plaintiff.—The letter written by or on behalf of the defendant to Evan Lewis amounted to a representation that the legacy was an absolute gift. The defendant is estopped from denying the truth of that representation: Low v. Bouverie, 40 W. R. 50, [1891] 3 Ch. 82. An omission to state the real truth may amount to a misrepresentation. An executor must give information accurately; he cannot be heard to say that he has made a mistake. Again, by treating with Evan Lewis through his agent, Dunston, the defendant must be taken to have waived the benefit of the gift over. Moreover, the gift over is too indefinite to be enforced. No limit of time is fixed within which Evan Lewis must return to claim the legacy.

Hughes, K.C., and C. L. Coote, for the defendant.—There is no obligation upon an executor to give notice of a legacy to a legatee: In re Hodge's Legacy, 21 W. R. 558, (1873) L. R. 16 Eq. 92; Powell v. Rawle, 22 W. R. 629, (1874) L. R. 18 Eq. 243; Astley v. Earl of Essex, 22 W. R. 620, (1874) L. R. 18 Eq. 290; Lady Fry's case, (1671) 1 Vent. 199; Chauncy v. Graydon, (1743) 2 Atk. 616; Roper on Legacies (4th ed.), p. 839. It was held in Lovett v. Lovett, 46 W. R. 105, [1898] 1 Ch. 82, that an inaccurate recital in a deed did not work an estoppel, the statement being accurate so far as it went; so here the statement is perfectly accurate so far as it goes. The plaintiff must show that the representation was acted on.

(a.) Reported by PERCY H. WINFIELD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

JOYCE, J., after reciting the facts, said: Edward Lewis was in a fiduciary relation to Evan Lewis, and he was, moreover, the person to benefit by the failure of Evan Lewis to fulfil the condition. I do not think, however, that the letters was written with any intention to deceive, though they were certainly very unfortunate. While this correspondence was going on in 1899 Evan Lewis died. Administration to his estate was taken out by his son, the plaintiff, who now claims to be entitled to the house on the ground that Edward Lewis is estopped by his letters from asserting any title to it. I feel a great difficulty in holding that. I do not think the letters contained any such precise representation as would amount to an estoppel, nor is it proved that Evan Lewis would have returned to this country and claimed the house if he had known the truth as to the terms of the gift. Then it was said that Edward Lewis has waived his right to the benefit of the gift over. But in order to establish a waiver it must be shown that the person who waives knew of his rights and deliberately abstained from asserting them.

On the whole, having regard to the terms of the will, and treating it is a gift over, I feel bound to decide against the plaintiff. There will be no costs on either side.

The plaintiff appealed.

The appeal came on for hearing on the 1st of August, 1904.

R. Rowlands, for the plaintiff.

Hughes, K.C., and C. L. Coote, for the defendant.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is a very hard case, but one must not, because it is a hard case, lay down principles which are not in accordance with the law. There was no duty on the executor to disclose the condition; and primâ facie, inasmuch as Evan Lewis never did, and now never can, return from abroad and claim the house, his administrator cannot successfully claim it unless there is something else to assist us. It is said, however, that though generally there is no duty on the executor, yet in this particular case there is a duty, because by reason of the gift over the executor will get an advantage, and for that proposition, reliance is placed upon an observation of Lord Hardwicke in Chauncy v. Graydon, of which the marginal note is this: "Where there is a condition annexed by a will to a devise of real or personal estate, and no notice required to be given, unless the legatees perform the condition, they cannot be entitled, and where there is a devise over a forfeiture incurs." As Mr. Rowlands very properly says, that is against him; but in giving judgment Lord Hardwicke is made to say this: "It is said the executors should have given notice, but the testator has laid no such obligation upon them, neither do the executors take any beneficial interest, whether the condition be performed or broken." It is said of that passage that, although it assumes that generally there is no duty on the executor to give notice, it puts an exception to that rule where a testator has by the terms of his will laid an obligation upon the executor, or where the executor takes some beneficial interest. If one were sure that Lord Hardwicke intended to decide anything of the sort, one would give further consideration to the contention founded on that passage. But the question which we have to decide was not raised in that case, and there was no argument based on the assumption that an executor who took a beneficial interest had a special obligation to give notice. That being so, it seems to me we must start with the assumption that there is no duty to give notice imposed on the executor either by the general law or by the special provisions of the will.

Under these circumstances what is the position of the plaintiff? The plaintiff must either make out misrepresentation amounting to fraud, or a misrepresentation acted upon on which an estoppel can be based. It is admitted that fraud cannot be maintained. This is merely a case of estoppel, and the estoppel is supposed to be based on the assumption that on the correspondence the executor by himself or his agent represented that the bequest of the house was a simple bequest, without any such condition as in fact existed, and that Evan Lewis changed his position in consequence of this representation. It seems to me that he did not change his position in consequence of that representation. I very much doubt whether anyone can find in these letters the statement of fact relied on; but even if one could, it is plain that there is no proof that the non-return of Evan Lewis to claim was the consequence of his acting upon this representation. I think the onus was on the plaintiff to prove that; so that in the result there are two reasons why this alleged estoppel fails. One is because the letters contain no statement sufficiently precise and clear to form the basis of the estoppel; the second is that, even if there was a sufficiently precise and clear statement, there is no proof that it was acted upon. For these reasons I think that the judgment of Joyce, J., was right, and that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. [His lordship then gave his reasons for the view he took of the case.]

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree, and that for the same reasons. It is plain there is no primâ facie duty resting on an executor to give notice. But it is said that although that is so, there is an exception in the case of an executor having himself an interest in the legacy. For that there is no trace of authority in the way of decision, and no trace of an opinion by any text-writer. There is nothing but the passage in Lord Hardwicke's judgment which the industry of counsel has succeeded in unearthing. I do not regard that as anything more than the sort of observation which a judge might make upon a point which was not argued before him and which did not arise in the case.

Solicitors, Wrentmore & Son, for Spickett & Sons, Pontypridd; Helder, Roberts, & Co., for W. R. Davies & Co., Pontypridd.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Farwell, J. } Feb. 28; March 3.

In re MORTIMER (DECEASED).
GRAY v. GRAY. (a.)

Will—Construction—Perpetuity—Cy-près.

A testator devised freeholds to F. G. for life, then to the issue of F. G., upon various limitations which were void for remoteness, and finally to F. G. in fee. F. G. died a bachelor. The limitations to the issue of F. G. left out his sons' sons' daughters.

(a.) Reported by C. H. CARDEN NOAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the doctrine of cy-près does not apply when simple estates tail cannot be framed to exclude and include the classes of persons designated by the testator for exclusion and inclusion. To attain this result contingent limitations are not to be introduced in the course of the estates tail. Dictum, that the doctrine of cy-près may be invoked on behalf of an ultimate remainder.

Doctrine of cy-près discussed.

Monypenny v. Dering, 2 De G. M. & G. 145, approved.

Martelli v. Holloway, 5 H. L. 532, explained.

Summons.

John Mortimer, of Pippingford Park, in the county of Sussex, by his will, dated in 1870, bequeathed the Pippingford Park estate (subject to certain charges) "to the use of Frederick Gray and his assigns during his life without impeachment of waste, and after his decease to the use of the first and every other son of the said Frederick Gray successively according to seniority and as to his respective assigns for his life without impeachment of waste and from and immediately after the decease of each such son respectively to the use of the first and every other son of that son successively according to seniority in tail male so that each elder of the sons of the said Frederick Gray and his first and other sons shall take before each younger of such sons and his first and other sons, and after the determination of all the said uses to the use of all and every the daughters of each of the sons of the said Frederick Gray as tenants in common in tail with cross-remainders in tail between and among such daughters if more than one and if all such daughters but one shall die without issue and if there shall be only one such daughter the whole to be to the use of such one daughter in tail, my meaning being that the daughters of the several sons of the said Frederick Gray shall not take concurrently but that the daughters of each elder of such sons shall be entitled before the daughters of all the younger of the said sons and after the determination of all the aforesaid uses to the use of all and every the daughters of the said Frederick Gray as tenants in common in tail with cross-remainders in tail between or among such daughters if more than one and if all such daughters but one shall die without issue or if there shall be only one such daughter the whole to be to the use of such one daughter in tail, and after the determination of all the aforesaid uses to the use of the said Frederick Gray his heirs and assigns for ever."

The testator also directed certain heirlooms and other personal estate to be settled upon trusts as nearly as possible the same as those above set forth as the rules of law and equity would permit.

The testator died on the 20th of September, 1871, leaving his brother Keith Mortimer his heir-at-law.

Frederick Gray entered into possession of the demised hereditaments, and died in 1903, leaving a will dated the 18th of November, 1901, of which Alexander and H. F. Gray were the executors and trustees. He never had any issue.

The summons sought to have it determined whether upon the death of Frederick Gray the ultimate limitation to him in fee took effect, or whether the Pippingford Park estate or the personalty assigned to attend the inheritance then devolved on the heir-at-law and next-of-kin of the testator.

Haldane, K.C., and R. J. Parker, for the executors of the will of Frederick Gray, argued that the doctrine of cy-près was applicable to the present case, it being admitted that the limitations in the will offended against the rule against perpetuities. The limitations in the will were so framed as to leave out the daughters of sons of sons of Frederick Gray from the succession, and to get over this difficulty and secure the application of the cy-près doctrine two alternative arguments were put forward: (1) If the doctrine of cy-près was held only to admit the replacing of the void limitations by simple estates tail, and it was necessary to admit to the succession persons not admitted by the testator—in this case sons' sons' daughters of Frederick Gray—this was not a fatal objection if it did not admit persons expressly left out by the testator, but simply, as in this case, persons tacitly omitted. Lord St. Leonards, in Monypenny v. Dering, 2 De G. M. & G. 145, approved the cases of Pitt v. Jackson, 2 Bro. C. C. 51, and Vanderplank v. King, 3 Hare 1, where the limitations substituted for those in the will brought in persons not provided for by the testator. Lord St. Leonards says that the general intent is to be preserved, but the particular intent being already void at law, it is no sacrifice of the particular intent to preserve the general intent by departing from the exact lines of the particular intent. The dictum of Swinfen Eady, J., in In re Rising, [1904] 1 Ch. 535, 52 W. R. Dig. 47, that the object of giving effect to the general intent must not be gained at the expense of the particular intent, may be similarly explained. In fact the doctrine of cy-près may be used to put in a new line starting from the first tenant for life (Hampton v. Holman, 25 W. R. 459, 5 Ch. D. 185), the so-called doctrine being merely a rule of construction: Humberston v. Humberston, 1 P. W. 332. [FARWELL, J., held that by the particular intent was meant the quantum of estate given to the various classes of persons.] (2) It is permissible to put in any limitations allowed by law which will carry out the testator's intentions. If by any means you could thus preserve the classes defined for inclusion or exclusion by the testator the doctrine of cy-près would apply. In the present case a contingent remainder was proposed to be introduced so as to leave out the daughters of sons' sons of Frederick Gray: Nicholl v. Nicholl, 2 Wl. Bl. 1159; Parkin v. Cresswell, 24 Ch. D. 102, 32 W. R. Dig. 230.

Butcher, K.C., and A. S. Spencer, for the next-of-kin of the testator, submitted that the doctrine of cy-près did not apply and that there was an intestacy. (1) The doctrine had never been applied to make good an ultimate limitation following other limitations bad for perpetuity, but to make good intermediate limitations in favour of persons who were express objects of the testator's bounty, which the heirs of Frederick Gray were not. (2) The doctrine did not apply unless an estate tail or a series of estates tail could be framed to include all the objects of the testator's bounty and no other classes of persons. To attain this end, contingent limitations and similar devices are inadmissible. Buckley, J., in In re Richardson, 52 W. R. 119, [1904] 1 Ch. 332, has said that where there is a direction hopelessly inconsistent with an estate tail cy-près does not apply. (3) No legal limitations could be framed which would have the desired effect of excluding the class of sons' sons' daughters and no others, even if contingent remainders were allowed to be introduced.

R. J. Parker replied.

Upjohn, K.C., and Wurtzburg appeared for others of the defendants.

Jenkins, K.C., and Errington, for the trustees of the will of John Mortimer.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said: This is a question of an old doctrine of real property law, and Lord Romilly has said that the doctrine of cy-près ought not to be extended. In my judgment this is a case outside the scope of application of the reported decisions, and I do not feel at liberty as a judge of first instance to extend it, though I should be glad if the Court of Appeal or the House of Lords saw their way to doing so. I think I am bound to express my own view, although by agreeing with some I necessarily differ from others of the many varying expressions of opinion read to me from various learned judges. I agree with Sir George Jessel when he says that, in his view, cy-près is an unfortunate phrase, because it is nothing more than a rule of construction. I do not think it an exception to the rule, well established in the House of Lords, that you first construe your will without reference to any question of perpetuities, and then apply the rule. I think that is really what the House of Lords meant in Martelli v. Holloway, 5 H. L. 532, where they say: "There may be a particular clause in a will which on one construction appears to offend against the law relating to perpetuities, but if it is fairly capable of another construction which avoids that objection, the latter construction will be preferred, especially if it is found to be in accordance with the general intention of the will." Now, taking it as a question of construction, I have only to see what is the fair construction of the words of the testator, having regard to the authorities which have gone before. I think they are all summed up in Monypenny v. Dering, 2 De G. M. & G. 145. I agree with Lord St. Leonards about the general and particular intent. There are not two conflicting intents, because you strike out the particular intent if by that you mean an intent which is contrary to the rule against perpetuities. That is what Lord St. Leonards says, and looked at in the way I have suggested, on the true construction of the will there is no such intent; there is only the general intent, which is a perfectly lawful one, and so far as possible the court will give effect to that. Then there are certain limitations laid down by the courts from time to time. I think the rule is accurately stated in Gray on Perpetuities where he says: "When land is devised to an unborn person for life, remainder to his children in tail, either successively or as tenants in common with cross-remainders, the unborn person takes an estate tail; and when land is devised to an unborn person for life, remainder to his sons in tail male, either successively or as tenants in common with cross-remainders, the unborn person takes an estate tail male. This is called the doctrine of cy-près." Lord St. Leonards, in Monypenny v. Dering, at p. 174 of 2 De G. M. & G., says: "I apprehend the rule is this, that neither by implication nor by the doctrine of cy-près can an estate be carried to a class or a portion of a class for whom the testator never intended to provide." That is binding on me and it does not want my approval, but if it did it has it. It may be that Mr. Haldane was right in his comment, that the Lord Chancellor was dealing at pp. 170 and 171 with a case where there was such a clear intention to exclude a class that to give that class any interest under the cy-près doctrine would have conflicted with what may be almost called the express directions of the testator. But whether that is so or not, I think that the same thing may be said here, where a class has been omitted altogether, and I must hold intentionally omitted.

The second branch of the rule, as to excluding someone who is an object of the testator's bounty does not arise in the present case. The difficulty that I should include daughters of the sons of sons if I gave an estate tail is proposed to be got over by a most ingenious contingent limitation suggested by Mr. Parker. The terms of the proposal were only written hastily in court, but even if a limitation could be devised which would hold water—as to which I express my respectful doubt—I do not think the court has ever gone to that length. The court has simply inserted an estate tail. This is not a question of some sort of condition precedent at the commencement of the estate tail, in which case it might be different, but it is inserted in the end of the limitations and it breaks the ordinary peaceful flow of the estates tail. There is no precedent for it, and I am not going, as a judge of first instance, to introduce it now for the first time.

Then if I at once reject that, I can see no ground on which I can seriously distinguish this case from Monypenny v. Dering, or the case before Buckley J., in 1904 (In re Richardson, 52 W. R. 119, [1904] 1 Ch. 332). That being so, it is not necessary to say anything about the other point which Mr. Butcher took (see (1) in Butcher, K.C.'s, argument); I think that Mr. Parker has successfully answered it. If the doctrine of cy-près were applicable it would not be any the less so because all the intermediate limitations had slipped out.

Decided that the real estate and the residuary personal estate settled to attend it devolved upon the heir-at-law and next-of-kin of the testator respectively.

Solicitors for the trustees, A. F. & R. W. Tweedie.

Solicitors for the heirs-at-law, Langham & Swift; Peacock & Goddard.

Solicitors for the executors of Frederick Gray, Wade & Lyell.

Chan. Div. } March 16.
Buckley, J. }

In re GRASSI.
STUBBERFIELD v. GRASSI. (a.)

Will—British subject—Holograph in accordance with law of place where made—Leaseholds in England—Wills (Lord Kingsdown's) Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 114), s. 1.

A will made abroad by a British subject, which is valid according to the law of the place where it is made, is well executed, not only for the purpose of being admitted in England and Ireland to probate, but also for the purpose of disposing of leasehold property in England comprised in it.

Adjourned summons.

G., an Italian by origin, became naturalized in England, and acquired an English domicil, which he retained until the date of his death.

On the 1st of November, 1901, while on a visit to Italy, he made a holograph will, which was unattested but valid by Italian law, and which contained, amongst other things, a bequest of "the usufruct for life of all my property to my wife wherever the said property may be situate."

The testator died in Italy on the 22nd of December, 1901, and his will was subsequently admitted to probate in England.

It was found by the master's certificate that a bequest of the usufruct of any property of any nature, whether real or personal, by Italian law gives to the legatee the right to enjoy such property in specie without liability to account.

The testator at the time of his death was possessed of certain leasehold property in England, and the question raised by the summons was whether any interest in this leasehold property passed by the will, or whether the testator died intestate in respect of that property.

Birrell, K.C., and A. J. Chitty, for the widow.—The will is good under the Wills Act, 1861, commonly called Lord Kingsdown's Act, s. 1, and passes the leasehold property. Personal estate is not restricted to movables, but includes leaseholds: Foote's Private International Jurisprudence (3rd ed.), pp. 268 (b), 340; Dicey's Conflict of Laws, p. 72; Freke v. Lord Carbery, 21 W. R, 835, L. R. 16 Eq. 461, 466. "Personal estate" in Lord Kingsdown's Act means personal estate as defined in section 1 of the Wills Act, 1837, and therefore includes leaseholds. If this will did not pass the leaseholds it did not pass any property at all: Stanley v. Burns, 3 Hagg. Ecc. 373 and 447; Davis v. Gibbs, 3 P. Wms. 26; In re Watson, 35 W. R. 711.

(a.) Reported by H. H. KING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

F. Whinney, for the residuary legatees in remainder, adopted the above arguments, and quoted Butler v. Butler, 33 W. R. 192, 28 Ch. D. 66.

Buckmaster, K.C., and Sheldon, for the next-of-kin. —This will has not been so executed as to pass immovable property in this country. Section 1 of Lord Kingsdown's Act has done nothing with regard to the disposition of personal estate, but only provides for the admission of the will to probate so as to pass the legal title. Even if it has affected the disposition of personal estate, it has not touched the disposition of immovable property: Dicey's Conflict of Laws, 691; Jarman (5th ed.), 9; Pepin v. Bruyère, 50 W. R. 34, [1902] 1 Ch. 24.

BUCKLEY, J.—The question to be decided is whether the words "personal estate" in section 1 of Lord Kingsdown's Act include leaseholds. The divisions of property into real and personal, and into movables and immovables, are divisions which are familiar to most of us, and are not co-terminous. Leaseholds are immovables, but are nevertheless personal estate, although they are said to savour of the realty. A door is thus opened to controversy whether the words "personal estate" in Lord Kingsdown's Act are confined to movables. When the Wills Act was passed in 1837 care was taken to define personal estate, and in section 1 a definition was introduced which defines personal estate in words which extend to leasehold estates and other chattels real. Section 11 of the same Act provides that any soldier being in actual military service or any mariner or seaman being at sea may dispose of his personal estate as he might have done before the passing of this Act. It could not be disputed that the words "personal estate" as there used would include any leasehold property which the soldier or mariner might possess. Section 26 of the Wills Act provides that a general devise of a testator's lands is to include leasehold estates where he has no freehold estate to which the description could apply; but the Act generally proceeds on the footing that leasehold property is not real estate. All the sections indeed tend to show that the Wills Act proceeds, not on the division between mobilia and immobilia, but on that between real and personal estate, and that was the distinction recognized when Lord Kingsdown's Act was passed. Lord Kingsdown's Act was passed in 1861, and is entitled "an Act to amend the law with respect to wills of personal estate made by British subjects." That title does not, it is true, refer in so many words to the Wills Act, 1837, but the law which Lord Kingsdown's Act was going to amend was in fact contained in the Wills Act, 1837. The Wills Act required wills to be executed in a certain manner; Lord Kingsdown's Act was going to affect that law and to say that in certain cases wills should be admitted to probate although that Act had not been complied with.

The first section of Lord Kingsdown's Act relates to wills made out of the United Kingdom by British subjects. The second section relates to wills made in the United Kingdom by British subjects. These two sections are framed alike, but there are certain merely verbal differences between them which may have arisen from a want of sufficiently scanning the language, but cannot have been intended to vary the meaning. For instance, section 1 refers to "a British subject," whereas section 2 speaks of "any British subject." One section refers to "the law of the place" where the same was made; the other refers to "the laws for the time being in force in that part of the United Kingdom where the same is made." Again, in the words with which I have to deal there is a difference of language, inasmuch as section 1 runs, "shall as regards personal estate be held to be well executed for the purpose of being admitted . . . to probate"; whereas section 2 runs, "shall as regards personal estate be held to be well executed, and shall be admitted . . . to probate." I have to look to see whether section 1 means that the will is to be well executed for the purpose of being admitted to probate, but not for some other purpose —for instance, the purpose of passing property. I cannot understand how that can possibly be held to be the meaning. The variance between the two sections is, in my judgment, one of words only, and not of meaning. "Shall as regards personal estate be held to be well executed for the purpose of being admitted to probate." What is the meaning of that? Does it extend to make a gift of leaseholds to a certain person effectual? I see no reason at all why it does not. According to the definition in the Act which this is amending, it does; and section 4 of Lord Kingsdown's Act gives an additional reason; it says that nothing in that Act contained shall invalidate any will "as regards personal estate" which would have been valid if that Act had not been passed, except in so far as such will may be revoked or altered by any subsequent will made valid by that Act. The personal estate there referred to is the same thing as is referred to in section 1, and in section 11 of the Wills Act, so that section 4 must include leaseholds. I see no reason whatever why the expression "personal estate" in Lord Kingsdown's Act should be held not to include leasehold property. There is another reason which appears to me to support the conclusion at which I arrive. Before Lord Kingsdown's Act was passed a British subject domiciled abroad who made a will according to the law of his domicil, made a will which was admitted to probate here, and which would pass the legal title in any leaseholds given by the will, but would not pass the beneficial interest in them. That person is the person dealt with in section 1. Mr. Buckmaster argued that nothing was done by Lord Kingsdown's Act for such a person. But it seems to me that this Act enables him to deal with the beneficial interest in the leaseholds.

I need not refer to the cases cited, they are all authorities for familiar propositions. Of course it is a different thing to say that Lord Kingsdown's Act is to affect the legality of the dispositions of a will and that a will to which Lord Kingsdown's Act applies can be effectual in any way other than that which results from its being admitted to probate; for example, although it might be admitted to probate it is clear on the authority of Freke v. Lord Carbery that provisions in a will infringing Thellusson's Act or the English law against perpetuities would not be validated by Lord Kingsdown's Act. For that reason section 1 does not say that the will shall be held to be well executed for all purposes. The section says in effect that the will shall be valid for the purpose of being admitted to probate, and will then take its place and be effectual for other purposes so far as the law of this country allows. The testator here was an Italian by origin, but at the time of his death he was naturalized and domiciled in this country, and for all purposes material to this case he was an Englishman. He went on a visit to Italy and died there, and his case clearly falls within section 1 of Lord Kingsdown's Act. The will was made out of the United Kingdom by a British subject, and was valid according to the law of the place where it was made, and has been admitted to probate. By his will he left the usufruct of his property to his wife. I hold that the leaseholds were disposed of by the will, and consequently that the widow is entitled to a life interest in his leaseholds, and it is not disputed that she has the right to enjoy them in specie.

Solicitors, H. F. Oddy; T. Richards; Markby, Stewart, & Co.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy and Ridley, JJ.) — Feb. 2.

POPLAR UNION v. MARTIN. (a.)

Poor law—Pauper—Wilful refusal to maintain himself—Refusal of work offered on certain conditions at labour colony—Reasonableness of refusal—Vagrancy Act, 1824 (5 Geo. 4, c. 83), s. 3.

The respondent, who was an able-bodied man aged thirty-nine years, became an inmate of a workhouse. The labour master took him and other paupers to the labour colony at Hadleigh, Essex, which was established with the sanction of the Local Government Board by the Salvation Army for the reception and employment of destitute men. On signing an agreement to be bound by the rules of the colony the respondent could have started work on probation, receiving in return food and free lodging and 6d. a week. If he had remained on he might have been employed at digging clay for bricks, at which employment he might have earned up to 30s. a week. He, however, refused to sign the agreement, and on subsequently again becoming chargeable to the union was charged as an idle and disorderly person under section 3 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, by the guardians. The police magistrate before whom the charge was heard refused to convict, but stated a case for the High Court. At the hearing the court decided to remit the case to consider the conditions upon which work had been offered, and whether the pauper's refusal to accept it was or was not in the circumstances reasonable. The magistrate found that the agreement contained conditions by which the colonist was required to undertake to discourage other colonists from entering premises where intoxicating liquors were sold, and to attend the Saturday night roll-call, and other special meetings, which were explained to be a form of (Salvation Army) church parade, and was to attend some place of service once on Sunday. He was of opinion that these were not reasonable conditions to attach to the employment, and consequently that the respondent was justified in refusing work on those conditions, and he accordingly dismissed the information. The guardians again appealed.

Held, that as the conditions, admirable as they were in themselves, had no relation to the work, the refusal to comply with them did not place the respondent in the position of a person who had wilfully refused to maintain himself by work, and therefore the magistrate's decision must be upheld.

Case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate, who had declined to convict the respondent as an idle and disorderly person under section 3 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824 (5 Geo. 4, c. 83), for that he being a person able wholly or in part to maintain himself by work or other means, did wilfully refuse or neglect so to do, by which refusal or neglect he became chargeable to the common fund of the Poplar Union.

The facts stated in the case were to the effect that the respondent was an able-bodied man, thirty-nine years of age, and on the 23rd of February, 1904, he was admitted to the Poplar Workhouse, and on the 13th of April following he, with ten other pauper inmates, were taken by the labour master to the farm colony established by "General" Booth at Hadleigh, Essex, for the reception and employment of destitute men. Under the terms of an agreement between the appellants and General Booth, the respondent could have started work at the colony on probation, receiving as remuneration his food and lodgings free and 6d. a week in the nature of pocket-money, and if the respondent had after two or three weeks been employed upon brickwork he could have earned 4½d. a yard for digging clay, at which rate of pay it was possible for some men to earn 30s. a week.

He was told to go to work in the brickfield at the colony. It was not possible to do more than guess at the remuneration which he might have earned later on. These terms were explained to the respondent, and he was asked to sign an undertaking to conform to the rules of the colony, but he refused to work upon the said terms or to sign such undertaking, and left the colony. On the 18th of April, 1904, the respondent returned to Poplar Workhouse, and again became chargeable on the rates.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants that the respondent had rendered himself liable to conviction as an idle and disorderly person under section 3 of 5 Geo. 4, c. 83.

The magistrate decided against this contention on the ground that the respondent could not legally be required to work for anyone on the terms offered, which as to the money wages were, for a time, no wages at all, and as to food, &c., a violation of the Truck Acts. He was also of opinion that the words of the section above referred to ought to be construed with reasonable limitations and reasonable regard to the class of work to which the person charged had been accustomed, and also the rate of wages ordinarily to be earned by persons engaged in similar employment, and therefore held that the respondent had not been proved to be a person able wholly or in part to maintain himself. The facts proved did indeed bring the pauper within the literal meaning of the statute, but the consequences of construing the statute literally seemed to him to be such that a limited interpretation must be placed on the statute. The magistrate appended some of the possible consequences which influenced his decision, because the respondents would not be represented at the hearing of the case by the Divisional Court:

(a) Any employer of labour outside the workhouse could, under threat of proceedings under this statute, compel persons who had entered the workhouse to work for him at merely nominal wages, or even for half their food, inasmuch as the remuneration offered, however small, must be sufficient to maintain a person "in part."

(b) If men were sent outside the workhouse to work for any employer on any work, no matter how unsuitable to them, they would be liable to conviction under this statute for refusing or neglecting to do such work, whereas in the workhouse they could only be convicted if the work was suited to their age, strength, and capacity. They had also in the workhouse the benefit of the regulations made by the

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Local Government Board, whereas outside the workhouse those regulations did not apply.

(c) A man to whom employment might be offered abroad or in a colony might similarly be liable on refusal to conviction under this statute.

The question was whether the magistrate ought to have convicted the respondent, and dealt with him as an idle and disorderly person under section 3 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824.

The following were the material clauses in the agreement which the respondent refused to sign: "I promise to abstain from all intoxicating drink whilst resident on the colony; and I pledge myself not to enter any premises where intoxicating drink is sold, and to discourage others from doing so. I also promise to abstain from the use of all profane or obscene language whilst on the colony. I promise to attend the Saturday night roll-call meetings in the citadel, and any special meetings which may from time to time be arranged by the governor of the colony. I also promise to attend some place of worship once on a Sunday."

Section 3 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, provides that "Every person being able wholly or in part to maintain himself or herself or his or her family, by work or by other means, and wilfully refusing or neglecting so to do, by which refusal or neglect he or she or any member of his or her family whom he or she may be legally bound to maintain shall have become chargeable to any parish, township, or place . . . shall be deemed an idle and disorderly person within the true intent and meaning of this Act; and it shall be lawful for any justice of the peace to commit such offender (being thereof convicted . . .) to the house of correction, there to be kept to hard labour for any time not exceeding one calendar month."

On the 9th of July, 1904, the appeal was heard before Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy and Phillimore, JJ., when the court held that there was not sufficient evidence on which they could hold that the magistrate was wrong in deciding that the respondent was justified in refusing the work offered on the ground that the offer was unreasonable as to the conditions imposed. The case was accordingly remitted for further evidence on this point.

At the further hearing the magistrate found that on the 13th of April, 1904, the respondent went to the colony, and that on the 14th one Durman handed to him a form of agreement to sign, and that the respondent refused to sign it and to work on its terms. The respondent would not have been allowed to work at the colony except upon his agreeing to all the terms of this agreement. The respondent assigned no reason for refusal except that the remuneration was insufficient. The respondent stated that he was a member of the Church of England, and it was proved that there was a church of that denomination that he could have attended.

The magistrate was of opinion that the conditions contained in the agreement, by which the colonist was required to undertake to discourage other colonists from entering premises where intoxicating liquors were sold and was to attend the Saturday night roll-call and other special meetings, which were explained to be a form of (Salvation Army) church parade, were not reasonable conditions to be attached to his employment, and the respondent was justified in refusing work on those conditions, and was therefore not guilty of the offence. He accordingly dismissed the summons.

The Union appealed.

Colam, for the Union.—The Local Government Board have sanctioned the work offered on these terms by the Salvation Army to the unemployed. The respondent would work for nothing in the union, whereas he gets something from the first at the colony with a prospect of earning anything up to 30s. a week. In Attorney-General v. Merthyr Tydfil Union, 48 W. R. 403, [1900] 1 Ch. 516, Lord Lindley, when Master of the Rolls, points out in his judgment that the poor law imposes on the comparatively well off the obligation of supporting those who by reason of their poverty cannot maintain themselves, and that a pauper would not be justified in refusing work simply on the ground that the terms offered were in his opinion not good enough. The employment at the labour colony does not come within the purview of the Truck Acts. To prove that the respondent was idle, it is not necessary that he is able and refuses to work: Carpenter v. Stanley, (1868) 33 J. P. 37. It is sufficient to show that a person claiming support from the ratepayers has had work offered him and has refused it, to make him liable to conviction under the Act of 1824. The magistrate's grounds for refusing to convict the respondent in this case are wholly insufficient, and therefore the appeal should be allowed.

No one appeared for the respondent.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I admit that the point raised is one of very considerable importance, and it may well be that it will have to be considered again in reference to other circumstances. What we have to decide here is whether, the respondent, being able wholly or in part to maintain himself, he has wilfully refused to do so, and thereby rendered himself liable to be convicted as an idle and disorderly person within the true intent and meaning of section 3 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824. It is found by the case that the respondent had been offered work on certain conditions, some of which were undoubtedly useful. He was to be employed at work on which we are told after two or three weeks he might possibly have earned as much as 30s. a week. The respondent objected to the rate of pay, and based his refusal solely on the ground that the remuneration was insufficient. That might be a reasonable ground for refusal. But the magistrate has considered that the conditions were either not reasonable or not such that a refusal to comply with them put the respondent in the position of wilfully refusing to do work so as to maintain himself in the sense that such refusal rendered him legally liable to conviction. I wish to express no opinion whatever as to whether the conditions on which work at this labour colony is offered the unemployed are reasonable. I do not, however, think that if a man is sent to a colony of this kind he should be forced to attend the meetings or to put himself under certain restrictions as to intoxicating liquor. But that is not the test that we ought to apply. The conditions must be conditions that affect the work, and if the terms upon which a man is offered work are reasonable with reference to the work he is called upon to do, the court should certainly hesitate before holding that he would be justified in refusing to accept the work offered. I doubt, however, very much if there is any right to impose conditions upon the respondent to which he was not willing to agree to, which in fact have no relation to the work at all. It is very proper that some stipulation should be made for attendance at a place of worship, and anything that would induce people so to attend ought to be encouraged. But on the other hand, of course, there are religious bodies and creeds in England which are perfectly lawful, but which persons might very reasonably take objections to. In the same way anything that promotes temperance, no judge who knows the connection between drink and crime would say was unreasonable. I have great doubt, however, whether such considerations arise at all when the question is whether a man has wilfully refused or neglected to maintain himself by refusing work that is offered him with any such conditions attached to the offer. These conditions have, in my opinion, nothing to do with the work or with the question whether the person refusing such work renders himself liable to conviction. Some of them certainly in the present case are such that the court ought not to take them into consideration when deciding whether the respondent has wilfully refused within section 3 of the Act.

I come to the conclusion, therefore, that the conditions upon which work was offered this man were not reasonable, and that he was justified, therefore, in refusing to sign the agreement.

KENNEDY and RIDLEY, JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed

Solicitors for the union, C. V. Young & Son.

C. C. R.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Lawrance, Kennedy, Ridley, and Channell, JJ.) Nov. 18

REX v. HALE. (a.)

Criminal law — Prevention of cruelty to children — Necessity of attendance of child—Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 41), s. 16—Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1904 (4 Ed. 7, c. 15), s. 16.

By section 16 of the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1894, which was repealed and in part re-enacted by section 16 of the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1904, the attendance of the child at the trial is held not to be essential in certain cases.

Held, that it was not an essential condition to the proper hearing of the cause that in all other cases, except those mentioned in the section, the child in respect of whom the offence is alleged to have been committed should be present at the trial.

Case stated by Kennedy, J., at the summer assizes for the county of Glamorgan.

The special case was as follows: "At the above-mentioned assizes Ellen Hale was tried before me on an indictment which, in the first eight counts, charged her with offences under the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1894, s. 1, in regard to four children of the ages respectively of twelve, seven, five, and three years. The indictment comprised in these counts charges against the prisoner, in regard to each child, of wilfully neglecting the child in a manner likely to cause such child unnecessary suffering and injury to its health. In regard to the second count, which was the count charging the prisoner with wilfully neglecting the eldest child in a manner likely to cause injury to his health, I held that there was no evidence that could justify a conviction, and a ninth count against the prisoner under the Habitual Drunkards Act, 1879, and the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1894, s. 11, was not proceeded with. The jury found the prisoner guilty, in respect of all the four children, of the offences charged against her in the first, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh counts. None of the children were produced as witnesses for the prosecution and none of them were present in court, and in the course of the trial I drew the attention of the counsel for the prosecution to the provisions of section 16 of the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1894, and there was some discussion as to whether the effect of that section was or was not, by necessary implication, that a case under the first section of the Act cannot be be 'proceeded with and determined' in the absence of the child in respect of whom the offence is alleged to have been committed, except under two conditions, specified in section 18—namely, (1) that the court is satisfied by the evidence of a registered medical practitioner that the attendance of the child before the court would involve serious danger to its life or health, and (2) the court is further satisfied that the evidence of the child is not essential to the just hearing of the case. There was in the present case no such evidence of a registered medical practitioner as is mentioned in this section. The 16th section has never received judicial interpretation, and the meaning and application appeared to me to be so far open to argument that I thought it right, according to the request of counsel for the prisoner, to state a case for the opinion of this court upon the question, and I postponed judgment and released the prisoner on bail pending the decision of the court. The question for the consideration of the court was whether or not under the said section 16 at the trial of an indictment under the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1894, s. 1, the attendance at the court of the child in respect of whom the offence is alleged to have been committed is, except under the circumstances of exception therein specified, requisite and necessary in order that the case may be proceeded with and determined. If in the opinion of this court the case was one in which I ought to have held that in the absence of the children and of any evidence of a registered medical practitioner to justify their absence, no case had been presented by the prosecution upon which the accused could properly be convicted, the conviction was to be quashed, otherwise it was to stand."

By section 16 of the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1894, it is provided: "Where in any proceedings with relation to an offence of cruelty within the meaning of this Act, or of any of the offences mentioned in the schedule to this Act, the court is satisfied by the evidence of a medical practitioner that the attendance before the court of any child in respect of whom the offence is alleged to have been committed would involve serious danger to its life and health, and is further satisfied that the evidence of the child is not essential to the just hearing of the cause, the case may be proceeded with and determined in the absence of the child"; and by the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1904, which came into operation on the 1st of November, 1904, the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1894, is repealed, and by section 16, "Where in any proceedings with relation to an offence of cruelty within the meaning of this Act, or of any of the offences mentioned in the first schedule to this Act, the court is satisfied that the attendance before the court of any child in respect of whom the offence is alleged to have been committed is not essential to the just hearing of the cause, the case may be proceeded with and determined in the absence of the child.

Clarke Hall, for the Crown.—This section does not mean that in all other cases than those mentioned in the section the child must be present. That would introduce a condition which does not exist in any other class of case. Attendance must be read as "attendance to give evidence."

He referred to R. v. Cox, [1898] 1 Q. B. 179, 46 W. R. Dig. 41.

No counsel appeared for the prisoner.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I can well understand the motives that have induced my brother Kennedy to state this case in order that there may be an exposition by this court of the meaning of this section. Speaking for myself, I have no doubt at all upon this point. It cannot, as it seems to me, be suggested that the section means that in every case the child in respect of whom the charge is alleged should be present in court. That would be a new and extraordinary enactment, and would have the effect of creating in respect of this class of enactment a condition that does not exist in regard to any other criminal case. There is some difficulty in seeing why such a section was enacted at all, but in my opinion the difficulty is removed if we read the expression "attendance" in section 16 as being equivalent to "attendance for the purpose of giving evidence." Anyone who is acquainted with the theory and practice of criminal law knows that the power and authority of a judge when trying such a case to require that a person should or should not be called, is a quite sufficient power, and exists quite apart from the legislative enactments of this Act. But it is not infrequent that the framers of this Act, not remembering, and perhaps not even being acquainted with all the rules of criminal jurisdiction, have inadvertently inserted clauses which are not necessary. That may be the explanation of this section, which provides that where in any proceedings the court is satisfied that the attendance of the child would involve danger to its life or health, and further, that the child's evidence is not essential to the just hearing of the charge, it need not be called.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

No doubt the court has always possessed this power. The section, however, may have been enacted in the interests of the prisoner, to point out that when the child's evidence was really essential to the just hearing of the case the court should not dispense with its presence. Probably the provision as to the evidence of a registered medical practitioner is also unnecessary, but the framers of the Act may have thought that at any rate before the magistrates this condition should also be fulfilled in order that the evidence of the child should not be dispensed with too easily. That is, as it seems to me, the true explanation of the section, and certainly to hold otherwise would be to read into the section "and in every other case the child must be present," which would carry the section much further than the words warrant or can have been the intention of the Legislature.

I come, therefore, to the conclusion that the proceedings were in order, and that the conviction must stand.

LAWRANCE, KENNEDY, RIDLEY, and CHANNELL, JJ., agreed.

Solicitors for the prosecution, Moreton, Phillips, & Son.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). Feb. 16.

ELDERSLIE STEAMSHIP CO. v. BORTHWICK. (a.)

Ship—Bill of lading—Exception—Shipowner's negligence—Warranty of seaworthiness of ship—Fitness of ship to carry goods.

Meat was shipped at Melbourne for carriage to London under a bill of lading which contained the following clause in large print exempting the shipowner from liability "for any loss or damage (to the goods) whether arising from failure or breakdown of machinery, insulation or other appliances, refrigerating or otherwise, or from any other cause whatsoever, whether arising from a defect existing at the commencement of the voyage or at the time of shipment of the goods or not," and "for the consequences of any act, neglect, default, or error of judgment of the master, officers, engineers, crew, or other persons in the service of the owners or charterers," or "from any cause whatsoever." There was also a small print clause exempting the shipowners from liability for loss or damage resulting from (inter alia) "defects, latent or otherwise, in hull, tackle, boilers or machinery, refrigerating or otherwise, or their appurtenances (whether arising or not existing at the time of the goods being loaded or at the commencement or any stage of the voyage), if reasonable means have been taken to provide against such defects or unseaworthiness." The meat was damaged in consequence of the tainted condition of the ship at the commencement of the voyage, arising from the use of carbolic acid for disinfecting and cleansing the ship at Melbourne, which damage would not have occurred if proper skill and care had been used by the shipowners before the ship started on her voyage.

Held, that the shipowners were liable.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (52 W. R. 439, [1904] 1 K. B. 319) affirmed.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., Collins, M.R., and Romer, L.J.), reversing a judgment of Walton, J.

The action was brought by the indorsee of bills of lading (the present respondent) to recover damages for breach of contract in the carriage of meat by sea on board the appellants' steamship Nairnshire from Melbourne to London.

The bills of lading contained two clauses enumerating exceptions, of which the former was in large type. The first clause provided as follows:

"Neither the steamer nor her owners nor her charterers shall be accountable for the condition of goods shipped under this bill of lading, nor for any loss or damage thereto, whether arising from failure or breakdown of machinery, insulation or other appliances, refrigerating or otherwise, or from any other cause whatsoever whether arising from a defect existing at the commencement of the voyage or at the time of shipment of the goods or not, nor for detention, nor for the consequences of any act, neglect, default, or error of judgment of the master, officers, engineers, refrigerating engineers, crew or other persons in the service of the owners or charterers, nor from any other cause whatsoever . . ."

The second clause, which was printed in small type, was, as far as material, as follows:

"Perils of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatsoever nature or kind and howsoever caused; whether or not any of the perils, causes, or things above mentioned, or the loss or injury arising therefrom, be occasioned by or arise from any act or omission, negligence, default, or error in judgment of the master, pilot, officers, mariners, engineers, crew, stevedores, ship's husband or managers, or other persons whomsoever in the service of the owners or charterers; whether on board the said ship, or on shore, or on board any other ship belonging to or chartered by them, or for whose acts they would otherwise be liable whether such act, omission, negligence, default, or error in judgment shall have occurred before or after the commencement of or during the voyage, or any other causes beyond the control of the owners or charterers, or by or from any accidents to or defects latent or otherwise in hull, tackle, boilers, or machinery, refrigeration, or otherwise, or their appurtenances (whether or not existing at the time of the goods being loaded, or the commencement of the voyage) or insufficiency of coals at the commencement or any stage of the voyage, if reasonable means have been taken to provide against such defects and unseaworthiness."

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Walton, J., found as follows: (1) That the meat on arrival was found to be tainted with the smell of carbolic acid and was damaged; (2) that the meat was damaged by having become tainted during the voyage with the smell of carbolic acid; (3) that such taint and damage arose from the condition of the ship at the commencement of the voyage; (4) that if proper care, skill, and attention had been paid to the cleaning and preparation of the ship the damage would not have occurred; and held that the damage was within the terms of the first exception clause, which was not cut down by the second. He therefore gave judgment for the appellants with costs.

This was reversed by the Court of Appeal.

Carver, K.C., and Leck, for the appellants.—The large type clause is wider in its exceptions than was the case in Maori King v. Hughes, 44 W. R. 2, [1895] 2 Q. B. 550.

Rathbone Bros. & Co. v. McIver, Sons, & Co., 52 W. R. 68, [1903] 2 K. B. 378, was referred to.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and Maurice Hill, for the respondent.—The shipowner must exempt himself in plain and unambiguous language. The general words used here left him liable. The words used are only applicable to a ship which has been made seaworthy.

Rathbone v. M'Iver; Price v. Union Lighterage Co., 52 W. R. 325, [1904] 1 K. B. 412; Steinman v. Angier Line, 39 W. R. 392, [1891] 1 Q. B. 619, were cited or referred to.

Carver, K.C., replied.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—I do not think it necessary to quote any authority in this case. Construing this instrument, and applying to it the ordinary canons of construction, I must move your lordships that this appeal be dismissed.

It seems to me that if what has been called the large print had stood alone I should not have had the smallest doubt that it would have carried the shipowner the whole way. I can give no other construction to it than that which the words express, but the difficulty in his way is that he has thought proper to execute an instrument which has two different sets of phrases in it; and one rule of construction which must prevail is that you must give effect to every part of a document if you can—you must read it as a whole. Counsel for the appellants has ingeniously spoken of independent contracts and independent paragraphs and so on; but we must remember that this is one contract, and each of the parts of this contract must be read so as to give effect to the whole if it can.

The only mode of reading it is to read the first part of it thus: "I am not to be liable for this"; and then what comes after it by way of exception—"I shall not be liable unless I have failed to take all reasonable means against the injury that has happened." In that way you can read the two together, and this seems to me to be the only way in which you can make a reasonable and intelligible contract and give effect to the words which the parties have agreed to.

Under these circumstances it seems to me that the appeal ought to be dismissed, and I move your lordships accordingly.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The clause which has been called the large-print clause seems to me to be perfectly clear, and the small-print clause equally clear. For my part I am unable to reconcile the two; and I do think it is a very wholesome rule that a shipowner who wishes to escape from the liability which would attach to him for sending an unseaworthy vessel to sea must say so in very plain words. The only way to reconcile the two clauses is to apply the qualification in the small-print to the large-print clause.

Lord LINDLEY.—I am of the same opinion. This is a contract between two persons, one of whom, the shipowner, prepared it. I have not the slightest doubt the shipowner understood it as counsel for the appellants contend he did. But when I look at it from the other side, and consider whether the shipper would so understand it, I say, if it were myself, certainly I should not. I should find that the defects which were to render the ship unseaworthy were only to be excepted in certain conditions—that is, if reasonable means had been taken to provide against them. That is how I should read it as a shipper, although the shipowner would not. It appears to me that the vice of Walton, J's, admirable judgment is that he has rather lost sight of what would be reasonably plain to the shipper. I quite agree with the principle on which the Lord Chancellor and my noble and learned friend have proceeded in deciding this case. I agree that this bill of lading did not employ plain terms and relieve the shipowner from liability in the case of unseaworthiness. I mean by "plain terms" terms sufficiently plain to the shipper for him to understand; it he would not understand it in the sense contended by counsel for the appellants.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for appellants, Lowless & Co.

Solicitors for respondent, Walton, Johnson, Bubb, & Whatton.

From C. A. (England). Feb. 7.

COMISKEY AND OTHERS v. BOWRING-HANBURY AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Will—Construction—Precatory trust—"In full confidence"—Gift over in default of disposition.

A testator gave, bequeathed, and devised to his wife the whole of his real and personal estate absolutely "in full confidence that she will make such use of it as I should have made myself, and that at her death she will devise it to such one or more of my nieces as she may think fit, and in default of any disposition by her thereof by her will or testament, I hereby direct that all my estate and property acquired by her under this my will shall at her death be equally divided among the surviving said nieces." The testator died childless, leaving a widow and seven nieces surviving him.

Held (Lord Lindley dissenting), that the widow took an absolute estate, subject to a conditional executory limitation to the testator's nieces living at her death, in case she should not have made a will devising the estate to one or more of such nieces.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (52 W. R. 662 [1904] 1 Ch. 415) reversed.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal made on the 10th of July, 1903 (Vaughan Williams and Stirling, L.JJ., Cozens-Hardy, L.J., dissenting).

The will of the Right Hon. Robert William Hanbury, late Minister of Agriculture, who died on the 28th of April, 1903, and which was dated the 31st of October, 1893, contained the following clause: "I give, bequeath, and devise to my very dear wife Ellen Hanbury the whole of my real and personal estate and property absolutely, in full confidence that she will make such use of it as I should have made myself, and that at her death she will devise it to such one or more of my nieces as she may think fit, and in default of any disposition by her thereof by her will or testament I hereby direct that all my estate and property acquired by her under this my will shall at her death be equally divided among the surviving said nieces. I make this will in full confidence that my dear wife will show the affection of a daughter to my dear mother and stepfather. I appoint my said wife Ellen Hanbury and Charles Fisher, of Brownhills, colliery manager, executrix and executor of this my will, and I give the said Charles Fisher such sum not exceeding £150 as my dear wife may decide upon."

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The testator never had a child, and he was at the time of his death entitled to real and personal property of large value.

The testator left seven nieces surviving him.

An originating summons was taken out by the widow, before Kekewich, J., and it was declared that the respondent Ellen Bowring-Hanbury was absolutely entitled to the whole estate for her own use and benefit.

The Court of Appeal affirmed this, and the nieces appealed.

Warmington, K.C., and Christopher James, for the appellants.—The cases are collected in In re Williams, Williams v. Williams, 45 W. R. 519, [1897] 2 Ch. 12, 29.

Haldane, K.C., and Jenkins, K.C. (Austen-Cartmell with them), for the respondent Mrs. Bowring-Hanbury.—The absolute gift to the widow cannot be cut down by the subsequent words: Holmes v. Godson, 8 W. R, 415, 8 D. M. & G. 152.

L. W. Bryne, for the respondent Fisher, the executor.

Warmington, K.C., replied.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case the discussion appears to me to be in a very narrow compass. The question which this House has to decide turns upon a very few words. For my own part I am not able to entertain the doubt which appears to have prevailed with the learned judge in the court from which the case originally came, and the majority of the Court of Appeal. The situation of the parties, of course, is to be considered, and the situation of the property in this sense, that whether or not it was property which the testator contemplated remaining intact and not subject to any diminution until the time of his wife's death, is an important factor in the construction of the words that he had actually used. I confess that to my mind it appears manifest that he did contemplate whatever was the position in which he meant his wife to be, that the property which he himself left to her, to use a simple word, was to remain so that she would have power of making some disposition of it at the period of her death, whatever that disposition might be, which is the question which the House has in fact to determine.

Now, I cannot help thinking that enough has not been made of the mode in which the estate is given to her; it is all in one sentence: "I give, bequeath, and devise to my very dear wife Ellen Hanbury the whole of my real and personal estate and property absolutely, in full confidence that she will make such use of it as I should have made myself, and that at her death she will devise it." I pause there for a moment before reading what follows. Reading that, I come firmly to the conclusion that he did contemplate that the property which he left was to remain; and the first inference I draw is that he did not contemplate that during her lifetime she would have made away with it, and disposed of it in any way, or placed upon it such an irrevocable character, either by way of settlement or anything else, that at the time when she died herself it would have passed away from her power of disposition.

The next thing that occurs to me as to the nature of it is, that he does contemplate that she might make a will herself, and that those words "in default of any disposition" ought not to be read by themselves, but with the other words, "any disposition by her thereof"; so that what he is contemplating is, first of all, that the property is to remain capable of being left by her; and what he is contemplating is not a general failure of any will made by her which did not dispose of this particular property. Of course the case of no will being made by her would come within the same proposition; but what is in his mind is that she may have made a will, but have made no disposition of that particular property which she has come into possession of by reason of his death and his will.

Then what strikes one about it is this (and it is an observation which I think was made by counsel for the appellant)—that he contemplates that, in the state of facts which is before his mind, he is giving directions. I cannot think that if it was in his mind that she was to be absolute owner, and to do what she pleased with it, he would, after he had given her a complete power of disposition, use such a phrase as "I hereby direct." If he contemplates that she is an absolute owner, and that his property may be given away by her, and may be used for the purpose of settlement on a second marriage or what not, the only thing that keeps his property to him and to his nieces is the possibility of her not making a disposition such as he contemplates she might make. To my mind, therefore, it is as clear as any such thing can be, that he is contemplating that she shall have the full use of it during her lifetime, and that when she has not, as by the hypothesis I have been arguing upon she has not, made any disposition of it inconsistent with its complete disposition to the nieces—what he contemplates is that one or more of his nieces is to be the object of his bounty, and if his widow does not select one or more, then they are all to share alike. That, to my mind, is the meaning of the language. I do not stop to bring in any rules of law or any canons of construction. I look at the words merely as they stand in the will, and I think the natural and ordinary meaning of those words is what I have suggested.

The language which is relied upon of the gift to Charles Fisher is, I think, not absolutely immaterial. It is, in one sense, a small point, but I think, on the other hand, it does look as if the testator had in his mind that when she was in possession of whatever it was she was to be in possession of, she was not to be able to do what she would with it; but her power even to give such a sum as £150 is limited, and that in language which I think is not subject to any ambiguity at all: "I give the said Charles Fisher such sum not exceeding £150 as my dear wife may decide upon." It seems to me that that would be an extraordinary thing for him to do if he supposed that she was to be an absolute owner with power to determine in what way every part of the capital of the estate should go.

For these reasons I confess I am unable to entertain any doubt that what the testator did mean was that his wife should have the full use and enjoyment of the property during her life, and at her death she should either select among the nieces such as she pleased, or, if she did not make any selection, that they should take share and share alike.

Under those circumstances I am unable to agree with the judgment of the Court of Appeal, and I move your lordships that that judgment be reversed.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion, and I accept and adopt the judgment of Cozens-Hardy, L.J.

Lord DAVEY.—I agree, and I will only, out of respect to Vaughan Williams and Stirling, L.JJ., add a very few words to what has been said.

The words which have been so much commented upon, "in full confidence," are, in my opinion, neutral. I think it would be impossible to regard them, and I do not for the purpose of my judgment regard them, as technical words in any sense. They are words which may create a trust or may not create a trust, and whether they do so or not must be determined by the context of the particular will in which you find them.

Now, we have been enjoined a great many times by the learned counsel on both sides of the bar that we must read the whole will in the first instance. I have obeyed that direction, and in fact I have read it more than once, and what strikes me upon reading it is this—first, I observe that the testator did obviously intend—whether his intention can be carried into effect or not is a different question—but he did obviously intend that his nieces should have an interest in and should be entitled to this estate in some event; and secondly, that, although he directed it in the last resort to go to his nieces, he hoped or believed—or, to use his own words, "had confidence"—that they would take the estate through the testamentary bounty of the widow.

I make this further observation—that if I read the will through without paying attention to legal rules, and for the purpose only of seeking the testator's intention—what he meant, and what the meaning of the words is that he used—without for the moment regarding the question whether his intention could legally be carried into effect or not—it is, to my mind, obvious that he did not intend that his wife should have an absolute power of disposition. And for this reason, because, construing the words in the way in which the respondent would wish them to be construed—construing the words "In default of any disposition by her thereof by her will or testament" as meaning any testamentary disposition in favour either of the nieces or of anybody else, he intended in that event that it should go to the nieces. It is quite true that in that event the law would not give effect to the testator's intention; but if you are to seek what the testator's intention was, I think that was the purport of what he intended. That seems to me to throw considerable light upon the meaning we must attach to the word "absolutely." I do not myself attach any great importance to the use of the word "absolutely." Reading it as qualifying or expressing the estate which the wife had to take, it does not seem to me to do more than to give her a fee simple. It is now admitted that she has a fee simple, and the question is whether there is a good executory limitation, capable of taking effect upon her death. The use of the word "absolutely" as defining the amount of the estate which is given to the wife must, of course, be subject to any executory limitation, or any other valid limitation or exception which you find engrafted on that estate in fee simple; therefore I attach no importance, or very little importance, to the use of the word "absolutely." In my opinion, the question really is this: Do those words "in default of any disposition by her" mean any disposition in favour either of the nieces or anybody else; or are they, as counsel for the appellant contended, to receive a referential construction, and to be construed as relating to such a disposition as that which he has expressed his confidence that his wife would make? That is a point which it is impossible to labour, and I do not know that I can add anything to what the Lord Chancellor has said upon it, or that I can do anything more than express my entire agreement with him. I think that is the most natural way of reading the will. I think any layman reading the will, and considering what the testator's intention was, would come to the conclusion—at any rate I come to the conclusion—that he is speaking only of a default of any such disposition as he had expressed his confidence that his wife would make; and, if so, I am of opinion that there is a good executory limitation.

I ought to say that it does not appear to me very important whether you treat the words "in confidence" as creating a trust or not. The question is whether the ultimate limitation is a good executory limitation; and even if you treat the words "in confidence" as only expressing a hope or belief, the will would run thus: "I hope and believe that she will give the estate to one or more of my nieces, but if she does not do so, then I direct that it shall be equally divided between them." I think that is a perfectly good limitation. The case which the appellants' counsel last referred to shews that, although a gift over in default of alienation generally would be bad, yet a gift over in default of alienation to a particular individual, or alienation to any but a particular individual, would be good, and I see no reason whatever for thinking that this is not a good limitation. I will only add this: in none of the cases which have been cited in which questions of this kind have been discussed was there a gift over in default such as we find in the direction in this will, and I am not aware of any case of the kind. I observe in some of the cases to which our attention was drawn, that absence of any such gift over, the absence of any direction such as we find in default of a bequest by the widow, is made a strong point for not holding that the words "in confidence," or similar words, created an obligatory trust.

There is one practical observation I will make for the consideration of the parties, and that is this: The question upon which the argument took place is stated thus: "That it may be determined whether upon the true construction of the testator's said will the testator's real and personal estate and property is given to the plaintiff absolutely for her own use and benefit, or whether the same is given to the plaintiff for her life only and after her death," and so forth. That seems to me to be framed on an erroneous hypothesis. Counsel for the appellants do not contend, and I do not think it would be possible to contend, that the wife has only a life estate. Her real interest is an estate in fee or an absolute estate in personalty, subject to an executory limitation. The parties will perhaps consider what is the best way to state it. I should think something of this kind would do: "That the plaintiff is entitled to an absolute estate subject to a conditional executory limitation to the testator's nieces living at her death, in case she shall not have made a will devising the estate to one or more of such nieces." Some words of that kind would do, but obviously we cannot answer the question which is asked of us, yes or no.

Lord JAMES OF HEREFORD.—I have very few words to add to the judgments that have already been delivered, and in which I concur. It is admitted on all hands that our only duty is to discover what was the intention of the testator, and that we must make that discovery from the words used in the will.

Now I do not enter, of course, into any consideration of the particular mental powers of the testator, but we must treat him who made the will as a person of ordinary common sense, meaning something by the words he wrote. It is contended on the one hand that this was a disposition of an unfettered freehold estate to the widow. If that had been so, it would have been very easy to have left out the words that appear subsequently to those first words in the will. There is in that contention no meaning whatever given to the words that follow—namely, the phrase "and in default of any disposition by her thereof the estate is to go to his nieces." I do not think we can shut out those words from the construction of this will, but I can quite conceive that, the word "absolutely" being used, we have to find some reason why in the first disposition he should have used the word "absolutely" and in the second there should have been this gift over to the nieces. I think the meaning of the testator from a common-sense point of view is clear enough. He wished his widow to have a life estate in this property, and he then wished after that life estate that it should be left to his nieces—to those of his own blood. If he had made the disposition at that time, in 1893, he must have selected the objects of his bounty without relation to what would be their condition at the time of his wife's death. There are seven nieces. We have no evidence about it, but I infer, from one of them being an infant now, that they were young ladies at the time of the will. At the time of the widow's death they would be in different conditions, deserving a different amount of beneficial gift. One might have married a rich man, and another might have married a poor man; and one might have a large family and another none; and one might not be married at all. Therefore it was that he wished the power of selection to be given at a time more or less approaching that at which they would be recipients of the bounty. For that reason, while he gave his wife a life estate only, he asked her to take care that the nieces should have the estate subject to her selection of the individual nieces and a division of the property apportioned between them as she thought fit. That was apparently a most sensible, business-like, common-sense view of the position which Mrs. Hanbury was likely to take up in relation to these ladies; and I believe that was the whole intention of this will.

Lord ROBERTSON.—I entirely agree.

Lord LINDLEY.—I am sorry to say I am unable to come to the same conclusion, but I will not trouble your lordships with many observations upon the question. It is impossible to say that a trust for the nieces, or at least for one of them selected by the wife, cannot be extracted from this will, but personally I think the construction adopted by Stirling, L.J., is more in accordance with the language used than the construction contended for here by the appellants. The wife was, in my opinion, intended to be the absolute owner, free from any legal or equitable obligation in favour of anybody, and free from any executory gift over. I admit that the contrary construction can be put upon the will, but that does not appear to me to be the natural one.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Walker, Martineau, & Co.

Solicitors for the respondents, Patersons, Snow, Bloxam, & Kinder.

Court of Appeal.

From P. D. & Ad. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — March 8.

"THE TOSCANA." (a.)

Practice—Appeal—Costs—Ship—Salvage—Reduction of of award—Allowance of appellants' costs.

The Court of Appeal, having reduced the amount of a salvage award, allowed the successful appellants the costs of the appeal.

The Kilmaho, 16 Times L. R. 155, and The Prince Llewellyn, [1904] P. 83, 52 W. R. Dig. 169, followed.

The Gipsy Queen, 43 W. R. 359, [1895] P. 176, not followed.

Appeal from the judgment of Sir Francis Jeune in a salvage action.

The action was brought by the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Bonny to recover salvage for services rendered to the steamship Toscana.

Sir Francis Jeune made an award in favour of the plaintiffs for £5,100.

The owners of The Toscana appealed, upon the ground that the amount awarded was excessive.

Pickford, K.C., Laing, K.C., and Pritchard, for the appellants.

Aspinall, K.C., and A. D. Bateson, for the respondents.

THE COURT reduced the amount awarded for salvage to £3,000.

Pickford, K.C., asked that the appellants might be allowed their costs of appeal.

Aspinall, K.C., contrà.—In The Gipsy Queen, 43 W. R. 359, [1895] P. 176, Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes and Rigby, L.JJ., held that the general practice of this court, following the practice adopted by the Privy Council, was not to allow costs where the amount of a salvage award was reduced.

Pickford, K.C., in reply.—In the subsequent case of The Kilmaho, 16 Times L. R. 155, where the award was considerably reduced, A. L. Smith, Rigby, and Collins, L.JJ., allowed the successful appellants their costs. That case was followed by a Divisional Court of the Admiralty Division in The Prince Llewellyn, [1904] P. 83.

COLLINS, M.R.—I think we are at liberty to follow our own judgment in this matter. The hard-and-fast rule of practice laid down by the Privy Council, when they exercised jurisdiction in these appeals, which was followed as a general rule of practice by this court in The Gipsy Queen, has since been abandoned in The Kilmaho and The Prince Llewellyn. I think we ought to follow the ordinary rule by which a successful appellant is allowed the costs of the appeal. The appeal will therefore be allowed with the costs of the appeal, but the costs in the court below will not be interfered with.

MATHEW and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants, Pritchard & Sons.

Solicitors for the respondents, Stokes & Stokes, for Batesons, Warr, & Wimshurst, Liverpool.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Feb. 20.

LEWIN AND OTHERS v. END.
LEWIN AND OTHERS v. CIVIL SERVICE SUPPLY ASSOCIATION. (a.)

Local Government—Rating—Dwelling-house—Authority of old decisions—Interpretation.

The court will not readily overrule the decision of a court of inferior jurisdiction which has been acted on for a great number of years. The word "house" in 12 Car. 2, c. 37, means a dwelling-house—i.e., a house which is in fact being used as a dwelling-house, or which can be so used without any structural alteration.

Surman v. Darley, 14 M. & W. 181, explained and followed.

Lewin and Others v. George Newnes (Limited), 90 L. T. 160, distinguished.

Appeals from a Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy, J.) in an action tried by Judge Woodfall at the Westminster County Court.

The respondents occupied premises situate in the parish of St. Paul's, Covent Garden.

By an Act entitled "An Act for making the Precinct of Covent Garden Parochial," passed in the twelfth year of Car. 2, the sum of £250 was charged upon the "houses of the inhabitants for the support and benefit of the rector, curate, clerk and sextons of the said parish."

This Act was repealed and substantially re-enacted by 51 Geo. 3, c. 150, the charge being increased from £250 to £520. The rate is commonly known as the rector's rate.

The premises, occupied by the respondent End were formerly used as dwelling-houses, but at the present time were being used, as to the lower part of the premises, as a warehouse, and as to the upper part as offices of a theatrical agent. The premises, in fact, could not be reconverted into dwelling-houses without considerable structural alterations. No persons slept on the premises; a caretaker remained in charge during the night, but he was occupied with work throughout the night.

The premises occupied by the respondents, the Civil Service Supply Association, were built upon the site once occupied by dwelling-houses. The present premises were used entirely for the purposes of the business—general stores. No persons slept upon the premises. The kitchens were used as part of the general business. The attendants had lunch on the premises because it would be inconvenient to allow them to leave the premises for that purpose.

The plaintiffs in both actions were the churchwardens of the parish of St. Paul's, Covent Garden.

His Honour Judge Woodfall held, affirmed by the Divisional Court, that the defendants were not liable to pay the said rate.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Macmorran, K.C., and Clarke Hall, for the appellants, relied upon Daniel v. Coulsting, 7 M. & G. 122. Cresswell, J., in his judgment, on p. 125 says: "I am clearly of opinion that the word 'house' does not necessarily mean dwelling-house." This court is not bound by the decision of the Court of Exchequer in Surman v. Darley, 14 M. & W. 181, but can overrule it. Alderson, B., in his judgment, states: "It clearly meant to impose the charge only on dwelling-houses or, at all events, on those which are capable of being occupied as such." The premises now in question are capable of being so occupied. In the case of the respondent End the rate was paid for many years. In the recent case of Lewin and Others v. Newnes (Limited), 90 L. T. 160, 52 W. R. Dig. 148, the court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Kennedy, JJ.) adopted this definition of Alderson, B. The court found that the buildings in question were built as dwelling-houses, and were capable of being occupied as such. If this appeal is dismissed it will fall heavily upon the appellants, as the tendency of modern times is to convert dwelling-houses into warehouses and offices. [ROMER, L.J.—Your remedy is a new Act of Parliament.]

Frampton, K.C., and John Sanderson, for the respondent End; and Danckwerts, K.C., Morton Smith, and Henn Collins, for the respondent Civil Service Supply Association.—This court would be bound by the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, constituted of Pollock, C.B., and Alderson, Rolfe, and Platt, BB., in Surman v. Darley. This decision was now sixty years old and had several times been acted upon, but never departed from. In Newnes case the caretaker and his wife actually resided on the premises, and the case was therefore readily distinguishable. In Merry v. Nichalls, 20 W. R. 929, 7 Ch. App. 733, Sir W. M. James, L.J., at p. 750 of his judgment, said: "However, that is not the way a court like this deals with the decisions of a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction. The cases which are cited do not bind us as res gestæ, because they are inter alios acta; but they bind us in so far as they are authoritative expositions and statements of the law. It is the principle of the decision by which we are bound, not a mere rule that in exactly the same circumstances we are to arrive at the same conclusion. Therefore, to say that the decisions are wrong in point of principle, if that principle was clearly laid down, does not relieve us from the obligation of following the principle of the decision, because the whole theory of our system is that the decision of a superior court is binding upon an inferior court and on a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction in so far as it is a statement of the law which the court is bound to accept." If warehouses, offices, and the like are intended to be included within an Act, the words always are expressly included, as Platt, B., says in his judgment in Surman's case. Thus in The Queen v. Christopherson, 34 W. R. 86, 16 Q. B. D. 7, the rector's rate by 16 Car. 2 and 22 & 23 Car. 2 was charged upon "all and every the houses, shops, warehouses, cellars, and outhouses." Counsel for the appellants laid great stress on Daniel v. Coulsting, but the actual decision does not support their case, and, with respect to the excerpt from the judgment of Cresswell, J., the learned judge himself gives the true explanation of the decision in Surman's case by his reference to Elmore v. St. Briavells. [Danckwerts was stopped by the court.]

Clarke Hall replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I do not see my way clear to depart from the decision of the Court of Exchequer in Surmam v. Darley. There they decided that in these Acts "houses" meant dwelling-houses. In neither of these cases are the houses in fact being used as dwelling-houses. If there had been a covenant in either case not to use the premises other than for the purpose of a dwelling-house there would have been a breach of the covenant. Then it is argued that the Court of Exchequer said none but a dwelling-house or one which is capable of being used as a dwelling-house came within the meaning of the word "houses" in these two Acts of Parliament. I think that means capable of being used in its present structural condition. I do not think either the End or the Civil Service houses are houses in respect of which it may be truly said that they come within the meaning of houses capable of being used as dwelling-houses. I think neither of these houses are used as dwelling-houses. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree. I think these cases are governed by the case of Surman v. Darley. To enable the appellants to succeed in these cases they must ask us to overrule the decision in Surman v. Darley. That case is sixty years old; it has never been differed from, and has been followed up to the present time. That being so, I do not think this court ought to differ from the decision in that case or try to overrule it. On the facts, it appears to me that both these houses were not being used as dwelling-houses. Nobody dwelt there. They could not be used as dwelling-houses without substantial alterations being effected. Therefore both these cases fall within the decision of Surman v. Darley.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In my opinion we are not at liberty at this time to depart from the principle of the decision in Surman v. Darley. It was laid down by the Court of Exchequer in that case that the Acts were meant to apply only to buildings which were substantially dwelling-houses. That which has been relied on on behalf of the plaintiffs is the language of Alderson, B., who says, speaking of this Act of Parliament: "It clearly meant to impose the charge only on dwelling-houses, or, at all events, on those which are capable of being occupied as such," and it was said that these houses, though not being used as dwelling-houses, were capable of being used as such. Now, I am unable to disagree with the learned county court judge in this respect. I think the learned baron meant houses which, without substantial alteration, could be occupied as dwelling-houses. In both these cases in order to convert these buildings into dwelling-houses substantial alterations would have to be made.

Appeals dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for appellants, Bartell & Large.

Solicitor for respondent End, Harry Wilson.

Solicitors for respondent Civil Service Supply Association, Tathams & Pym.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } March 3, 4.
Buckley, J. }

In re LONDON PRESSED HINGE CO. (LIMITED).
CAMPBELL v. THE COMPANY. (a.)

Company—Debentures—Floating security—Appointment of receiver — Judgment creditor — No principal or interest in arrear—Jeopardy.

The court will, at the instance of the holder of a debenture creating a floating charge upon the undertaking and property of a limited company, appoint a receiver of the property comprised in the debenture where the property is in danger of execution being levied upon it by a judgment creditor, notwithstanding that no principal moneys or interest are in arrear under the debenture, and that the judgment creditor appears and objects.

Motion.

This was a motion in a debenture-holders' action in which the plaintiffs were holders of debentures by way of floating security upon the undertaking and all property, present and future, of the above company. Nothing was due and immediately payable in respect of either principal or interest. The principal was payable in May, 1908, or, by virtue of the tenth condition of the debentures, (a) upon six calendar months' default in payment of interest; or (b) if an order was made or resolution passed for winding up the company. Neither of these events had happened. The interest was payable in May and November. All interest had been paid down to November, 1904.

A creditor had, however, obtained judgment in an action against the company, and was in a position to issue execution.

Under these circumstances the plaintiffs had brought their action against the company, and now moved for the appointment of a receiver and manager of the undertaking and property of the company comprised in the debentures, and to manage the business of the company. The company did not oppose the application, but, at his lordship's desire, the judgment creditor was represented on the motion.

Buckmaster, K.C., and A. J. Chitty, for the applicants.—The court will appoint a receiver when the security of the debenture-holder is in danger. A legal mortgagee can always have a receiver. An equitable mortgagee not having the legal estate must come to the court, and the court will appoint a receiver in his favour if he shows good reason for it being done (Legg v. Mathieson, 2 Giff. 71), and so in the case of debenture-holders: Wildy v. Mid-Hants Railway, 16 W. R. 409; Edwards v. Standard Rolling Stock Syndicate, 41 W. R. 343, [1893] 1 Ch. 574. The rights of the debenture-holders come before those of the judgment or execution creditor: Davey & Co. v. Williamson & Sons, 46 W. R. 571, [1898] 2 Q. B. 194. There is no doubt future property may be assigned in equity: Tailby v. Official Receiver, 37 W. R. 513, 13 A. C. 523.

Schwann, for the company, consented to the application.

T. Crossfield, for the judgment creditor.—The court only appoints a receiver where either the principal or interest is due or there has been some breach of the contract between the parties: In re Florence Land and Public Works Co., 27 W. R. 236, 10 Ch. D. 530. The debenture still remains a floating charge until one of these events happen: In re Panama, New Zealand, and Australian Royal Mail Co., 18 W. R. 441, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 318; The Government Stock and Other Securities Investment Co. v. Manila Railway Co., 45 W. R. 353, [1897] A. C. 81. In all the cases cited for the applicants one or other of these events had happened, except in Edwards v. Standard Rolling Stock Syndicate.

BUCKLEY, J.—The plaintiffs, to whom nothing is presently payable, ask for a receiver, the effect of which will be that the company can no longer pay the creditor, to whom payment is presently due, in priority to the debenture-holders, to whom nothing is presently due. The company, as is commonly the case, appear and consent to the order. Why, indeed, under the circumstances should they oppose? These applications are becoming so frequent that I have taken the opportunity to look into the cases in order to see whether, as the authorities stand, it is possible to prevent the injustice which is now of frequent occurrence, and which I will describe. The cases are numerous in which the undertaking of a limited company is so loaded with debentures that the profits are barely sufficient, or perhaps not sufficient, to keep down the debenture interest, and that if the company is wound up there is nothing for anyone but the debenture-holders. In short, the facts often are that the undertaking is substantially carried on only for the benefit of the debenture-holders who have a floating security over it. In this state of facts money is lent or goods consigned to the company in respect of which a debt accrues to the creditor, and so long as the security "floats," as it is termed, and no receiver is appointed, the creditor has a possibility or expectation of being paid by the company; for as between the company and the debenture-holder the former may pay in the ordinary course of business. But directly a receiver is appointed this expectation of the creditor is intercepted. He may have lent his money or consigned his goods to the company last week, but if he has the audacity to ask for payment and to enforce his legal remedies to obtain it, the debenture-holder obtains a receiver in a proceeding to which the execution creditor is not a party, and thus closes the door against him, taking his money or his goods as part of the security, and leaving the creditor who supplied the money or the goods to go unpaid. I regret to be driven to the conclusion that as the law s ands those are the rights of the debenture-holder entitled to a floating charge. It was decided in the Court of Appeal in In re Standard Manufacturing Co., 39 W. R. 369, [1891] 1 Ch. 627, that an execution creditor takes subject to all equities, and that the sheriff cannot by seizing get rid of the rights of the debenture-holders to which the property was subject when in the hands of the debtor company. The Court of Appeal in In re Opera (Limited), 39 W. R. 705, [1891] 3 Ch. 260, stated that the decision in In re Standard Manufacturing Co. was a clear decision that the execution creditor takes subject to the equity of the debenture-holders. From this decision it has resulted that in interpleader—that is to say, even in the case where no receiver is appointed, the execution creditor can have no more than the benefit of the equity of redemption, and that the rights of the debenture-holders prevail over his rights: Davey v. Williamson; Simultaneous Colour Printing Syndicate v. Foweraker, [1901] 1 K. B. 771, 49 W. R. Dig. 25; and Duck v. Tower Galvanizing Co., [1901] 2 K. B. 314, 49 W. R. Dig. 25. This being the law, the fact is that the appointment of a receiver does not, as between the execution creditor and the debenture-holder, disappoint the execution creditor of anything which otherwise would be his right. For from these authorities it results that the creditor never had any right as between himself and the debenture-holder to enforce payment in priority to the debenture-holder. If he avails himself of his legal right to judgment and execution, the debenture-holder could intercept his execution. In fact, the unfortunate creditor has no right enforceable by legal process in cases where the equity of redemption was of no value, notwithstanding the fact that his money or his goods has gone to increase the property included in the security. His right to look for payment from the company rested only upon the expectation that the debenture-holder would not put an end to the company's authority to pay the creditor in the ordinary course of business. The authorities seem to me to involve that the creditor has no right to complain because steps are taken to put an end to the authority thus given by debenture-holders to their mortgagor. The appointment of a receiver at the instance of an equitable incumbrancer, at any rate where nothing is presently payable to him, is no doubt a matter of discretion: Thorn v. Nine Reefs (Limited), 67 L. T. 93, 41 W. R. Dig. 33. But if the execution creditor's rights are not affected, except as above stated, by the appointment of a receiver, there exists, as far as I can see, no grounds why the court should exercise its discretion against the appointment of a receiver by reason of any considerations arising as between the execution creditor and the debenture-holder. The only relevant consideration would seem to be whether as between the company and the debenture-holder it is just and convenient that the company's authority to dispose of its assets in the ordinary course of business should be stopped. As between those parties it would seem reasonable that the authority should be stopped if its continuance would injure the debenture-holder. A legal mortgagee may take possession simply because he chooses. In so doing he accepts the responsibility of a mortgagee in possession. An equitable mortgagee must show good reason why the court should at his instance take possession by its receiver. Lord Chelmsford in Wildy v. Mid-Hants Railway, 16 W. R. 409, held that danger to the security by anticipated acts of an execution creditor is a good reason. Jeopardy of the security thus becomes relevant. The mere fact of consent by the mortgagor would not be enough. This probably explains the fact that in both the more recent cases in which a receiver has been appointed on the ground of jeopardy, as in MacMahon v. North Kent Ironworks, 39 W. R. 349, [1891] 2 Ch. 148, and Edwards v. Standard Rolling Stock Syndicate, 41 W. R. 343, [1893] 1 Ch. 574, the question of jeopardy was treated as material, although the company appeared and consented. But for this consideration the fact that jeopardy was considered material might be thought to tend to some extent in the direction in which I desire to find authority, but the implication, even if it exists, seems to me inconsistent with the express decisions. I am unable upon the authorities to find anything which will enable me to put a stop to what I feel to be an injustice. It is an injustice arising from the nature, as defined by the authorities, of a floating security. The mischief arises from the fact that the law allows a charge on all future property. The subject, however, is one which I think urgently requires attention. I should be glad if the authorities could be reviewed in a court of higher jurisdiction than this, in case the execution creditor should be able to find grounds for thinking that the decisions which bind me can be successfully impeached elsewhere. It is not for me to say whether the matter requires the attention of the Legislature. In my judgment the plaintiffs, as the authorities stand, are entitled to an order for a receiver, and I make the order accordingly.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Application granted.

Solicitors, Ward, Perks, & McKay; A. R. Gilman, for Lucas, Hutchinson, & Meek, Middlesbrough.

K. B. Div. (Farwell, J.) — Feb. 15.

GLASSBROOK v. DAVID & VAUX. (a.)

Sheriff—Levying distress—Execution on goods—Fees—Writ of fi. fa.—Sheriff's officer in possession—Several writs—Possession money—Out-of-pocket expenses—Poundage and mileage—Sheriffs Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 55), s. 20, sub-sections 1 and 2*—Rules and Table of Fees of* 1888 under the Sheriffs Act.

Where a sheriff, who is already in possession of a judgment debtor's goods under a writ of fi. fa., is served with another writ of fi. fa. by another execution creditor for levying execution on the same debtor's goods, and has been paid in respect of his seizure, mileage, and possession by the first execution creditor, as there has been one seizure there has therefore been only one man in possession, and the sheriff cannot recover from the second execution creditor the same sum again in respect of seizure, mileage, and possession which he has already received from the first execution creditor, as this would be contrary to the true intent and meaning of the rules and orders under the Sheriffs Act, 1887. Under these rules the sheriff is entitled to his poundage, and as regards his fees, only to cover his actual out-of-pocket expenses.

(a.) Reported by A. R. TAYLOUR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Action.

The plaintiff was the Sheriff of Glamorganshire in 1903-4, and as such claimed to be entitled to recover sheriff's charges which had been certified by a taxing-master as payable to him under the provisions of the Sheriffs Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 55), by the defendants in respect of a writ of fi. fa. lodged by them on the 18th of December, 1903, and which was indorsed to levy on certain goods of the Gordon Navigation Collieries, the execution debtors, £117 8s. 10d., and £1 10s. for costs of execution together with interest at 4 per cent., besides sheriff's poundage, officers' fees, costs of levy, &c. These charges were taxed by the master at £22 13s.

On the 28th of October, 1903, the plaintiff as sheriff levied under two writs of fi. fa. which were lodged with him in an action at the suit of two other execution creditors, and indorsed to levy on the goods of the execution debtors. With the consent of the execution creditors and the execution debtors the plaintiff continued in possession of the goods seized.

At the date of the lodging of the writ of fi. fa. by the defendants the plaintiff was in possession. A further writ of fi. fa. was issued by another firm of execution creditors indorsed to levy on the goods of the execution debtors, and was lodged with the plaintiff on the 21st of December, 1903.

By letter dated the 24th of December, 1903, the defendants consented to the execution standing over until the 2nd of January, 1904, provided the defendants' liability for sheriff's fees was not increased.

A further writ of fi. fa. was issued indorsed to levy on the goods of the execution debtors by another firm of execution creditors with costs of execution and sheriff's charges, and was lodged with the plaintiff on the 6th of January, 1904, and similar writs by other execution creditors indorsed to levy on the goods of the execution debtors were lodged with the plaintiff on the 5th and the 9th of February, 1904, respectively.

By the consent of all parties the plaintiff by his officers continued in possession of the goods and chattels of the execution debtors so seized until the 4th of March, when some of the execution creditors refused to give him any further instructions.

On the 8th of March the plaintiff was served with a copy of an order of the registrar in bankruptcy appointing the official receiver interim receiver of the property of the execution debtors.

On the 11th of March the defendants by letter directed the plaintiff to withdraw, which he accordingly did.

In all the executions except that of the defendants the execution creditors gave no instructions to the sheriff, and an interpleader summons was issued in each case in respect of the various claims, with the result that on the 16th of March orders were made directing the sheriff to withdraw from possession, which he did.

By these various orders the execution creditors were ordered to pay the sheriff's costs and charges, and in pursuance thereof the various bills of costs were taxed.

The plaintiff was allowed and received possession money in respect of the various executions, other than the defendants', and in addition to this the master upon taxation allowed £19 for possession money from the 22nd of December, 1903, to the 11th of March, 1904, which was the amount now in dispute.

The plaintiff and the defendants differed as to the costs and charges payable to the plaintiff as sheriff by the defendants, and the defendants contended that the plaintiff had no claim to fees except £2 for inventory and £1 to cover out-of-pocket expenses. Such fees were allowed by the master at the aforesaid sum of £22 13s. The defendants had previously tendered £3 1s. to the plaintiff, and on his refusal paid it into court on the 8th of August, 1904. It was mutually admitted that the plaintiff did not put into possession a man under the defendants' execution, but kept possession by means of the man actually in possession at the date of the lodging of the defendants' writ with the plaintiff.

The action was tried by Farwell, J., sitting as an extra judge of the King's Bench Division.

A. C. Bailhache, for the plaintiff.

J. R. Atkin, for the defendants.—This liability to poundage to the sheriff, when he is put into possession, is an "incidental expense": Ex parte Sims, In re Grubb, 25 W. R. 276, 453, 5 Ch. D. 375. The indorsement on the fi. fa. in this case is in the ordinary common form. The practice is to register it as an "incidental expense." [FARWELL, J.—What view did the taxing-master take?] He had no discretion to allow these expenses to the sheriff at all. Section 20, sub-section 1, of the Sheriffs Act, 1887, gives him an allowance upon his accounts of 1s. 6d. in the £ for every sum not exceeding £100, and by sub-section 2 he is entitled to certain fees and poundage. Under that Act the rules made by the judges under a fi. fa. show quite plainly what "possession" means. In all the cases the sheriff's expenses are most carefully laid down, and it was never intended he should get all these amounts into his pocket.

He cited Bilke v. Havelock, 3 Camp. 374; In re Morgan, Ex parte Board of Trade, 52 W. R. 79, [1904] 1 K. B. 68; In re Wells, Ex parte The Sheriff of Kent, 68 L. T. 231, 41 W. R. Dig. 221; 1 Vict. c. 55. [By FARWELL, J.—Roe v. Hammond, 2 C. P. Div. 300, 25 W. R. Dig. 255.]

A. C. Bailhache, in reply.—The sheriff, of course, cannot seize all the goods. It appears from the correspondence that separate goods were seized, and there is no admission that the whole of the goods of the judgment debtor were seized at any one time. There is no express authority on the point at all. The master in this particular case has allowed the fees, and he has always allowed them. Counsel for defendants has stated the old law with regard to the sheriff, the law before 1887; but then he was in a different position, and it was extremely doubtful if the sheriff could recover his expenses from anybody, except where he got his poundage. [He referred to the various items in the table of fees under the Sheriffs Act, 1887, in the Annual Practice, vol. 2, pp. 265, 266.] [FARWELL, J.—Why should you make a difference between items 1, 2, 3, 4?] The word "although" in the bill under item 3 ought to be "if." Why should execution creditor number one pay less than execution creditor number two? Why should each execution creditor not each pay execution money? Counsel for the defendants say they are not all liable, that the man in possession is in possession for the first execution creditor. There is no authority directly against the plaintiff. In re Wells is as to levy only.

FARWELL, J.—I am obliged to the learned counsel on both sides for the assistance they have given me in this somewhat difficult question. The question, to my mind, turns simply upon the construction of the rules under the Sheriffs Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 55). The old law is stated in the cases referred to, and I need not refer to it again, but the sheriff's right turns on the construction of the rule under the last clause, which is found in the Annual Practice, vol. 2, on p. 267, and is as follows: "In every case where an execution is withdrawn, satisfied, or stopped, the fees under this order shall be paid by the person issuing the execution." That is this case. The sheriff has seized, and for the purpose of my decision in this case I am assuming that he seized all the goods once for all. There was one seizure for all the goods. I think that is the fair meaning of the admissions, and I think that is the point the parties have come here to try. There were seven levies altogether, and the same man in possession, and the goods having been once seized, of course there could be no subsequent seizure. The object of the Rules of 1888 was no doubt to allow the sheriff his poundage and expenses. Although the Act of Parliament uses the word "fees," of course the rule follows it and calls them "fees," but when you come to the details they are actual expenses—firstly, for making inquiries; secondly, for seizure; thirdly, for mileage; fourthly, for the man in possession, to provide his own board in every case. The sheriff claims to have payment for the same man in possession from each of the judgment creditors. The result would be that the sheriff would get a very large sum, I am told £120 and possession money. I do not think that can be the true meaning of these rules. I think the proper view is that the sheriff was entitled to have his poundage, and to have in addition to that these fees which are actual out-of-pocket expenses. It has been held that there can only be one fee for seizure and one fee for mileage. If there can be only one seizure and one journey to make a seizure, the possession also, so long as there is only one man in possession, must be treated as a unit. And I come to that conclusion the more readily because the rule provides that the man in possession is in every case to provide his own board. That looks as if the 5s. a day allowed to him is meant to keep the sheriff from being out of pocket. In In re Grubb, Ex parte Sims, James, L.J., treats possession as being one of the incidental expenses the Act intended to provide for, and I think the case is indistinguishable in principle from the decision of Vaughan Williams, L.J., in In re Wells, Ex parte The Sheriff of Kent. I am unable to see any ground for distinguishing between seizure, mileage, and possession. The three really hold together, and I think Wright, J., in In re Morgan, 52 W. R. 79, [1904] 1 K. B. 68, took the same view. The result is, that whatever may be the liability of the various judgment creditors to the sheriff so long as he remains in possession—and as to that liability I say nothing—when he has been paid in respect of seizure, mileage, and possession by one creditor, he cannot recover the same sum again from any of the others. That is the only decision it is necessary for me to arrive at. I need hardly say I have had great hesitation in differing from the taxing-master, who has great experience. But, after all, it is only the question of the construction of this particular order, and although I should not have interfered with the exercise of his discretion, yet I am bound to consider whether his construction of this order is right, and I think on the authorities that the taxing-master's allocation is in no way equivalent to the award of an arbitrator in an action of this sort. I think on the fair construction of the admissions that is the only point which the parties came here to try, and I think it would be unfair to allow further facts to be opened in reply, which were not opened in the first instance, and to which, if they had been, counsel for the defendants would have been entitled to object and to ask that the case might stand over in order that he might be ready to meet them. The question, therefore, whether there were separate goods seized in respect of each of the several levies is not before me, and I give no decision what the effect of that would be. The result is the action must be dismissed with costs.

Solicitors, McKenna & Co.; Helder, Roberts, & Co., for Hartland, Issac, & Co., Swansea.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy and Ridley, JJ.) — Feb. 1.

BAYLEY v. COOKE. (a.)

Adulteration—Milk—Analyst's certificate, sufficiency of—Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), s. 6; 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 51), s. 4—Sale of Milk Regulations, 1901, 1.

In a prosecution under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, 1875 and 1899, the certificate of the analyst is bad for want of sufficiency if it does not indicate the amount, nature, or character of the adulteration; and the fact that the Board of Agriculture, under powers given by the Act of 1899, has published regulations (Sale of Milk Regulations, 1901) prescribing the standard percentage of ingredients in no way removes the necessity to indicate these matters on the face of the certificate. For this purpose it is not sufficient to refer to the particular regulation fixing the standard.

Fortune v. Hanson, 44 W. R. 431, [1896] 1 Q. B. 202, extended.

Case stated by a court of summary jurisdiction held at Winchester.

A summons under section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, was taken out by the appellant charging the respondent that on the 17th of May, 1904, he sold to the appellant as new milk that which was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the milk demanded, being deficient in milk fat.

The percentage of milk fat required by the Sale of Milk Regulations, 1901, 1—made by the Board of Agriculture under section 4 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899—is 3 per cent., whereas the milk only contained 1·4 per cent., being in consequence deficient to the extent of 53·4 per cent. of milk fat. The certificate of the analyst followed the form in the schedule of the Act of 1875, and set out, inter alia, the following material figures: Milk fat, 1·4 per cent.; deficiency in milk fat, 53 4 per cent. It did not in terms state the milk should contain 3 per cent. of milk fat, but the standard, it will be seen, could be arrived at by an easy calculation from the figures actually set out.

The justices thought they were bound by the decision in Fortune v. Hanson, [1896] 1 Q. B. 202, and refused to convict subject to a special case being stated.

C. A. Russell, K.C. (Brodrick with him), for the appellant.—I draw the attention of the court to the means of arriving by a simple arithmetical calculation at the standard. Moreover, the standard is now fixed by statute, for the regulations are part of the statute, and therefore there can be no necessity to set it out. It is merely a matter of reference.

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The respondent did not appear.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I wish it to be understood that as far as I am concerned I do not wish it to be thought that the provisions of the Act of 1899 have made it any the less necessary to indicate on the face of the certificate what is the amount, nature, or character of the adulteration, or that it in any way lessens the obligation of the analyst to describe what he is bound to describe under section 18 of the Act of 1875. I do not want to be understood to decide that the certificate is good because of any reference that may be made to the rules made under the Act of 1889, or because of implications which may involve the standards allowed under these rules. For example, if only 1·4 per cent. of milk fats appeared on the face of the certificate, I doubt whether that would be a good certificate. You are bound to show you are comparing it with some standard. This certificate shows the percentage of milk fat and the deficiency in milk fat of the adulterated milk. A mathematical calculation would show that the proper proportion of milk fat should be 3 per cent. I think in this case the certificate does show correctly how much deficiency in milk fat there was and the standard could be gleaned from the face of the certificate itself.

KENNEDY and RIDLEY, JJ., concurred.

Case sent back.

Solicitors, Robbins, Billing, & Co., for H. Barber, Manchester.

K. B. Div. (Bray, J.) — Dec. 15, 21.

LONDON, DEPTFORD, AND GREENWICH TRAMWAY CO. v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL. (a.)

Tramway—Purchase of tramway—Cost of widening streets—Tramways Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 78), s. 43.

A local authority in pursuance of its powers under section 43 of the Tramways Act, 1870, gave notice to purchase certain tramways. At the date of the construction of the tramways it was not the practice (as at present) to require tramways to contribute towards the cost of widening the streets. At a reference held to determine the value of the tramways the tramway company claimed that the value of the tramways was enhanced by reason of their being free from such liability to contribute, and tendered evidence to show what such contribution would have amounted to.

Held, that the referee was right in rejecting such evidence, and that the claim of the company was not well founded.

Award in the form of a special case stated under section 7 of the Arbitration Act.

The special case was as follows: Under the provisions of the Southwark and Deptford Tramways Act, 1879, as amended by the Southwark and Deptford Tramways Acts, 1881 and 1889, and the London, Deptford, and Greenwich Tramways Act, 1891, the Southwark and Deptford Tramway Co., hereinafter called the claimants, were incorporated and authorized to construct and maintain, and did construct and maintain certain tramways therein described.

The tramways were made purchaseable by the local authority as to part in 1901, and as to the other part in 1902. The several Tramways Acts mentioned above incorporated Parts II. and III. of the Tramways Act, 1870.

On the 20th of August, 1900, the London County Council, being the local authority within whose district the tramways so constructed were situate, duly gave notice to the claimants under section 43 of the Tramways Act, 1870, requiring them as promoters to sell to the council the whole of the tramways so constructed. The claimants and the London County Council differed as to the value of the undertaking, and a referee was appointed under the same section to determine the value (exclusive of any allowance for past or future profits of the undertakings or any compensation for compulsory sale or other consideration whatsoever) of the tramways so constructed, and of all lands, buildings, works, materials, and plant of the claimants suitable to and used by them for the purpose of the tramways.

On the 2nd of May, 1904, the referee duly made his award, and determined that the value of the tramways and the lands, buildings, works, materials, and plant of the claimants suitable to and used by them for the purposes of the tramways was £91,363 7s. 6d.

At the hearing the following claim was made by the claimants, who requested the referee to raise the same upon the face of the award as a special case.

At the time of the obtaining of the Parliamentary powers for the construction of the tramways, it was not the practice to require the promoters of tramway undertakings to widen the streets through which the tramways were to run, or to make any contribution towards such widening; nor, in fact, were any of such streets widened; nor was contribution required in the case of the tramways in question.

As a condition of obtaining statutory powers to establish and work the tramways at the date of notice to purchase, the claimants would, according to the present practice, have been required to contribute one-third of the costs and expenses to be incurred in the widening of streets directed by Parliament in such cases.

It was contended on behalf of the claimants that, although no such widenings, nor any contributions in respect thereof, had in fact been made by them, nevertheless in determining the value of the tramways at the date of the notice to purchase, the referee was bound to take into account, as part of the present cost of constructing the tramways, the costs and expenses which would have been incurred by reason of the above-mentioned practice if the tramways had been authorized and constructed at the date of the notice; in other words, that the present value of the undertakings was enhanced by reason of its being freed from the liability to contribute to such widenings. The county council contended that as the claimants had not in fact been obliged to contribute to any such widenings, a hypothetical figure as to what they might have been called on to contribute if the practice at a certain date had been other than what it was, could not be taken into account in assessing the value of the tramways.

The referee was of opinion that the contention of the claimants was wholly unfounded, but he consented upon certain terms to take de bene esse the evidence which was tendered by them, as the result of which he awarded and determined that, in the event of the court being of opinion that the contention of the claimants ought to prevail, the value of the tramways with the appurtenances as aforesaid amounted to the sum of £22,773 6s. 8d., in addition to the sum of £91,363 7s. 6d. mentioned above.

The question for the court was whether the contention of the claimants ought to prevail.

Lawson Walton, K.C., Sir E. Boyle, K.C., and Vesey Knox, for the claimants.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Cripps, K.C., Freeman, K.C., and Morten, for the London County Council.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 21.—BRAY, J., read the following judgment: This is a special case stated by the referee in his award under the following circumstances. The London, Deptford, and Greenwich Tramways Co., whom I shall call the claimants, constructed under Parliamentary powers certain tramways, and the London County Council, under the powers conferred on them as the local authority by section 43 of the Tramways Act, 1870, gave notice to the claimants to purchase their tramways. The claimants and the council differed as to the purchase price, and Mr. Henry Graham Harris was duly appointed referee by the Board of Trade. During the course of the arbitration a contention was raised by the claimants that the present value of the tramways was enhanced by reason of their being freed from liability to contribute to the widening of some of the streets in which the tramways were laid, to which, according to the present usual practice, they would, if they were now constructing a tramway, have been required to contribute, although in fact such widenings had not been made and no contribution had been made by the claimants. The referee considered such contention to be unfounded, but, at the request of the claimants and on certain terms, heard the evidence upon the point, and stated his award in the form of a special case, in order that the opinion of the court might be obtained as to the validity of that contention, and this is the question I have now to determine.

The argument of the claimants' counsel was shortly this. The House of Lords in Edinburgh Street Tramways Co. v. Lord Provost of Edinburgh, [1894] A. C. 456, and London Street Tramways Co. v. London County Council, [1894] A. C. 489, decided in effect that the value of the tramways must be measured by what it would cost at the date of the sale to establish the tramway, if it did not then exist, subject to a proper deduction for depreciation. By reason of the practice which had now become usual, though it did not exist when the claimants obtained their parliamentary powers, the promoters, if they had to construct their tramways now, would have to contribute one-third of the cost of the widening of, at all events, certain of the streets as a condition of their obtaining their powers, and, therefore, at the date of the sale, in order to establish the tramways, the promoters would have to pay not only the actual cost of construction, but this contribution in addition, and the referee ought to take this into consideration in assessing the value.

It certainly is a startling proposition that the council should have to pay, as part of the purchase price, for an expenditure which has never been incurred, and it was admitted that the contention was novel, and that there was no authority to support it. As there was no authority upon the point, I thought it right to take a few days to consider it. I have come to the conclusion that the referee was right when he expressed his opinion that the contention was wholly unfounded. I have read through the judgments in the House of Lords, and of Lord Lindley in the Court of Appeal, and I can find nothing to support the contention. The effect of the judgments seems to be that, as the words of section 43 prohibit profits or rental value being considered, it is necessary to fall back on what is called in rating cases "structural value"; but that is the structural value of the tramway as it exists, and in all the judgments it is referred to as the cost of "the purchased tramways," or other equivalent words. It is true, of course, that no such point as the present was raised in that case, and it was not contended on behalf of the council that there was anything in that case which precluded me from adopting the claimants' contention, but I can find nothing to encourage it. Now, I think Mr. Cripps pointed out at all events one of the answers to the claimants' contention when he said that the referee has to find the value of a tramway in an unwidened street, while the claimants are asking him to find the value of a tramway in a widened street. He has to find the value of an actual, not an imaginary, tramway. In my opinion the tramway in a widened street would be a different and, it may well be, a more valuable tramway. There would be more room for traffic, and possibly more cars might be run and more passengers carried; but it is sufficient to say that it is a different tramway. Another answer is that to calculate the structural value is only a mode of arriving at the real value, and to adopt that mode of calculation in the manner suggested by the claimants would not give the true value. It would be absurd to say that the true value of the tramway would be enhanced by the adoption of a practice as to other tramways in other streets. Although in this case the contention would give the claimants a large additional price, in another case where onerous conditions, which were imposed when the tramways were constructed, were no longer imposed it would follow, if the claimants' contention were correct, that the claimants would lose the cost of fulfilling those onerous conditions, which would appear to be manifestly unjust. The real value of the tramway is not altered by the change in practice. Many illustrations might be put. What if it became the practice to insist upon double the depth of concrete being put in? Ought the value of this tramway to be enhanced by the cost of the additional concrete which, if the tramway were constructed now, would have to be laid, but which was not required to be laid, nor laid? Mr. Walton was obliged to admit that his contention involved this. So also if it became the practice to require an additional width of stone, or other material, outside the rails to facilitate the ordinary traffic. Surely unless the additional expenditure was actually incurred it would not be right to increase the cost of the actual structure. The court, therefore, must declare that it is of opinion that the claimants' contention should not prevail, and that nothing must be added to the sum of £91,363 7s. 6d. The claimants must pay the costs of the argument of this case. The other costs seemed to be provided for by the award.

Stay of execution granted.

Solicitors for the claimant, Sutton, Ommaney, & Rendall

Solicitor for the County Council, Blaxland.

K. B. Div. (Ridley, J.) — Dec. 16.

BLUNDELL v. THE KING. (a.)

Crown—Compulsory taking of land—Land acquired by Crown for defence of realm — Compensation for injurious affection of adjoining lands of owner—Defence Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 94), ss. 16, 19—Land Clauses Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 63.

Where part of the lands of a subject are compulsorily taken by the Crown under and for the purposes of the

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Defence Acts, the compensation to be paid the owner is not necessarily limited to a fair sum for the land actually purchased. Therefore if the owner can show loss from severance and injurious affection caused to his adjoining land not purchased by the Crown, he is entitled to compensation also on that footing.

Petition of right.

The suppliant, Mr. W. J. Blundell, of Crosby Hall, Blundellsands, near Liverpool, was the tenant for life in possession of an estate in Lancashire comprising (inter alia) certain foreshores of the estuary of the Mersey and Crosby Channel. In 1902 the Secretary of State for War served a notice upon the suppliant notifying his desire to purchase absolutely certain portions of the estate for the purposes and under the powers of the Defence Acts, 1842 to 1873, the Ordinance Board Transfer Act, 1855, and the Ranges Act, 1891, s. 11; and it was agreed between the Secretary of State and the suppliant that the compensation to be paid by the Crown to the suppliant for those portions of the estate so required should be settled by arbitration, as if the lands, tenements, and hereditaments had been surveyed and marked out as wanted for the defence of the realm under section 16 of the Defence Act, 1842, and the necessity for the taking the same had been authorized as respectively mentioned by section 23 of that Act.

Accordingly, the Secretary of State caused a notice to treat to be served on the suppliant under section 19 of the Defence Act, 1842, stating that he required to purchase absolutely the agreed portions of the suppliant's estate (therein spoken of as "the lands to be taken"), being some 568 acres, and requiring pursuant to section 11 of the Ranges Act, 1891, that in the event of compensation not being agreed within fourteen days of the notice, the amount should be settled by arbitration and not by a reference to a jury.

The suppliant's claim in respect to the lands to be taken, comprised (a) compensation representing the value of the lands to be taken; and (b) compensation for damage for severance and depreciation and injurious affection of the lands of the suppliant adjoining the lands to be taken.

An arbitrator was duly appointed to determine the compensation. The arbitration was held, and on behalf of the suppliant evidence was given (inter alia) that his lands adjoining the lands to be taken would be injuriously affected by the exercise of the powers of the Acts, and in the course of the hearing it was agreed that the arbitrator should assess separately (1) the compensation payable in respect of the value of the lands to be taken; and (2) the compensation for the damage to be sustained by the suppliant by reason of his adjoining lands being injuriously affected by the exercise of the powers of the Act. The arbitrator did this, and he awarded £12 642 as compensation for the lands taken, and £5,000 for injurious affection of adjoining lands of the suppliant.

No question arose as to the £12,642, but the Crown contended that as the lands were taken for the defence of the realm under the Defence Acts, no claim could be sustained in law for any sum for injurious affection of the adjoining lands of the suppliant, and that therefore the £5,000 was not payable by the Crown.

Freeman, K.C., and William Wills, for the suppliant. — The only question on the award that the court has to decide is whether the suppliant is entitled to this £5,000 awarded in respect of the damage arising from the severance of the land and the depreciation of the adjoining lands and the injurious affection of it caused from the land acquired being used for the erection of a fort. We submit that the suppliant is entitled to this sum, as the Land Clauses Act, 1845, gives the basis for determining the reasonable definition of compensation, which would thus include indemnity and satisfaction. In Duke of Buccleuch v. Metropolitan Board of Works, L. R. 5 Ex. 221, 18 W. R. Dig. 85, A. L. Smith, L J., who delivered the judgment of the court, deals at p. 251 with the question of reasonable compensation for injurious affection, and there is no doubt here, as the residue of the suppliant's estate was to be sold for building purposes, that the firing of guns and the annoyance of a garrison and camp in the vicinity will seriously decrease his property in value. It is true that in the case of In re Lawes, (1847) 1 Ex. 441, a view contrary to the suppliant's claim was expressed, but there are two Irish cases—Reg. v. Abbott, [1897] 2 Ir. Rep. 362, and In re Nids Point Battery, [1903] 2 Ir. Rep. 192, which are directly in his favour, and we rely upon them, although they are not binding authorities on this court.

Sir R. Finlay, A.G., and Sutton, for the Crown.—The Irish cases do not bind this court, and the lands being acquired here under section 19 of the Defence Act, 1842, on public policy all that can be claimed is a fair price for the land actually acquired for the defence of the realm by the Crown. The basis of compensation under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, applies only to lands acquired for commercial undertakings or local improvements and the like, and the words of the Act of 1845 cannot be made applicable to the Defence Act of 1842, which, being passed for the very purpose of giving the Crown power to acquire land for the defence of the realm and for dealing with any such matters of urgent public importance, was purposely drawn up by the Legislature in narrower terms. Assuming that the residue of the estate has been decreased in value to the extent found by the arbitrator (which the Crown does not admit), for the reasons given the suppliant is not entitled to receive anything in respect of what would be "injurious affection" within the meaning of the Act of 1845.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 16.—RIDLEY, J., gave his considered judgment as follows: This is a petition of right in which the suppliant, Mr. Blundell, was tenant for life of an estate in the parish of Crosby, Lancashire, a portion of which had been purchased by the Secretary of State for War under the powers given by the Defence Acts, 1842 to 1873, the Ordnance Board Transfer Act, 1855, and the Ranges Act, 1891. The compensation to be paid for the portion so required by the Secretary of State was settled by arbitration; and on the 13th of August, 1903, the arbitrator made his award, by which he found that the amount of compensation to be paid for the absolute purchase of the land taken was £12,642, and that the amount of compensation for damages to be sustained by the suppliant by reason of other adjoining lands belonging to him being injuriously affected by the exercise of the powers of the said Acts was £5,000. No question was raised as to the amount so awarded for the purchase of the land; but it was contended as to the sum awarded for injurious affection of other adjoining lands that this was not payable when the land is taken under the Acts passed for the defence of the realm, although it would be payable if the land had been taken under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, and this sum would then have been properly awarded under that Act. By the 19th section of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 94 (being the Defence Act, 1842), provision is made for the case where parties do not agree on the sum of money offered as the consideration for the absolute purchase of the lands required or on the annual rent or sum offered for the hire thereof; and it is enacted that in such case a jury is "to find the compensation to be paid either for the absolute purchase of such lands, buildings, or other hereditaments or for the possession or use thereof as the case may be." There are in the same Act sections which deal with the proportion to be paid out of the compensation paid for the lands to any persons having an interest as lessees or tenants at will in the lands, and for the investment of the purchase-money by the Barons of the Court of Exchequer on behalf of any persons interested. The statute 23 & 24 Vict. c. 112 (1860) was also referred to on behalf of the suppliant, but I do not think that its provisions are of any assistance on the point now in question. By the Ranges Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 54), s. 11, it is provided that, "where any land is acquired either under the Defence Act, 1842, and the Acts amending the same, or for military purposes under any Act with which the Lands Clauses Acts are incorporated, the person or authority acquiring the land may require that the compensation to be paid for the land be settled by arbitration and not by reference to a jury, and thereupon the provisions of the Lands Clauses Acts with reference to arbitration shall, if not already applicable, apply for the purpose of settling the compensation." I think that these words do not, when properly considered, mean more than this—that the provisions for the notices, appointment of arbitrators, costs, delivery of award, and so forth which are contained in the Lands Clauses Act relating to arbitration shall have application to proceedings under the Defence Acts; and, indeed, it was scarcely argued that they have a signification large enough to extend the meaning of the words of the 19th section of the Defence Act, 1842. It should be mentioned that there had been a similar provision in the 4th section of the Barracks Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 25); but by the section just read from the Ranges Act, 1891, that section was repealed. The Lands Clauses Acts Amendment Act of 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 106) also gives, by section 7, to the Secretary for War the right to use powers given to promoters of undertakings by the Lands Clauses Act of 1845, but this section also must have a similar interpretation. There being, therefore, no statute aiding the words which have to be considered, the question is whether they do include, not only purchase-money of the lands taken, but injurious affection of other adjoining lands of the same proprietor. It was contended for the Crown that the Legislature has purposely made a difference between the compensation to be awarded under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, and that to be awarded under the Defence Acts, and that the former includes, while the latter does not include, damages for injurious affection, because in the former case the undertaking by and for which the land is taken, although for the benefit of the public, yet is not of so great public importance as the defence of the country; and the Attorney-General was able to point to some enactments such as the 33 Geo. 2, c. 11, which, in dealing with the acquisition of land for a gunpowder magazine at Purfleet, empowers commissioners to treat for the absolute purchase of the land, and is silent as to injurious affection; whereas, on the other hand, in the 3 Geo. 4, c. 126, which deals with the widening and improving of turnpike roads, the trustees are to purchase lands for that purpose and to treat and agree, not only for the purchase of the same, but also for the loss or damage that the owners may sustain. It might, indeed be that a person whose lands were taken from him for the purpose of national defence should be awarded compensation on a lower scale and on a different basis than that allowed to persons whose land is taken for the encouragement and development of traffic industry, and commerce. Yet I think that the distinction should be supported by some indication more precise than is to be found in the mere difference between these two examples of statutes. They were passed before the subject of compensation had been dealt with by the Lands Clauses Act and at periods when it was comparatively bare of legal decision, and when the difference between them is less likely to have been intentional. It was further put that the Defence Act, 1842, was passed before the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, but that since that time there have been several statutes passed relating to national defence by which the Lands Clauses Act might have been incorporated with the Defence Act, but was not. That is quite true, and it is an argument of some importance. Some reliance was also placed on the sections which provide for apportionment of the compensation and for investment of the same. But if compensation is to include a sum recovered for injurious affection, I do not quite see why that sum should not be dealt with along with the purchase-money.

But the real question seems to be whether, notwithstanding the absence of a section similar to section 63 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, the words of section 19 do or do not include damages as well as a mere purchase price. On the other side it was argued that "compensation" means an indemnity—a full satisfaction for the land taken, and that, if in the taking of that land other land is injuriously affected, that injurious affection must be included in the term. If such a claim were decided by agreement I think there is no doubt that no person would agree on the compensation due for his land to be taken without also adding to the actual purchase-money a claim in respect of the damages done by injurious affection of other land belonging to him; and it is fairly argued that the same elements must be included when a jury or an arbitrator has to assess the compensation. It is also to be remarked that section 63 of the Land Clauses Act does, in fact, treat such injurious affection as a part of the compensation to be given—for it enacts that "in assessing such compensation 'regard is to be had' not only to the value of the land but also to the damage," &c. And in the same section "compensation" is apparently used as equivalent to "purchase-money"—so that the damages to be given for injurious affection are treated as a matter to be included in the purchase-money. I am inclined myself to prefer this reasoning, although I am somewhat pressed with the consequence which seems to follow, that even without section 63 compensation under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, would have included damages for injurious affection. The matter, however, was dealt with by the Queen's Bench Division in Ireland in two cases. First in Rey. v. Abbott, [1897] 2 Ir. Rep., p. 362, there lands were taken under the Defence Acts and an arbitration was held before the defendant, who was an arbitrator appointed under the provisions of the Railways (Ireland) Act, 1851. The defendant held he had no jurisdiction to award compensation except for the actual taking of the lands, and the question was brought before the court on a mandamus to compel him to do so. It was held by the Court of Queen's Bench Division and the Court of Appeal that the arbitrator was not properly appointed, and, therefore, the proceedings were coram non judice; but in the court of first instance it was held by all the judges that the claimant was properly entitled to claim damages for injurious affection beyond the mere purchase-money. O'Brien, J., in particular, discusses the subject at length, and comes to the conclusion that compensation ought to be held to be of the same kind under the two Acts, and that the section of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, is to be taken rather as a legislative exposition of what was meant by compensation, and not as granting a new right. In the Court of Appeal it was held that the arbitrator was not properly appointed, and it was unnecessary to decide the present point, but Walker L.J., said: "What evidence, as to compensation, a legally constituted tribunal should receive is not before us; but it has been carefully considered by the judges of the Queen's Bench Division, and I do not desire to be understood as holding out any hope that any considered conclusion of mine would be different from theirs." The other case is In re Nids Point Battery, [1903] 2 Ir. Rep. 192. And in that case the Court of Queen's Bench Division followed and adopted the same view. The Attorney-General contended that I am not bound by these decisions—but they are entitled to the greatest respect; and, so far from dissenting from them, I am inclined to take the same view.

My judgment must therefore be for the suppliant.

I understand that the sum of £12,642 has already been paid over to him, and I therefore enter judgment for the suppliant for £5,000 with costs.

Solicitors for the suppliant, Guscotte, Wadham, & Co.

Solicitor for the Crown, The Solicitor to the Treasury.

C. C. R.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Lawrance, Kennedy, Ridley, and Channell, JJ.) Nov. 18.

REX v. BRIDGEWATER. (a.)

Criminal law—Evidence—Cross-examination of prisoner—Questions as to previous convictions—Criminal Law Evidence Amendment Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 36), s. 1 (f).

A prisoner was tried on the charge of stealing copper. His defence was that he was acting under the direction of the police, and his counsel asked a detective, who was one of the witnesses for the prosecution, whether he had not, in other cases, employed the prisoner as a police spy. The prisoner was called as a witness, and was asked as to whether he had been previously convicted. He answered in the affirmative, but a further question as to what the conviction was for was not pressed. The prisoner was found guilty.

Held, that the conviction was bad, as the nature and conduct of the defence was not such as to involve imputations on the character of the witnesses for the prosecution, and therefore, as provided by section 1 (f) of the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, no questions could be put to the prisoner tending to show that he had been convicted of a previous offence.

Case stated by the learned Recorder of Birmingham on the trial before him, at Birmingham Quarter Sessions, on the 31st of October, of Charles James Woolf, John Bridgwater, and Annie Bridgwater, on a charge of stealing seventeen yards of copper tape, the property of Statter & Co., on the 11th of October. A count for receiving in the usual form was added to the indictment. The prisoner Woolf pleaded "Guilty," and during the progress of the case the learned recorder directed the jury to find Annie Bridgwater "Not guilty" on the ground that she was acting under the direct coercion of her husband.

The facts of the case were shortly as follows:

When John Bridgwater and his wife, Annie Bridgwater, were charged at the police-station with having the copper tape in their possession, well knowing it to have been stolen, John Bridgwater stated, in reply to the charge that he was working under instructions from Sergeant Moss. Evidence was given for the prosecution by Sergeant Moss, who stated that he had no connection with John Bridgwater in respect of any robbery from Statter & Co., and he had not the faintest idea that there had been any such robbery. In cross-examination Moss said that he had given instructions to John Bridgwater that, if anyone asked him to buy any metal he thought doubtful, not to buy it, but to let him (the sergeant) know, his object being to catch the thieves. The sergeant, in further cross-examination, said that John Bridgwater had given him information, but never information that led to the arrest of anyone, and he had been with Bridgwater in public-houses, standing him drinks, because he could give witness information; but the witness denied that John Bridgwater had ever sold any silver to a certain person on his (witness's) advice, and that he had ever received half-a-sovereign from John Bridgwater. The prisoner John Bridgwater gave evidence for the defence. He stated that he considered that he was acting under the instructions of Moss; that a man had been arrested on information given by him to Moss and sentenced to two months. In cross-examination he was asked whether he had ever been previously convicted, and he replied in the affirmative. Counsel for the prosecution was then proceeding to ask what the conviction was for, when counsel for the defence objected on the ground that the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, s. 1 (f), was prohibitive, and that, independently of any objection by counsel, no such question could be asked unless there was justification for it as provided by the section.

The learned recorder said that objection ought to have been taken to the question as to the previous conviction before the witness had answered it, and he considered that John Bridwater's statement at the police-station, in answer to the charge, involved imputations on the character of Moss, and that the nature and conduct of the defence before the court was such as to involve imputations on Moss. The learned recorder having decided that the case must proceed, the further question was not pressed. In summing up he directed the jury that if they thought that the prisoner was, in point of fact, acting under the directions of Moss or had reasonable grounds for believing that he was acting under the directions of Moss, they should acquit him, but if they thought he was making an independent deal for himself, they should find him guilty. The jury retured a verdict of guilty, and the learned recorder stated the present case on the application of the prisoner's counsel, who cited to him Charnock v. Merchant, 48 W. R. 334, [1900] 1 Q. B. 474, and Rex v. Rouse, 52 W. R. 236, [1904] 1 K. B. 184. Judgment was postponed, and the prisoner remanded to prison.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether in the circumstances of the case counsel for the prosecution was entitled to put to the prisoner the questions above referred to.

No counsel appeared on either side.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I am of opinion that the objection which has been taken to this conviction must prevail. We have to consider whether the circumstances were such as to justify the putting of the questions as to previous convictions. The section provides that "A person charged and called as a witness in pursuance of this Act shall not be asked, and if asked shall not be required to answer, any question tending to show that he has committed or been convicted of or been charged with any offence other than that wherewith he is then charged, unless . . . the nature or conduct of the defence is such as to involve imputations on the character of the prosecutor or the witnesses for the prosecution." I desire to repeat what I said in Rex v. Rouse that raising a defence was not of necessity or of itself casting imputations on the character of the prosecutor or the witnesses for the prosecution. In the present case I do not think the prisoner was doing more than raising a defence, and the recorder himself showed by his direction to the jury that he dealt with the case on that view, that if the prisoner was acting, or believed he was acting under the influence of Moss, he should be acquitted. I do not think that the prisoner's counsel in his cross-examination of Moss was doing more than developing the defence raised, and trying to support it by obtaining an admission from Moss, and was not seeking to cast an imputation on Moss. If the cross-examination of Moss had been aimed at showing that he had been guilty of any misconduct independently of the defence in its development then no doubt the prosecution would have been entitled to question the prisoner as to his previous conviction. In the present case the first question, "Have you been convicted of any offence?" was answered by the prisoner without any objection on the part of his counsel. It was only to the later question as to what the offence was of which the prisoner had been convicted that objection was taken. It must not be thought that where counsel allows such a question to be answered without objection he can as a matter of course rely on the fact that the question has been answered as a ground for having the conviction quashed. That would a most dangerous doctrine to lay down. If the recorder had told the jury to disregard the answer the court would not have interfered in this case; but as he did not adopt that course, the jury must be taken to have supposed that the question was justified on the ground that the nature of and conduct of the defence was such as to involve imputation on the character of a witness for the prosecution. As there is no ground for that suggestion I am of opinion that this conviction should be quashed.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

LAWRANCE, KENNEDY, RIDLEY, and CHANNELL, JJ., concurred.

Conviction quashed.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

K. B. Div.
(Bigham and Darling, JJ.) April 3.

In re KEET.

Ex parte THE OFFICIAL RECEIVER. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Annulment of adjudication—Payment of debts in full—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 35.

Where a bankrupt has obtained from his creditors an absolute release of all his debts, the court may, in its discretion, order the annulment of his adjudication, upon the ground that all his debts are paid in full.

In re Burnett, Ex parte The Official Receiver, 42 W. R. 368, differed from.

Appeal from an order made by the registrar of the county court at Leeds annulling the bankrupt's adjudication.

The bankrupt had traded as an outside stockbroker, and a receiving order was made against him on a creditor's petition upon the 24th of September, 1903. He was adjudicated bankrupt, and an order for the summary administration of his estate was made upon the 1st of October, 1903. His debts amounted to about £9,700, and his assets were estimated to produce £189, but realized somewhat less. One dividend of about 2s. in the £ was paid to the creditors.

In September, 1904, he paid private creditors to the total amount of £41 in full and induced his trade creditors to the amount of £9,630 to execute an absolute release of their claims against him.

On the 28th of September, 1904, he applied to the registrar at Leeds for the annulment of his adjudication on the ground that his debts were paid in full. The registrar made an order annulling the adjudication, against which the official receiver appealed.

S. G. Lushington, for the official receiver.—Section 35, sub-section 1, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, provides that "where it is proved to the satisfaction of the court that the debts of the bankrupt are paid in full the court may, on the application of any person interested, by order, annul the adjudication." It was held by the Divisional Court in In re Burnett, Ex parte The Official Receiver, 42 W. R. 368, that a mere payment of a small composition to the creditors in consideration of which they release their claims is not payment of the debts in full within the meaning of section 35, and that under such circumstances a bankrupt is not entitled to have his adjudication annulled. In the present case no consideration at all was given for the release.

Carrington, for the bankrupt.—In the case of In re Izod, Ex parte The Official Receiver, 46 W. R. 304, [1898] 1 Q. B. 241, the Court of Appeal allowed the rescission of a receiving order, which stands on the same footing as the annulment of an adjudication, where a composition of 10s. in the £1 had been paid and the creditors had released their claims and withdrawn their proofs. An absolute release is equivalent to payment in full.

Goodheart, for the petitioning creditor, supported the order of the registrar.

S. G. Lushington replied.

BIGHAM, J.—I think that the registrar was right. Under section 35, when it is proved to the satisfaction of the court that the debts of the bankrupt are paid in full, the court may annul the adjudication. I think that the expression "debts of the bankrupt" refers to debts which have been proved. Then comes the question whether they have been paid in full. I think in this case they are paid in full, or that that which is equivalent to payment has been done. I do not think that payment need be in coin, it may be in what the creditor honestly agrees to take in satisfaction of his debt. Here the creditors desire to release the debts; that, in my opinion, is equivalent to payment in full, and the court is entitled to annul the adjudication. It does not follow that the court must annul the adjudication; it may look into the circumstances, and may see what has been done has been done honestly, and may say whether it is in the interests of justice that the bankrupt should remain a bankrupt.

In this case, however, I see no reason to suppose that what has been done has not been honestly done, or that the bankrupt has done what would disentitle him to the exercise of the discretion of the court in his favour.

DARLING, J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed; leave to appeal refused.

Solicitor for the appellant, The Solicitor to the Board of Trade.

Solicitors for the repondents, Vincent & Vincent, for North & Son, Leeds.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) March 24.

GIBBON v. PEASE. (a.)

Architect—Employment—General retainer—Work completed and remuneration paid—Right of employer to have the plans and specifications.

An architect, who has under a general retainer prepared plans and specifications, is not entitled to keep the plans on being paid his agreed fee, which then become the property of the building owner.

Ebdy v. M'Gowan, 2 Hudson on Building Contracts, 7, followed and approved.

This was an appeal by the defendant, an architect and surveyor, from a decision of Ridley, J., who tried the action without a jury.

The plaintiff sought a declaration that certain plans and specifications which had been prepared by the defendant were his property, the work having been completed and the agreed remuneration paid the defendant. As a defence to the action the defendant desired to call evidence to prove that a custom or usage existed among architects to retain their plans.

Ridley, J., refused to permit evidence of this alleged custom to be given, and on the authority of Ebdy v. M'Gowan, 2 Hudson on Building Contracts, 7, entered judgment for the plaintiff.

The facts were, shortly, that the plaintiff, Mr. Henry Gibbon, owned some houses in Queen's-road, Bayswater, which he proposed to alter into shops, with residential flats over. He placed the matter in the hands of the defendant, Mr. Edward Pease, an architect carrying on business in Clifford's-inn, and a member of the Royal Institute of British Architects. The defendant prepared the necessary plans and specifications, and the work was carried out and completed by June, 1903. The plaintiff, having paid the defendant the agreed remuneration, which was 5 per cent. on the contract price of the work, claimed possession of the plans and specifications. The defendant declined to give them up, and the action was brought. It was stated that the Institute of British Architects were anxious that the question should be fought as a test case.

Montague Shearman, K.C., Kemp, K.C., and Morle, for the defendant.—The contract here is not one to prepare and sell plans, but a contract for work and labour. There are many practical reasons why an architect should refuse to part with plans, which, if gone into, would show that the custom that undoubtedly exists and is recognized among architects to retain their plans and specifications is reasonable. The action was decided without any evidence having been given on this point by one side or the other, the learned judge ruling that Ebdy v. M'Gowan applied, and on that authority he entered judgment for the plaintiff. We submit that the learned judge was wrong in declining to hear evidence as to custom, and that if the defendant is not entitled to judgment he is at any rate entitled to a new trial.

Danckwerts, K.C., and H. Gatehouse, for the respondent, were not heard.

COLLINS, M.R.—In my opinion this case is clearly governed by the principle laid down in Ebdy v. M'Gowan. It is not disputed that the defendant was employed to supervise work which necessitated his preparing certain plans and getting out specifications, or that the plans were prepared and used for the purpose of carrying out the building operations, or that the defendant was to receive a remuneration of 5 per cent. on the contract price. The agreed fee having been paid when the work was completed, the building owner claimed possession of the plans. The architect refused to give them up. It was contended as a defence to the claim that there was a custom or usage in the profession that entitled an architect to keep his plans. The matter was tried before Ridley, J., who at once referred to Ebdy v. M'Gowan. Kemp, K.C., who then led for the defendant, submitted that case did not govern this case, but the learned judge held that if the alleged custom existed it was not a custom which could bind the parties. I am not sure that the learned judge was satisfied as to the existence of the custom; but, at any rate, he held, on the authority of Ebdy v. M'Gowan, that it was so unreasonable that the court would not give effect to it even if it were proved. The principle on which Mr. Shearman rested the right of the defendant to keep the plans was that the architect's contract was not a contract for the sale of a chattel, but for work and services rendered; and that the contract was performed when he had superintended the building of the houses. That was the principle involved in Ebdy v. M'Gowan. In that case the plaintiff was an architect who had been employed by the defendant to prepare plans and get tenders for a vicarage. The payment was to be 5 per cent. on money expended, if the vicarage was completed; if tenders were obtained and work not commenced, 3 per cent. on the estimated cost; if no invitation for tenders issued 2½ per cent. The plans were prepared, but the defendant changed his mind and declined to proceed and wrote to the plaintiff offering to pay and asking for the plans. The architect declined to give up the plans but sued for payment, and set up this alleged custom among architects to retain their plans if the work was not proceeded with. It was held by the Court of Exchequer that such custom, even if proved, would be unreasonable, and that the defendant need not pay for the plans unless he got them. In my opinion, a custom which transferred the property in a chattel from the person who paid for it to the person who was paid must be held bad. If the custom had been justified in that case it must have been justified on the same contention as that on which it is sought to justify it here. If the custom was bad in the one case it must be equally bad in the other. In the present case the architect has under his contract done everything he was expected to do, and he has been paid all he was entitled to receive. It is clear, therefore, that the plans are the property of the building owner. I think the contract was one to make a chattel the property in which passed to the employer, who has paid the architect for it.

In my opinion, Ridley, J., was right in doing what he did, and that the case of Ebdy v. M'Gowan is perfectly good law, and ought to be followed by us. The appeal therefore fails.

MATHEW, L.J., gave judgment to the same effect.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. The proposition that an architect is entitled to retain the plans cannot possibly be maintained. If he were so entitled, how would the building owner know whether the drains, sewers, and flues were properly made? Suppose they required to be repaired, is he to be bound, in order to obtain the requisite information as to where they are placed, to make a fresh contract with the architect? Mr. Shearman had to admit that there would be some sort of an obligation on the architect for the safe custody of the plans, and that admission seems to me to put another great difficulty in the defendant's way. In my opinion, the case is analogous to that of a solicitor who has prepared a conveyance for a client and who has been paid for so doing. In Ex parte Horsfall, 7 B. & C. 528, it was laid down that the draft conveyance as well as the deed belonged to the client.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In my opinion the point involved in this case is covered by the decision in Ebdy v. M'Gowan, and that we are bound to follow the ruling in that case and dismiss this appeal with costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Gibbon & Moore.

Solicitors for the defendant, C. Robertson & Co.

From Chan. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Vaughan Williams and Stirling, L.JJ.) March 22.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. METROPOLITAN ELECTRIC SUPPLY CO. (LIMITED) (No. 2). (a.)

Electric lighting company—Supply of electric current or electrical energy outside statutory area — Statute — Contravening statutory prohibition—Interpretation—Metropolitan Electric Lighting Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. cxcvi.), ss. 3, 5—Metropolitan Electric Supply Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. ccxxxv.), ss. 2, 16.

A limited liability company authorized by statute to supply electrical energy within certain areas, and also authorized by statute to set up a station for generating electric current and electrical energy at a place outside their areas of supply, and from that generating station to supply those areas with electric current and electrical energy, is not authorized under the statutory powers aforesaid to supply electric current or electrical energy to customers outside their statutory areas of supply.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Farwell, J. (reported in full, ante, p. 198).

The action was brought by the Attorney-General to restrain the defendants from supplying electrical energy or electric current from a generating station outside their statutory areas of supply to customers outside those areas.

The question turned on the interpetation of two Acts of Parliament, of which the material provisions are as follows: "The undertakers for the purpose of this Act are the Metropolitan Electric Supply Co. (Limited), being a company registered under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886, with limited liability. . . . The undertakers shall not purchase or acquire the undertaking of or associate themselves with any other company or person supplying energy under any licence, Provisional Order, or special Act within the administrative county of London unless the undertakers are authorized by Parliament to do so."

"The undertakers shall not at any time after the passing of this Act supply energy or (except for the purposes of this Act) erect or lay down any electric lines or works beyond the area of supply or otherwise than under the authority of Parliament or under a licence granted by the Board of Trade under the principal Act: Provided that where the undertakers were on the . . . supplying or under any binding agreement to supply energy to any premises beyond the area of supply they may continue to supply or supply energy until . . . and ninety or in case any such notice as hereinafter described . . . or may be mentioned in such notice": The Metropolitan Electric Lighting Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. cxcvi.), ss. 3, 5.

"It shall be lawful for the company to hold and use as a station for generating electric current or electrical energy certain lands recently acquired by them in the parishes of Willesden and Acton and county of Middlesex or some part thereof . . . and to establish and work on those lands plant for generating electrical energy and for other purposes incidental to or connected with their undertaking or business."

"It shall be lawful for the company to use any of their cables or wires and any mains or cables connected therewith for the transmission of electric current or electrical energy from their works on the said lands at Willesden and Acton to the several distributing stations of the company in their Paddington Marylebone and Mid-London areas defined by the several provisional orders hereinbefore mentioned . . . and to use the generating station on the said lands for the purpose of supplying electric current or electrical energy within the several areas or districts over which the company have now powers of supply or over which they may hereafter have such powers under any special Act or Provisional Order": The Metropolitan Electric Supply Co. Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. ccxxxv.), ss. 2, 16.

Farwell, J., held that the defendants were supplying electric current and electrical energy outside their statutory areas in direct contravention of the Act of 1889, and granted the injunction asked.

The defendants appealed.

Cripps, K.C., Jenkins, K.C., and Sargant, for the appellants. — The defendants are not supplying electricity as "undertakers" under the Acts or orders, but by virtue of their rights under their memorandum of association; the exercise of those rights is not prohibited by the Acts. The negative words of section 5 of the Act of 1889 must be construed as meaning that the defendants "shall not use any of the powers given to them as undertakers." The enabling words of section 16 of the Act of 1898 should be enlarged by adding words giving the defendants power to supply electric current or electrical energy wherever as a limited company they may desire to exercise the power.

Upjohn, K.C., and J. W. Greig, for the respondents, were not called upon.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—Farwell, J.'s, judgment is correct. I agree with it because general legislation in regard to electricity must be considered in interpreting these Electrical Supply Acts. The defendants argued that what they did was not done by virtue of any power conferred on them by statute or order of the Board of Trade; and that, being a limited company, the powers they have under their memorandum of association may be exercised by them, notwithstanding the provisions of the Acts of 1889 and 1898. That argument is not acceptable to me. I can give no other construction to section 5 of the Metropolitan Electric Lighting Act, 1889, than that given by Farwell, J. I also agree with him that the intention of the Act was to apply to the metropolis a scheme of electric lighting which was admittedly the best. The outlying areas cannot be disregarded. The words in the fifth section of the Act of 1889 must be taken in their natural sense; the same terms of prohibition are contained in many, if not all, of the Board of Trade orders made under the Act. On the face of it section 5 means that the defendants are not to supply electricity except in their specified areas unless authorized by Parliament or under licence granted by the Board of Trade. The word "undertakers" cannot, except by a very strained construction, be limited to the persons exercising powers within the district; it can only mean the persons who were named in the Act. As Farwell, J., has pointed out, the proviso which follows section 5 would not have been necessary had the suggested construction been right: the proviso would never have been inserted if the undertakers were to be free to supply energy beyond their areas of supply by virtue of some rights or powers of their own. I can well understand the Legislature thinking that when there were a number of districts, containing their own generating stations, it was not desirable that the companies should set up a non-statutory trade with customers outside their own areas. I think, for all the reasons advanced by Farwell, J., that the defendants have got statutory rights of supply upon the condition that they are not to supply electric energy or electrical current outside their areas. There is nothing in the Act of 1898 which impliedly negatives the provisions of section 5 of the Act of 1889.

(a.) Reported by HENRY STEPHEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. I cannot insert into section 5 the words "within the Administrative County of London."

STIRLING, L.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Barlow & Barlow.

Solicitor for the respondents, W. G. Greig.

From P. D. & Ad. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — March 10, 14.

"THE LONDON." (a.)

Practice—Admiralty—Collision—One vessel held alone to blame—Appeal only on the ground that both vessels were in default—Costs of appeal.

Where in the Admiralty Division one of the vessels was held alone to blame for a collision, and there is an appeal by the owners of that vessel solely on the ground that both vessels should have been found in default, and the appeal is allowed, the appellants are entitled to the costs of the appeal.

The Lebanon v. The Ceto, 14 App. Cas. 670, 38 W. R. Dig. 187, followed.

This was an appeal by the owners of the Hull steam trawler The Anson from a decision of the late President (then Sir F. Jeune) pronouncing their vessel alone to blame for a collision in the North Sea on the 5th of June, 1904, with the Danish steamship The London.

The appellants admitted that The Anson was in default in not having kept her foghorn continuously going, but they contended that The London ought also to be condemned for excessive speed in the fog which prevailed at the time of the collision.

By their notice of appeal the appellants asked that the judgment of the President might be varied, and that it might be adjudged that the collision was occasioned by the fault or default of the owners, master, and crew of The London, as well as the owners, master, and crew of The Anson, and that the damage should be borne equally by the owners of The Anson and the owners of The London.

THE COURT being of opinion that The London as well as The Anson must be held to blame, allowed the appeal.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Aspinall, K.C. (Lauriston Batten with him), for the appellants, asked for the costs of the appeal. It was the practice in the Admiralty Division that where both parties were found to blame to make no order as to costs. When in circumstances such as the present the Court of Appeal allowed an appeal on the only issue raised, although the practice was not settled, there was authority for saying that the appellants were entitled to the costs of the appeal. In The Hector, 31 W. R. 881, 8 P. D. 218, the Court of Appeal, following the practice of the Privy Council, held that where a collision had occurred between two vessels through the bad navigation of each of them the owners of the ships were not entitled to the costs of any litigation arising out of the collision. More recently the ordinary rule that costs followed the result had been emphasized and followed; that was the course followed in The Batavier, 38 W. R. 522, 15 P. D. 37; The General Gordon, 6 Aspinall's Maritime Cases 533; and was referred to in Williams and Bruce's Admiralty Practice (3rd ed.), p. 550.

Balloch (Robson, K.C., with him), for the respondents.—The practice has been that where both vessels have been held to blame there ought to be no order for costs. That rule was laid down by the Privy Council, and was expressly approved and followed in the case of The Hector.

He referred to Marsden on Collisions at Sea (5th ed.), p. 310; The Beryl, 32 W. R. 648, 9 P. D. 137; and to The Arratoon Apcar, 38 W. R. 481, 15 App. Cas. 37.

THE COURT on this point reserved judgment, intimating that they desired to look into the authorities cited, and to consult with the other members of the court before giving their decision.

March 14.—COLLINS, M.R., in giving judgment, said: In this case we postponed judgment on a matter of costs in order to look into the authorities. Almost immediately after we had left the court Mr. Aspinall, after consultation with Mr. Balloch, was kind enough to call our attention to a case which absolutely decides the point—a case in the House of Lords called The Owners of The Lebanon v. The Owners of The Ceto, 38 W. R. Dig. 187, 14 App. Cas. 670. There the President, Sir James Hannen, had found that The Lebanon was alone to blame in an action in the Admiralty Division. The owners of The Lebanon appealed against that decision, admitting that The Lebanon was to blame. That is precisely what happened in this case. The Court of Appeal affirmed the decision of the President; and then there was an appeal to the House of Lords. There was a difference of opinion on the merits of the case, but the result was that the judgment of the Court of Appeal upholding the judgment of the President was reversed. The judgment of the House of Lords was as follows: "Judgments appealed from reversed. Declared that both The Lebanon and The Ceto were in fault. Respondents to pay to appellants their costs in the Court of Appeal and in this House." That is precisely what has happened in this case, and there is nothing more to be said in the matter. Mr. Aspinall is entitled to the costs of the appeal, and there will be no order as to costs in the court below.

MATHEW, L.J.—I agree.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—So do I.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Pritchard & Sons, for A. M. Jackson & Co., Hull.

Solicitors for the defendant, Thomas Cooper & Co.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Feb. 22, 23.

WADE & SONS CO. (LIMITED) v. COCKERLINE & CO. (a.)

Ship—Charter-party—Construction—Exceptions—Accident caused by servants' negligence—Liability of ship-owners.

In the construction of a contract the maxim expressio unius exclusio alterius is not applicable where the expression is found only in one and not in the other clauses of the same contract. There is no exception in the case of contracts of charter-party.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Kennedy, J.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs, who were timber merchants, to recover damages from the defendants, who were shipowners, for breach of charter-party which contained these provisions: "Is is agreed between . . . the owners of the good steamship . . . now on passage . . . and . . . charterers: 1. That the said steamship being tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, shall with all convenient speed . . . and there load, always afloat, from the agents of the said charterers, a full and complete cargo of . . . boards . . . The steamer to be provided with a deck load at full freight at charterers' risk, not exceeding above what she can reasonably store and carry . . . and being so loaded shall therewith proceed to . . . and deliver the same." "7. The act of God, the Queen's enemies, restraints of princes and rulers, and perils of the sea excepted. Also fire . . . strandings and accidents of navigation, or latent defects in, or accidents to, hull, and (or) machinery, and (or) boilers, always excepted, even when occasioned by the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the . . . or other persons employed by the shipowner, or for whose acts he is responsible, not resulting, however, in any case from want of due diligence by the owner of the ship, or by the ship's husband or manager." It appeared that, while the vessel was anchored and loading, some of the timber pressed, through the stevedores' want of due care, so heavily on the uprights, placed against the stanchions to keep the timber in position, that the stanchions gave way and part of the timber was lost; and the question for determination was whether, in the circumstances, the owners were protected by the exception in clause 7 or whether the loss was due to the vessel's unseaworthiness. Kennedy, J., held that the loss was not attributable to unseaworthiness, and that if properly stowed all the timber could safely have been carried, but he found as a fact that the loss was caused by the carelessness of the stevedores, and gave judgment for the defendants, who would have been liable but for the exceptions in clause 7.

The plaintiffs appealed.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and Holman Gregory, for the appellants.—The exceptions in clause 7 do not relieve the shipowner from liability in respect of deck cargo. The maxim of construction expressio unius exclusio alterius is applicable. "Deck" cargo is specifically mentioned in clause 1, and is not referred to in clause 7.

Carver, K.C., and A. J. Ashton, for the respondents.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—A rule of construction based on the maxim expressio unius exclusio alterius is only applicable when the expressio unius is found in all the clauses of the same contract. There can be no expressio unius when the expression occurs only in one clause. There is no authority for the proposition that such a rule exists in the case of contracts of charter-party. The facts of this case are as found by Kennedy, J., with whose judgment I agree. A warranty of the ship's seaworthiness is always presumed. If there is unseaworthiness, the shipowner is not relieved from his responsibility because a charter-party contains a clause such as clause 7. There is no breach of this presumptive warranty proved in this case; and the warranty was of the fitness of the ship while in port and waiting to load and while at sea, the shipowner's obligations thereunder varying at different stages. This ship was fit to receive cargo, and the accident occurred while it was being received. The judgment below must be affirmed.

ROMER, L.J.—Clause 7 applies to deck cargo as well as other cargo.

STIRLING, L.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Trinder, Capron, & Co.; Pritchard & Sons, for Hearfield & Lambert, Hull.

(a.) Reported by HENRY STEPHEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

From K. B. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Jan. 13, 14, 16, 17; Feb. 6.

BOSTON FRUIT CO. v. BRITISH AND FOREIGN MARINE INSURANCE CO. (a.)

Insurance—Shipping—Charterers—Right of charterers to sue on policy—Charterers not mentioned in policy—Intention—Construction of charter-party.

Though the words of a policy are wide enough to cover all parties interested in the ship insured, yet to give third parties the benefit of the policy there must be evidence of intention on the part of the person executing the policy to give the third party the benefit of its terms. And when the sole evidence of such intention is to be inferred from the terms of the charter-party, a clause in the charter-party that the owners shall pay for the insurance of the vessel does not constitute an obligation on or authority to the owners to insure on behalf of the charterers, so as to enable the charterers to avail themselves of the wide terms of the policy of insurance.

This was an appeal from a decision of Bigham, J.

The facts are set out at length in the judgment of Vaughan Williams, L.J., but may be shortly stated here. The action was by charterers against insurers, and the question was whether the charterers were entitled to sue on a policy of insurance on the steamship Barnstaple. The policy was a time policy from the 21st of March, 1895, to the 20th of March, 1896. It was a valued policy on "hull and material, £12,000; engines and machinery, £7,000: £19,000." Collision and other clauses were attached. The policy was effected on the instructions of Messrs. Craggs & Sons by John Holman & Sons, "as well in their own name as for and in the name and names of all and every other person or persons to whom the subject-matter of this policy does, may, or shall appertain in part or in all." The name of the plaintiffs did not appear in the policy.

By a charter-party dated the 10th of March, 1894, and made between Messrs. Craggs & Sons, described therein as agents for the owners, and the plaintiffs, the plaintiffs chartered The Barnstaple, which was then being built by Messrs. Craggs & Sons, for thirty-six calendar months from March, 1893. The charter-party amounted to a demise of The Barnstaple.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister at-Law.

On the 13th of January, 1896, The Barnstaple came into collision with The Fortuna, and The Fortuna was sunk. The collision was caused by the negligence of the master and crew of The Barnstaple.

On the 15th of January, 1896, the owners of The Fortuna instituted proceedings against The Barnstaple in the district court in the United States of America for the district of Massachusetts, claiming damages in respect of the collision. On the petition of the owners of The Barnstaple, the Boston Fruit Co., as charterers of The Barnstaple, were made parties to the suit. At the hearing in the district court, the liability of The Barnstaple were admitted, and damages agreed at 14,574 dols., and the suit thenceforward proceeded as an independent cause between the present plaintiffs, the Boston Fruit Co., and the owners of The Barnstaple, to determine which as between them was the party liable to pay the said damages. This suit, after going through the Circuit Court of Appeals and the Supreme Court of the United States of America, was ultimately decided in favour of the owners. The Boston Fruit Co., having paid the whole damages to the owners of The Fortuna, in accordance with the result of the suit, now sued the underwriters for their proportion of the sum so paid as a loss under the policy of insurance.

Bigham, J., dismissed the action.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Carver, K.C., and Llewelyn Davies, for the plaintiffs.—This insurance was taken out by Craggs on behalf of the plaintiffs, at least in part. If clauses 17 and 22 of the charter-party be read in conjunction it is plain that there was a contract, or at any rate a duty upon Craggs, to insure. If the policy is in such a form as to fulfil the obligation, it must be held to be for the benefit of the plaintiffs. It is immaterial that the agent may not know for whom he is acting. The general principle is laid down in Arnould on Marine Insurance (7th ed.), pp. 212, 214, ss. 172, 173; Crowley v. Cohen, 3 B. & Ad. 478; Routh v. Thompson, 11 East 428, 13 East 274; Lucena v. Crawfurd, 2 Bos. & P. (N. R.) 269; Grant v. Hill, 4 Taunt. 380; Irving v. Richardson, 2 B. & Ad. 193; Watson v. Swann, 11 C. B. N. S. 756, 10 W. R. Dig. 46; Small v. United Kingdom Marine Mutual Insurance Association, 46 W. R. 24, [1897] 2 Q. B. 311. A man may ratify what purported to be made in his favour. If there is actual authority the undisclosed principal can sue, although the other party knew nothing about about him: Keighley, Maxsted, & Co. v. Durant, [1901] A. C. 240, 49 W. R. Dig. 41; Hill v. Scott, [1895] 2 Q. B. 713, 44 W. R. Dig. 25; Scott v. Globe Marine Insurance Co., 1 Com. Cas. 370; Byas v. Miller, 3 Com. Cas. 39.

Scrutton, K.C., J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and Maurice Hill, for the defendants.—However wide words may be found in a policy, it will not extend to those who are not parties unless it is shown that that was the intention: Watson v. Swann. All the substantial interests in this ship were in the owner, and there was no duty to insure on behalf of the charterer: Aira Force Steamship Co. v. Christie & Co., 9 Times L. R. 140, where the charter-party contained a clause which was practically the same as clause 22 in the present case. To enable a person to recover, his interest must be proved, and an authority from him to insure, or his adoption of the contract: Duer's Marine Insurance, vol. 2, p. 37; Pollock on Contracts (7th ed.), p. 98; Hagedorn v. Oliverson, 2 M. & S. 485. In any case the ratification of the contract must be within a reasonable time.

Carver, K.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 6.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is an action on a policy of insurance on the steamship Barnstaple, dated the 5th of April, 1895. The policy is a valued policy on "hull and material, £12,000; engines and machinery, £7,000—£19,000." Collision and other clauses are attached. The policy was a time policy, from the 21st of March, 1895, to the 20th of March, 1896. The action is by charterers against underwriters, and the question is whether the charterers are entitled to sue on this policy. The policy was effected by Messrs. John Holman & Sons on the instructions of Messrs. Craggs & Sons, described in the charter-party as "agents for the owners." On the 13th of January, 1896, The Barnstaple came into collision with The Fortuna and The Fortuna was sunk. The collision was caused by the negligence of the master and crew The Barnstaple. The plaintiffs were charterers of The Barnstaple. By a charter-party dated the 10th of March, 1894, and made between R. Craggs & Sons, described therein as agents for the owners, and the plaintiffs, the plaintiffs chartered The Barnstaple, which was then being built by Messrs. Craggs & Sons, for thirty-six calendar months from March, 1893. The charter-party amounted to a demise of The Barnstaple. The Barnstaple at the time of the collision was employed by the plaintiffs under the charter-party. On the 15th of January, 1896, the owners of The Fortuna instituted a suit against The Barnstaple, in the district court in the United States of America for the district of Massachusetts, claiming damages in respect of the collision. On the petition of the owners of The Barnstaple the Boston Fruit Co., as charterers of The Barnstaple, were made parties to the suit. At the hearing in the district court the liability of The Barnstaple was admitted, and damages agreed at 14,575 dols., and the suit thenceforward proceeded as an independent cause between the new plaintiffs, the Boston Fruit Co., and the owners of The Barnstaple to determine which, as between them, was the party liable to pay the said damages. This suit, after going through the Circuit Court of Appeals and the Supreme Court of the United States of America, was ultimately decided in favour of the owners. The Boston Fruit Co., having paid the whole damages to the owners of The Fortuna in accordance with the result of the suit now demand from the underwriters sued their proportion of the sum so paid as a loss under the policy of insurance. Now, the policy was effected by John Holman & Sons, "as well in their own name as for and in the name and names of all and every other person or persons to whom the subject-matter of this policy does, may, or shall appertain in part or in all." John Holman & Sons, as appears from the agreed facts, effected this policy on the instructions of R. Craggs & Sons—viz., as insurance brokers. The name of the Boston Fruit Co., the plaintiffs, nowhere appears on the policy, and it follows that to entitle the plaintiffs to sue on this policy, which was not made by the plaintiffs themselves, they must show either that it was made on their behalf by John Holman & Sons, authorized to act for them, or whose act has been subsequently ratified and adopted by them. It is not suggested that the Boston Fruit Co. had any direct communication with the brokers, John Holman & Sons; the suggestion is that R. Craggs & Sons either instructed Holman on behalf of the Boston Fruit Co., being authorized so to do by necessary implication arising from the terms of the charter-party, or that even if Craggs & Sons did not effect the policy on the authority of the Boston Fruit Co., yet the terms of the policy are sufficient to describe the Boston Fruit Co. and cover their interest in the ship, and that the Boston Fruit Co. have ratified and adopted the agency thus assumed on their behalf. Bigham, J., who gave judgment in favour of the defendants, says in his judgment: "Now, before an underwriter can be made liable on a policy at the suit of a plaintiff whose name does not appear on the face of the document, it must be shown by clear evidence that the person taking out the policy intended at the time to effect the insurance on the plaintiff's behalf"; and he then proceeds to show that there is no evidence of any such intention, and that all that can possibly be contended is that the intention ought to be inferred from the terms of the charter-party. I will deal presently with the terms of the charter-party, and the inferences which ought to be drawn from those terms; but, before doing so, I should like to say that I am not sure that Bigham, J., is right if he means that the onus of proving the intention is thrown on the plaintiff who is suing on the policy in a case like the present, where the words defining the interests intended to be covered by the policy are manifestly wide enough to cover the plaintiffs' interest. The passage in the second paragraph of p. 36 of vol. 2, Lecture IX., of Duer's Marine Insurance does not seem quite consistent with this view. He says: "When it is said that the general words of the policy must in their personal application be limited to those for whom the insurance was intended, it is by no means a necessary consequence that these words must be always understood in a limited sense. The intention of the party effecting the policy may be co-extensive with its terms. He may really mean that every person who may be proved to have an interest in the property according to the nature of his interest shall be entitled to the benefit of the contract, and where persons who are or may be interested are unknown to the agent such is usually his intention." Now, in the present case, the agent with whom we are concerned is not Holman, who effected the policy and who is named in the contract, but Craggs, from whom he received his directions to insure. The charterers certainly were not unknown to Craggs; but I should hesitate to say that because of this knowledge of Craggs the charterers cannot rely on the general words, unless they give extrinsic evidence of the intention of Craggs to insure on their behalf. In the present case there is no evidence whatever outside the general words of the policy available to prove the intention to insure on behalf of the plaintiffs, except the terms of the charter-party itself. The real case of the plaintiffs is based on the terms of the charter-party, which, it is said, either cast a duty upon Craggs to insure on behalf of the charterers, or at least authorized them to insure on their behalf, and it is said that in either case, as the policy contains words wide enough to cover the interest of the charterers, it must be inferred, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the intention of Craggs was to insure their interest. If this connection is right, no question of ratification, properly so called, would seem to arise. The case would then resolve itself by the answer to the question—Did the charterers, by the terms of the charter-party, authorize the effecting of the policy on their behalf, for in my judgment, the policy actually effected does in words cover the interest of the charterers? If, however, the terms of the charter-party do not authorize Craggs to effect a policy covering the interest of the charterers, I cannot come to the conclusion that the charterers ever ratified or adopted the policy. On the contrary, they seem to me, with the consent of the owners, to have rejected the agency of the owners in that behalf, and I doubt whether it was necessary for the rejection of that agency that it should be communicated directly to the underwriters, especially as it is agreed between the plaintiffs and the underwriters that the stipulation regarding facts on p. 37 of the American Record, and the evidence taken, shall be included as part of the agreed facts in this case. It remains to consider the effect of the terms of the charter-party and see whether there is anything in it either constituting or excluding an obligation or authority on or to Craggs & Sons to insure on behalf of the charterers. The charter-party relates to two screw steamships to be built, and by clause 1 the owners agree (the words "to let" seem to be omitted), and the charterers agree to hire the steamship for thirty-six calendar months, commencing on the 1st (March, 1893) to the 15th of March, 1896. By paragraph 2 the charterers shall provide and pay for stores, tackle, &c., and for the provisions and wages of the captain, engineers, and crew, who, excepting the "guarantee engineer," shall be appointed by them, and that the owners shall maintain the vessel in a thoroughly efficient state in hull and machinery for the service, including winches with chain, gear, and donkey boiler. By clause 3 the charterers shall also provide and pay for all the coals and fuel, port charges, pilotages, agencies, commissions whatsoever, excepting for painting and repairs to hull and machinery, and anything appertaining to keeping the ship in proper working order. Clause 4 provides for payment for the use and hire of the vessel. I do not think that any other clause need be referred to except clauses 17 and 22, which are as follows: Clause 17. "In the event of loss of time from collision, stranding, want of repairs, break down of machinery, or any cause appertaining to the duties of the owner preventing the working of the vessel for more than twenty-four working hours, the payment of the hire shall cease from the hour when detention begins until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service. Further, if in consequence of such deficiency, collision, want of repairs, break down, or other causes the vessel should put into any port or ports other than those to which she is bound, port charges, pilotages, and other expenses at those ports shall be borne by the owners; but should the vessel be driven into port or to anchorage by stress of weather, such detention or loss of time shall fall on the charterers. It is understood in the event of steamer from above causes putting into any port or ports other than those to which she is bound, that the charterers are covered as to expenses as the owners are by their insurance." Clause 22, "The owners shall pay for the insurance on the vessel." Now, it cannot be doubted that clause 2 throws on the owner the responsibility for the maintenance of the vessel in an efficient state in hull and machinery for the service, and it seems clear that under this charter-party, which amounts to a demise, the charterers are not only responsible for the negligence of the master and crew towards third persons, but that, as between the owners and charterers, losses arising from such negligence must fall on the charterers; but this, of course, does not prevent the owner having an insurable interest in the ship or anything else covered by this policy. Such being the general scope of the charter-party, I will now consider what is the meaning of clauses 17 and 22, and what is their application to the present case, in which it is an agreed fact that the collision was caused by the negligence of the master, mates, or crew in charge of the navigation of the steamship. Now what is the meaning of clause 17? The first part of clause 17, down to and including the word "service," provides for the cessation of payment of hire in the event of loss of time from collision, stranding, want of repairs, breakdown of machinery, or any cause appertaining to the duties of owner preventing the working of the vessel for more than twenty-four working hours, and the hire is to cease from the hour when detention begins until the ship be again in an efficient state to resume her service. The clause is clumsily drawn. The loss of time which prevents the working of the vessel may apparently arise from causes over which the owner has no control—for instance, a collision might arise from negligent navigation of another ship, or it might arise from negligence of the charterer's servant, or the causes of the loss of time might arise from the perils of the sea, or the loss of time might arise from imperfections in the machinery provided by the owner—but in each and all these cases the payment of hire is to cease, and the owners have an insurable interest in the loss of time arising from these causes, and then the clause provides that port charges, pilotages, and other expenses should be borne by the owners if the vessel should put into any port or ports other than those to which she is bound, if that is the consequence of certain causes, and one would expect to find the causes identical with those before mentioned. But they are not identical. "Stranding" is omitted, as also the words "or any cause appertaining to the duties of the owner," and the words "such deficiency" are introduced. I think that the differences arise simply from careless drafting, and that mere repetition is intended. Then follows an antithetical passage—"But should the vessel be driven into port or to anchorage by stress of weather, such detention or loss of time shall fall on the charterers." Now I think that this means a stress of weather not resulting in any of the above-mentioned causes as the proximate cause of detention. Then clause 17 concludes: "It is understood in the event of the steamer from above causes putting into any port or ports other than those to which she is bound, that the charterers are covered as to expenses, as the owners are by their insurance." It is suggested that this concluding clause entitles the charterers, at all events when read in conjunction with clause 22, to the benefit of the policy taken out by the owners as a policy taken out on their behalf, or at all events is consistent with the policy having been taken out on their behalf. I cannot agree. I cannot believe that clause 22, taken alone, means anything more than that the owners are to pay the premiums on any insurance of the vessel which they should choose to effect, and that the owners should not be entitled to charge the charterers in account with these premiums. Nor do I think that the consideration of clause 17 alters this conclusion. I think that the effect of the whole charter-party, including clause 17, is to leave the charterers liable, as between themselves and the owners, for the consequences of negligent navigation, and I cannot find in clause 17 itself, or in clause 17 read in conjunction with clause 22, any words sufficient to cast on the owners the obligation to insure on behalf of the charterers against collision or detention risks. I do not think that the word "covered" in clause 17 imports a contract by the owners to effect a policy on behalf of the charterers. I think "cover" means no more than that the owners will give the charterers the protection of the policy to the extent that they happen to insure against risks cast on the charterers by the charter-party. But this does not affect the underwriters, and I cannot find in the charter-party or elsewhere any sufficient evidence to justify the interference that the policy effected by the owners was intended to be effected on behalf of the charterers. On the contrary, I think that the terms of the charter-party would exclude such an inference, even on the assumption that the onus of proving the exclusion is cast upon the underwriters. Moreover, I think it is impossible to leave out of consideration the evidence of Mr. Bennett in the American litigation, given on behalf of the now plaintiffs, that it was optional with the owners whether they insured or not, and that insurance did not concern the charterers. I think that the judgment of Bigham, J., should be affirmed, and this appeal be dismissed be costs.

ROMER, L.J.—This case took a long time to argue, and many questions were discussed in the course of the argument. But in the view I take the appeal should be dismissed on grounds that, after what my lord has said, I can state shortly. The policy of insurance on the face of it states that the insurance company is contracting with John Holman & Sons as well in their own name as for and in the name and names of all and every other person or persons to whom the subject-matter of the policy does, may, or shall appertain in part or in all. That is a common form which has often received judicial consideration and interpretation. On the face of it a large number of persons might be included. But on the authorities it appears to me that it has long been decided, and is settled law that it is not every person included in the wide terms of the policy who is of right entitled to the benefit of the insurance as against the insurer. Only those persons are entitled on whose behalf the policy was in fact effected. In some of the cases which establish this the expressions used are that only those are entitled who at the time the policy was effected were the persons "contemplated" as being, or "intended" to be, covered by the policy; but I think these expressions mean what I have stated. Now I need not consider the question, if there be no facts admitted or proved to show on whose behalf the policy was in fact effected, whether any one who comes within the wide terms of the policy could not properly sue on it; for, in my opinion, in the present case there are facts which enable me to come to a conclusion as to the persons entitled to sue on the policy. It is admitted that the policy was in fact taken out by the brokers on the instructions of the agents of the owners of the ship. Now it is not suggested on behalf of the charterers that they ever gave any instructions to the brokers; and when I look at the terms of the policy I find it is such a policy as the owners might well take out for themselves without regard to anyone else. This being so, the conclusion I draw from the above facts, in the absence of any other sufficient facts established leading to the opposite view, is that the owners on whose behalf the brokers were instructed were the persons, and the only persons, on whose behalf the policy was, as a matter of fact, effected, and therefore the only persons entitle to sue upon it. This leads me to a consideration whether there are any other circumstances in this case sufficient to prevent the above primâ facie view being maintained. The only circumstances relied on by the plaintiffs in the charter-party, and in particular clauses 17 and 22. As to this I can only say that, after a careful consideration of that document, and of the two clauses in particular, I cannot come to the conclusion that by the charter-party the owners contracted with the charterers that they, the owners, would effect an insurance on the ship on behalf of the charterers as well as on behalf of themselves. Nor do I feel able to infer from this charter-party that the policy in question was or ought to be treated as being taken out on behalf of the charterers. And it is satisfactory to know from the proceedings in the United States of America that this view appears to have been for some years the view taken alike by the owners and by the present plaintiffs. I think that on these grounds the appeal fails.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I cannot usefully add anything.

Solicitors, Thorne & Welsford; Walton, Johnson, Bubb & Whatton.

From Chan. Div.
Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ. } Nov. 29, 30.

SAUNDERS v. SHAFTO (a.)

Jointure—Power—Bargain between husband and wife—Fraud on power.

The fact that consideration is given by a wife to a husband to induce him to exercise a power of jointuring in her favour does not invalidate the execution of the power, provided that the wife receives the jointure in full and no part of it is diverted from her under the bargain.

Baldwin v. Roche, 5 Ir. Eq. Rep. 110, approved and followed.

Whelan v. Palmer, 36 W. R. 587, overruled.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J.

By his will, dated the 8th of August, 1851, James Delaval Shafto devised his lands and hereditaments to the use of his uncle Charles C. Shafto for life, then to the use of his uncle W. H. Shafto for life, then to the use of William Henry Shafto, the son of the said W. H. Shafto, for life, and after his death to the use of the first and other sons of the said William Henry Shafto begotten in the testator's lifetime in tail male, with divers remainders over. And he declared that it should be lawful for each tenant for life under the said will, whether in actual possession of the said hereditaments or not, either in contemplation of marriage or after marriage, by any deed or deeds revocable or irrevocable, and executed by such tenant for life in the presence of one witness or more, to charge the said hereditaments with the payment of any annual sum not exceeding £300 to any woman whom he should marry for her life to be in bar of dower and freebench.

The testator died in 1857. His uncles predeceased him, and William Henry Shafto became tenant for life under the terms of the will. He married the plaintiff in 1868. In 1871 he left her and never returned to her, and they never lived together after 1871.

In 1875 the plaintiff presented a petition for divorce against him on the ground of desertion and adultery; a decree nisi was granted, but the Queen's Proctor intervened and the decree was rescinded.

By an indenture of the 28th of August, 1882, made between William Henry Shafto and the plaintiff, which recited the will, the death of the testator, that there was no charge on the property, and that William Henry Shafto was desirous of exercising his power of appointment given by the will in favour of his wife, Eliza Shafto, he as tenant for life and in exercise of the power and of every other power and estate him thereunto enabling irrevocably charged the property then or thereafter to become subject to the uses of the will with the payment to his said wife if she should survive him for her natural life of the yearly sum of £300 for her sole and separate use, to be paid by equal quarterly payments free from all deductions, the first payment thereof to be made three months after his decease.

William Henry Shafto died on the 27th of September, 1902, and the defendant thereupon became tenant for life in possession of the settled estates. The defendant refused to admit the plaintiff's right to a charge or to make any payment in respect thereof.

In September, 1903, the plaintiff married a Mr. Saunders, and in February, 1904, she brought the present action for declaration that she was entitled to a charge.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It was proved at the trial that the deed of August, 1882, was executed in pursuance of a bargain between William Henry Shafto and the plaintiff that she should give him £50 in return for his creating the charge. Actuarial evidence was given to the effect that, considering the ages of William Henry Shafto and the plaintiff, the reversionary charge of £300 a year was not worth so much as £50 in August, 1882.

Kekewich, J., held that the transaction was a corrupt bargain and a fraud on the power, and gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiff appealed.

Stewart Smith, K.C., and Martelli.—There has been no fraud on the power. A power of jointuring is on a different footing from a power to appoint among children, and provided that it is not exercised for the husband's benefit, it is no objection that the wife gives consideration for it. The jointure must not go to the husband, but a bargain does not invalidate the appointment even though the husband gets a benefit by it.

They cited Tyrconnell v. Duke of Ancaster, Amb. 237; Baldwin v. Roche, 5 Ir. Eq. Rep. 110; Aleyn v. Belchier, 1 Eden 132; Lane v. Page, Amb. 233; Daubeny v. Cockburn, 1 Mer. 626; Rowley v. Rowley, Kay 242; Whelan v. Palmer, 36 W. R. 587, 39 Ch. D. 648.

Warmington, K.C. and Jarvis, for the defendants.—In this case the wife paid the husband more than the reversionary jointure was worth. The result is that he took the entire benefit of the jointure. If the appointor cannot exercise the power directly for his own benefit he cannot do so in directly.

They cited (in addition to the cases already mentioned) Topham v. Duke of Portland, 11 W. R. 507, 1 De G. J. & S. 517; In re Turner's Settled Estates, 33 W. R. 265, 28 Ch. D. 205.

No reply was called for.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J., that an appointment made in 1882 by a tenant for life, having a power of jointuring of £300 a year, of the whole amount to his wife, in consideration a present payment to him by her of £50 was invalid. Kekewich, J., arrived at this conclusion upon the basis that there was a corrupt bargain between the husband and wife—a bargain which he thought was intended to benefit the husband solely. The evidence upon which he came to this conclusion was this. There was correspondence between the husband and wife by which it appeared that the husband said that he would only execute this power to jointure in favour of his wife if she would pay him the sum of £50. Then there was the evidence of an actuary that £50 was the full market value of the annuity secured by the jointure, having regard to the respective ages of the husband and the wife. Kekewich, J., came to the conclusion that that made it an arrangement solely for the benefit of the husband, and that, for that reason, it was a corrupt bargain and fraud upon the power. I cannot agree with the learned judge's decision in this case. In his judgment he fully recognized the distinction between the execution of a power of jointuring and the execution of a power to appoint in favour of children; but he nevertheless came to the conclusion that this execution of the power to jointure by the husband, being solely for the benefit of the husband, was a fraud upon the power. If the bargain made between the husband and the wife had been a bargain dealing with the actual jointure itself, a bargain under which the wife only got part of the sum secured by the jointure, and the residue of it was paid to some nominee or creditor of the husband, I should have entirely agreed with the decision of Kekewich, J.; but the learned judge seems to have thought that, inasmuch as the money paid by the wife was, according to the evidence of the actuary, the full value of that which she was to get, it placed the case upon the same level as if that which had been the subject of the bargain had been a disposition of a part of the jointure itself. However much one is to look at substance and not at form, I cannot agree with that conclusion.

I think that, before I deal with the case generally, this is perhaps a convenient moment to say that I think that Kekewich, J., was to a large extent following his own decision in the case of Whelan v. Palmer. In my opinion that decision cannot be supported any more than the present decision can be supported, because, to my mind, it neglects, as this decision seems to me to do, the distinction between dealing with the jointure itself and a bargain by which, in return for the giving of a consideration by the wife, she is left entitled on the death of her husband to receive the whole of the jointure. I think, therefore, that our decision must be taken as affecting not only the present case, but also the case of Whelan v. Palmer.

Now in the present case we have had our attention called to an authority which practically disposes of the case, if it is one which we ought to follow. The case which I am referring to is Baldwin v. Roche. In one sense this decision in the Irish courts does not bind us, although it is a case which, having regard to the eminence of the judges who were parties to the judgment, we should pay the very greatest attention to. But there is a sense in which it is binding on us in a very great degree, because it is referred to in Sugden on Powers as an authority which is in accordance with the law. The edition that I have before me is the eighth, published in the year 1861. The case is also referred to in Farwell on Powers (2nd ed.), p. 434, and is there also mentioned as a binding authority. It is plain that an authority of this sort is one which may have been, and probably has been in fact, acted upon by conveyancers and others as binding, and it would be a very serious thing now, more than forty years from the date of Lord St. Leonards' book approving so distinctly of this decision, to say that we question it. Excepting this decision, to which I have called attention, of Kekewich, J., there has been no decision whatsoever in which this case of Baldwin v. Roche has ever been questioned, and even in Whelan v. Palmer perhaps it is not right to say that it was questioned.

I propose in the first instance to call attention to the case first referred to in Sugden on Powers (8th ed.), p. 610. That is the case of Lane v. Page. It is a case in which the bargain made was one affecting the jointure itself, and part of the jointure was to go in payment of a creditor of the husband, of course after the husband's death, and the residue of the jointure was to go to the wife. Lord Hardwicke held in that case that the jointure was good as far as the wife's portion was concerned, but bad in so far as the portion going to the husband was concerned. But although we have not in the present case to deal with any severance of the jointure such as that which had to be dealt with in that case, yet Lane v. Page is an authority in this way — that it is quite plain that there there was a bargain between the husband and the wife, and Lord Hardwicke held that notwithstanding the bargain between the husband and the wife the jointure stood so far as that portion of it was concerned which the wife was to take. It may be convenient at this moment to say one word about some comments that Sir William Grant made in Daubeny v. Cockburn upon that case, Sir William Grant took the view that if the execution of the jointure was fraudulent in one respect, it was bad altogether, and he did not approve of the decision of Lord Hardwicke, which held that the jointure stood as to part and was bad as to the residue. But we need not trouble with that case at all. Every one reading the judgment of Sir William Grant must be struck with the force of his reasoning, but it does not touch the case that we now have to deal with. Having made those observations upon Lane v. Page and Daubeny v. Cockburn, I think I may pass to the judgment in Baldwin v. Roche, only observing that in his observations in Rowley v. Rowley, Wood, V.C., recognizes the authority of Lane v. Page, although the case which he had to deal with was not the case of a jointure, but the case of a power of appointment amongst children.

Now, the case of Baldwin v. Roche is a remarkable one. I do not think I can state it better, or put it more shortly, than it is put in the marginal note: "Tenant for life, with a power to jointure, marries, but does not exercise the power. His wife was seised of real estate for the term of her life, which on the marriage was settled to the use of the husband for the joint lives of himself and his wife, remainder to the wife for her life. The husband afterwards became indebted, and agreed with his wife and creditor that he would exercise the power of jointuring in her favour, and that she should grant to the creditor an annuity for the term of her life equal in amount to the jointure to be charged upon her estate, and to become payable upon the death of the husband, which agreement was carried into execution. The husband died. Held, that the execution of the power of jointuring was not a fraud upon the remainderman."

Before I read some observations of the judges in this case I would point out what a strong decision it is, and how completely it covers the present case, because in that case, as in this, the execution of the power of jointuring was an execution which took place after the marriage, and not in pursuance of any ante-nuptial agreement; moreover, the consideration which the wife gave was equal in amount to the jointure. Under these circumstances, what do the judges hold? Did they hold that the fact that the wife gave a consideration to the husband—that is to say, to the husband's creditor, at the instance of the husband, for executing the power in her favour—rendered the bargain corrupt and a fraud upon the remainderman? Not at all. They came to exactly the contrary conclusion. I will first read a word or two which fell from Lefroy, B., in the course of the argument. He says: "In both those cases" (that is, the cases of Lane v. Page and Aleyn v. Belchier) "the whole contract related to the jointure, and nothing else." Of course, in the present case there is no contract relating to the jointure whatsoever. The wife gets the jointure. "How do you answer the common case of a settlement where the husband gets a fortune with his wife, applies it in payment of his own debts, and in consideration of it executes the power of jointuring?" The answer which is made to that—an answer which the judges do not find satisfactory—is simply this: "The evidence shows that, though not in form, yet in substance the contract of the parties was, that the husband's debt should be paid out of the jointure." That answer was not thought sufficient, and it seems to me for the obvious reason that it still left it an absolutely true proposition that the wife was to receive the jointure in full, and no part of it was under this bargain to be taken from her. Brady, C.B., says this: "This case has been put by the counsel for the defendant, on the only ground upon which the claim can be resisted—namely, that the court ought to look on this transaction, not as a grant of a jointure to the wife, but as the grant of an annuity to the creditor of the husband; and if that were the whole of this case, it seems to me that it would fall within the authorities. But these authorities only go to this extent; that in the execution of a power of jointuring, which is given for the benefit of the wife, it shall not be so executed, as to be the means, colourably, of conveying an interest" (and then these words are in italics) "in the jointure itself to the creditor of the husband. If the intention of the parties really is that the jointure shall go to some third person, such intention cannot be effected by an execution of the power; for such execution of the power is not a grant of a jointure at all." Then he says: "But is that the case here?" I will refer to one passage in the judgment of Richards, B. He sets out what he conceives to be the bargain in this case between the husband and the wife: "I will suppose that the whole of this transaction was spread out upon the face of the jointure deed, and then it would run thus: That whereas the husband was indebted to Gash, and whereas his wife was entitled to a certain property, and was desirous to secure thereout the debt due to her husband's creditor, and that the husband was desirous of doing the same; but that if the wife did so she would be left without any adequate provision, and, therefore, the husband agreed to secure to her a jointure charged on his lands; and, therefore, in consideration of the wife making her own property liable to the payment of this debt, the husband exercises his power to jointure, and charges the jointure upon the estate of which he was merely tenant for life. What is there fraudulent or against conscience in such a transaction? What equity has the remainderman, who takes the estate subject to the capricious exercise of that power, to complain? How is he prejudiced? I do not see how." The only other thing that I wish to call attention to is a short passage in the judgment of Lefroy, B. He says this: "Mr. Deasy properly admits that there is a difference between a jointuring power and a power to appoint amongst children. A jointuring power is one by which the husband may take a benefit; not a benefit by perverting that which is the subject-matter of the power, to a purpose which the donor of the power did not intend, but by applying it to its proper use, in consideration of his getting something, which he is at liberty to get, for his own benefit. It is very different from a power to appoint to children." I think that, having regard to the passages which I have just read from the judgments in that case, it is clear that, if we follow it, it absolutely disposes of the present appeal. In my judgment we ought to follow that case, first, because I think the reasoning of the learned judges is sound; secondly, for the reason that I have already given—that it is a case which has not been questioned during these forty odd years, and which probably has been acted upon again and again by conveyancers and others. Under these circumstances I think that upon the authority of that case we ought to allow this appeal, which will be, of course, with the usual consequences with regard to costs here and below.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. A power to jointure is a somewhat peculiar power, and differs in many obvious respects from the power given to a tenant for life to appoint amongst children or amongst a special limited class. It has been accordingly held that while an appointment by way of jointure (as the result of a bargain between husband and wife or between intended husband and wife) that part of the jointure shall go or be for the benefit of the husband's creditors or a stranger is bad to the extent of that part, yet the rest of the bargain may stand so far as the jointure is to be enjoyed by the wife herself. Probably one of the reasons for this view of the courts was, that to hold otherwise would have been to invalidate the bargains so frequently made by which the husband and wife have contracted on a settlement that the wife should get a jointure on consideration of the husband obtaining an interest in her property. The courts, very naturally, apparently have shrunk from such a conclusion, and accordingly the rule that the wife might hold a jointure intended to be enjoyed by herself, though she has obtained it by a bargain with her husband, and given him or his creditors as a consideration some interest in her property, has long been recognized. It has been recognized from very early times, from Lane v. Page down to the present time, with the exception of and until the decision of Kekewich, J., in the present case, and in Whelan v. Palmer.

After what my lord has said about the cases, it does not appear to me necessary to go through the authorities. All I can say is that I think the rule I have referred to has been so long recognized and acted upon that it ought not to be departed from, and in my opinion the two decisions of Kekewich, J., to which I have referred were wrong. The present case clearly comes within the rule I have referred to, for the whole of the jointure is to be enjoyed by the wife. The circumstances that the husband and wife were separated for so long, and that she had commenced divorce proceedings against him, are not circumstances which deprived the wife of her position as such or prevented her from being a proper object of the power of jointuring, nor do I think they are circumstances which, from a legal point of view, prevent the present appointment from being good, or enabling her to enjoy the benefit of the rule to which I have referred.

It follows that the appeal must succeed, and accordingly that there ought to be a declaration that she is entitled to the jointure, and an account of what is due for arrears, and an order for payment. Probably it will be sufficient if liberty to apply for a receiver is given, if that be necessary, and, of course, the defendant must pay the costs here and below.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I have very little to add. I agree with what has been said by my lord and Romer, L.J., that a power to jointure is peculiar. It is so peculiar that I am not aware of any power which stands on precisely the same footing. The result of the authorities seems to me to be that the remaindermen cannot complain so far as the appointment of a jointure is really for the benefit of the wife, in this sense—that she will take the jointure itself free from any obligation to hand over part of the jointure to anybody else. It is no objection to the validity of the jointure that the husband receives a consideration for exercising the power. That that is plainly so in the case of an ante-nuptial bargain cannot be doubted. Lord Tyrconnell v. Duke of Ancaster is one amongst many authorities which show that where, in consideration of the husband getting (I think it was £10,000 in that case) part of his intended wife's property, he agrees to execute a jointure power, that will be held valid. What difference can there be if the bargain is not ante-nuptial but post-nuptial, made not between the intended husband and the intended wife, but between the husband and a wife who is now in a position to make the contract. I cannot see what difference in principle can be made, nor do I think Kekewich, J., himself thought there was any real difference. His view seemed to be that the quantum of consideration given by the wife was a matter so material as to enable the court to say that there was no real bargain. With great respect to the learned judge, I cannot follow that. If the wife may make a bargain with her husband in this matter the court has really nothing to say to the question whether she has paid more or less than the actuarial value for that which she acquires by the exercise of the power. I will only say that I think the Irish case was well decided; but, whether it was well decided or not, sixty years have elapsed. It has been quoted without disapproval, and I think I may say with approval, both by Lord St. Leonards in his book on Powers and by Farwell, J., in his book on Powers. I therefore agree that the appeal ought to be allowed.

Solicitors, King, Adams, & Co.; James Johnstone.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div.
Kekewich, J. } March 31.

In re GILLING (DECEASED).
PROCTOR v. WATKINS. (a.)

Husband and wife—Deed of separation—Covenant to pay annuity—So long as she shall continue to live separate and apart—Death of husband.

A husband covenanted in a deed of separation to pay his wife an annuity of £150 per annum during her life if she should so long continue to live separate and apart.

Held, that the annuity ceased to be payable on the death of the husband, as she could not be held to live separate and apart after her husband's death.

Adjourned summons.

The question for decision in this case was as to the construction of a clause in a deed of separation.

The deceased, Walter Gilling, having had differences with his wife, Annie Marie Gilling, on the 4th of June, 1887, entered into a deed of separation with her, whereby they mutually agreed to live separate from each other for the future upon the terms and conditions thereinafter expressed.

The deed contained a recital that "the said W. Gilling, in consideration of such separation, has agreed to allow and pay his said wife the sum of £150 per annum payable quarterly for her maintenance, clothing, and all other necessaries during the continuance of such separation," and provided "that in pursuance of this agreement and in consideration of the premises they, the said Walter Gilling and Annie Marie Gilling, his wife, thereby mutually covenant and agree that they and each of them will henceforth live separate and apart from the other upon the terms in this indenture hereinafter contained. . . . And the said W. Gilling covenants with the said A. M. Gilling . . . that he, the said W. Gilling, will pay or cause to be paid unto her, the said A. M. Gilling, for her sole and separate use and without power of anticipation by the said A. M. Gilling, by quarterly instalments during the life of the said A. M. Gilling if she shall so long continue to live separate and apart as aforesaid, the full sum of £150 per annum (being the yearly allowance hereinbefore mentioned) for the maintenance, clothing, and other necessaries of the said A. M. Gilling."

(a.) Reported by R. FRANKLIN STUBBING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The deed also contained covenants by the wife for the protection of her husband against any actions by the wife or any debts contracted by the wife "during the continuance of the said separation."

The wife lived separate and apart from her husband, and Walter Gilling paid the quarterly instalments of the annuity down to the date of his death on the 4th of July, 1901, and from that date the executors of Walter Gilling continued to pay the annuity until the 25th of December, 1903.

By his last will, dated the 28th of January, 1901, W. Gilling appointed his son Geoffrey Marston Gilling and James Herbert Proctor to be the executors and trustees of his will, and also bequeathed the residue of his estate to his said son Geoffrey Marston Gilling.

Annie Marie Gilling married again on the 7th of December, 1901, and became the wife of William Watkins.

In November, 1901, Geoffrey Marston Gilling agreed to purchase from Annie Marie Gilling her annuity for the sum of £1,500, and on the 31st of December, 1903, paid to her the sum of £1,000 on account of such purchase-money, since that date neither the annuity nor the balance of the purchase-money had been paid.

This summons was taken out by the said J. H. Proctor, one of the executors, under the will of Walter Gilling, for the determination of the question whether the said annuity of £150 ceased to become payable on the death of the said Walter Gilling, or whether the executors of the said Walter Gilling are bound to provide for the payment of the said annuity out of the estate of the said Walter Gilling.

Pepys, for the trustee and executor of the will of Walter Gilling.

Clauson, for the wife, Annie Marie Watkins.—Upon the true construction of this deed the annuity is payable during the lifetime of the wife. The covenant is not, as usually found in precedents, to pay the annuity during the joint lives of the husband and wife, but to pay it during the life of the wife. [KEKEWICH, J.—So long as she shall live separate and apart.] The only event on which the annuity is to cease is the event of the husband and wife coming together again. In Charlesworth v. Holt, 22 W. R. 94, L. R. 9 Ex. 38, an annuity granted by a deed of separation to a wife was held to be payable notwithstanding the marriage had been dissolved owing to the wife's adultery.

Petersen, for the residuary legatee, was not called upon to argue.

KEKEWICH, J.—Notwithstanding the novelty of the question raised in this case, I have no difficulty in construing the words creating it against the lady. The document to be construed is a deed of separation, and one is entitled to look at the purview and object of such deeds in order to ascertain what was the intention of this deed. The intention was clearly to provide for the wife during the continuance of the coverture. That was clearly the first object of the deed. Separation deeds often go far beyond that, but this is a plain deed for the purpose I have named. The words are quite clear in this respect, that the annuity is to be paid to the wife for her sole and separate use during her lifetime if she shall so long continue to live separate and apart for her maintenance and other necessaries. The covenant does not provide for a payment on a condition, but for a conditional payment to the wife so long as she shall fulfil the condition to live separate and apart from her husband, but she cannot be said to live separate and apart from her husband after he is dead, therefore she cannot fulfil that condition upon which the payment of the annuity depends. The case of Charlesworth v. Holt has been referred to, but that was a different case from the present one, and turned upon the construction of the particular words in that document. There the husband covenanted to allow his wife an annuity during the joint lives of himself and his wife and so long as they should live separate and apart, and it was held that the annuity was not put an end to by the wife's divorce, as there were no words in the separation deed limiting the husband's liability to the continuance of the marriage tie. The fact that in that case both the husband and the wife were alive and lived separate and apart distinguished that case from the present case, where the annuity is payable so long as the wife continues to live separate and apart from her husband, which she cannot be said to do after her husband's death, and therefore I hold that the annuity ceased to be payable on the death of the husband.

Solicitors for the executors and residuary legatee, Nash, Field, & Co.

Solicitors for Mrs. Watkins, Lanfear, Tanner, & Lanfear.

Chan. Div.
Buckley, J. } March 29.

In re JACKSON AND HADEN. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Title—"Objection to title"—No title to minerals—Right to rescind—Completion with compensation.

Where a vendor is unable to show any title whatever to a portion of the property which he has agreed to sell, he is not entitled to rescind the contract under a condition contained in the contract enabling him to rescind in the event of the purchaser insisting on any objection or requisition as to title or evidence of title which the vendor shall be unable or on the ground of expense shall decline to remove or comply with. The total absence of title to part of the property will, however, enable the purchaser to take advantage of a condition that an omission in the particulars shall not annul the sale, but shall form the subject of compensation.

Adjourned summons.

This was a summons taken out under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 78), s. 9, by Harold John Haden asking for a declaration that he was entitled to insist upon completion of a contract for the sale to him by the respondents of certain property, with compensation in respect of the mines and minerals under the property, to which the vendors could not show any title.

By the contract, which was dated the 25th of October, 1904, the respondents agreed to sell to Harold John Haden for the sum of £510 "all that messuage or dwelling-house, with the yard, stable, coachhouse, garden, and appurtenances thereto belonging (including the wall on the eastern side of the premises, and the hedge on the northern side of the premises), situate and being at Dawley Brook, Kingswinford, in the county of Stafford, and known as Yewtree Villa, and now in the occupation of Harold John Haden."

A set of common form conditions were embodied in the contract, of which the following were material:

"(13) . . . If the purchaser shall insist on any objection as to title or evidence of title which the vendors shall be unable, or on the ground of expense shall decline, to remove or comply with, then, notwithstanding any intermediate or pending negotiations, or any litigation which the purchaser may have commenced, or any attempt to remove or comply with the same, the vendors shall be at liberty by notice in writing, signed by them or their solicitors, and delivered to the purchaser or his solicitor, to rescind the contract. . . .

"(14) Any error, misstatement, or omission in the particulars shall not annul the sale, but, if pointed out before the completion of the purchase, and not otherwise, shall form the subject of compensation which shall be allowed by the vendors or the purchaser as the case may require. . . ."

The vendors delivered an abstract of title by which it appeared that the mines and minerals under the property sold had been expressly reserved to former grantors by a conveyance dated in 1854, under which the vendors derived title.

The purchaser thereupon delivered a requisition stating that no abstract of the vendors' title to the minerals had been delivered, and asking for a supplemental abstract.

The vendors replied: "The purchaser is bound by the contents of the deed. It is also well known, and was known to the purchaser, that the mines and minerals are all reserved in the Kingswinford property."

As a matter of fact the purchaser did not know until delivery of the abstract that the mines and minerals under the property agreed to be sold were reserved, but, on the other hand he knew that the minerals under certain other parts of the Kingswinford property were not reserved. The purchaser insisted on his requisition, and on the 28th of November, 1904, his solicitors wrote to the vendors' solicitors offering either (a) to accept a conveyance including the mines and minerals upon the vendors showing a good title thereto, or (b) to accept the property without the mines and minerals at a proportionately reduced price, or (c) to permit the rescission of the contract upon payment of suitable damages.

On the 3rd of December the vendors gave notice of rescission under condition of sale 13, and the purchaser thereupon took out this summons.

Astbury, K.C., and Whitmore L. Richards, for the purchaser.—The vendor may not rescind under such a condition as this where he has no title at all: Dart, Vendors and Purchasers, vol. 1, p. 178; Bowman v. Hyland, 26 W. R. 877, 8 Ch. D. 588; Nelthorpe v. Holgate, 1 Coll. 203, 221; Powell v. Powell, 23 W. R. 482, 19 Eq. 422; In re Monckton and Gilzean, 32 W. R. 973, 27 Ch. D. 555; Mawson v. Fletcher, 19 W. R. 141, 6 Ch. App. 91, 93; In re Deighton and Harris, 46 W. R. 341, [1898] 1 Ch. 458. What has occurred is that there has been an omission in the particulars, and the purchaser is therefore entitled to claim completion with compensation under condition 14.

They also referred to In re Jackson and Oakshott, 28 W. R. 794, 14 Ch. D. 851, 855.

Mark Romer, for the vendors.—This is an "objection or requisition as to title": Mawson v. Fletcher. It is an objection to title in terms, because the purchaser's objection is that the vendors' title is bad, in that they cannot make a title at all. Assuming the objection to be an objection to title, the vendors are entitled to rescind: Heppenstall v. Hose, 33 W. R. 30; Ashburner v. Sewell, 40 W. R. 169, [1891] 3 Ch. 405; and In re Deighton and Harris. Assuming that the vendors are not entitled to rescind, this is not a case where the purchaser can compel the vendor to complete with compensation. It would not be fair to make the vendors sell for, say £400, property which they have agreed to sell for £510. The vendors believed, when they entered into the contract, that the purchaser knew that they could not sell the minerals.

(a.) Reported by H. H. KING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

BUCKLEY, J., after stating the facts as above, and reading conditions of sale 13 and 14, continued: The fact is that the vendors had no title to part of the subject-matter of the contract for sale—namely, to the mines and minerals. Is condition 13 applicable? To my mind there is an essential difference between these two things, an objection to the sufficiency of the title shown, and an objection that there is a complete absence of title. You cannot find fault with what does not exist. It follows that the condition which refers expressly to objections as to title does not apply. Hall, V.C., in Bowman v. Hyland decided that a condition in a contract of sale that if the purchaser shall make any objection or requisition which the vendor shall be unwilling on the ground of expense or otherwise to comply with, the vendor may rescind the sale does not enable the vendor to rescind where he fails to show any title whatever.

Assume that that means a total defect of title as to the whole of the property. Does the same rule apply where the defect is only as to a part of the property? I think it does, and for that I refer to Mawson v. Fletcher, L. R. 6 Ch. App., at p. 93, where Mellish, J., says interlocutorily, "It may be conceded that if there was a clear case of defect of title to part you would be entitled to specific performance with compensation." That case was one in which the Court of Appeal proceeded upon this ground. The vendors said that they had a title to the minerals; the purchaser insisted that they had not; and the question was, Has the vendor a title or not? That was a question which might involve a long and expensive inquiry, and the Court of Appeal said that the vendor was entitled to say "I will not go into that, I will rescind."

The vendors here knew they had no title, every body in the neighbourhood knew it, although the purchaser did not. Mawson v. Fletcher is no authority for saying that the rule applies where the vendor has no title. A third case to which I refer is In re Deighton and Harris, where Lindley, L.J., said this: "This is a case of vendor and purchaser, and it is one in which the vendor is not in the position of a man who agrees to sell property to which he has no title at all." He then refers to Bowman v. Hyland, the case I mentioned first, and the head-note to the case summarizes it by saying: "The ordinary condition of sale giving the vendor a power of rescission applies only where he has some title, not where he has none." I think myself that that is a perfectly sound principle. The objection is not to some defect in the title, but that there is no title. It seems to me, therefore, that condition 13 does not apply. Does condition 14 apply? It seems to me that it does. On the 28th of November the purchaser wrote to the vendors offering three alternatives, and the purchaser is entitled to have a conveyance of the property with compensation for the mines which the vendors are unable to convey to him.

Solicitors, A. E. Ball, for Harwards & Co., Stourbridge and Birmingham; Robbins & Billing, for W. Waldron, Brierley Hill.

K. B. Div. (Warrington, J.) March 7.

VINDEN v. HUGHES. (a.)

Bill of exchange — Cheque — Negotiable instrument — Fictitious or non-existing person—Belief or intention of drawer—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), s. 7 (3).

A cheque payable to the order of the payee was signed by the drawer under the erroneous belief, induced by the fraud of his clerk, that the sum for which the cheque was drawn was owing by the drawer to the person named as payee. There was in fact such a person as the payee. The clerk having forged the payee's name on the back of the cheque, a third person (the defendant) took it in good faith for value, and cashed it.

Held, that as at the time when the cheque was drawn the drawer believed that the name of the payee was inserted as part of a real transaction, and not as a pretence, the payee was not a "fictitious person" within the meaning of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 7 (3), and that, therefore, the cheque could not be treated as payable to bearer, and was not a negotiable instrument, and that the defendant must refund the money he had obtained by means of it.

Bank of England v. Vagliano, 39 W. R. 657, [1891] A. C. 107, distinguished.

Action.

This was an action to recover from the defendant the proceeds of certain cheques which the defendant had received from the plaintiff's bankers after having cashed the cheques upon an indorsement forged by a clerk of the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs were salesmen in Covent Garden Market who sold fruit and like produce for customers on commission. From 1896 to 1903 they had in their employment a cashier and confidential clerk named Cross. It had been the practice in the plaintiffs' business for Cross to fill up from time to time as they were wanted cheques payable "to order" with the names of the customers to whom money was due, and with the proper amounts. These cheques he then submitted to the plaintiff Vinden for signature, and after they were signed he sent them by post to the various customers in whose favour they were drawn. At certain times when Vinden was about to be away from business for some time he would sign a few cheques in blank and leave them with Cross for him to fill up and send off as required.

During the years 1901, 1902, and 1903, Cross filled up a number of cheques with the names of customers and various sums when either nothing was due to the customer named, or a sum less than that for which the cheque was drawn. These cheques Vinden signed, supposing that they were drawn for debts due to the payees, and believing that the ordinary practice of the business was being followed.

Having thus obtained these cheques, Cross forged the indorsement of the names of the payees, and took the cheques to the defendant, who was a draper in Brixton, and one of whose customers Cross was, and the defendant cashed the cheques for Cross, and then passed them through his banking account, and thus obtained payment upon them from the bankers of the plaintiffs. In this manner the defendant paid to Cross and obtained payment of twenty-seven cheques of amounts in all of some £487. Upon discovery in 1903 of the frauds, the plaintiffs dismissed Cross, and brought this action for the £487.

The defendant paid into court £20, being the amount of one cheque drawn in favour of a customer to whom more than that amount was owing, but otherwise disputed his liability. The first cheque on the list was one for £20, made payable to T. H. Graves, who (as also were the other payees) was a real person.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

No imputation was made upon the honesty and good faith of the defendant in the transaction.

Lush, K.C., and Ashton Cross, for the plaintiffs.—The cheques were not negotiable instruments, as the indorsements were forged and not real. The defendant, therefore, obtained no title to them, and must refund the money he obtained by means of them. T. H. Graves, the payee on the first cheque, was a real and not a fictitious person. The fact that Vinden was induced by fraud to sign the cheques does not make Graves a fictitious person: Gibson v. Minet, 1 H. Bl. 569; Gibson v. Hunter, 2 H. Bl. 288. Bank of England v. Vagliano Brothers, 39 W. R. 657, [1891] A. C. 107, was a different case, as there the bill was not drawn at all, the signature of the drawer being forged. In Clutton v. Attenborough & Son, 45 W. R. 276, [1897] A. C. 90, there was in fact no such person as the payee, and consequently he was "non-existing" within sub-section 3 of section 7 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. Again, the defendant received the cheques under such circumstances as that his suspicions should have been aroused, and he ought to have made inquiries; he is not, therefore, a holder in due course: Sheffield v. London and Joint Stock Bank, 37 W. R. 33, 13 A. C. 333; London Joint Stock Bank v. Simmons, [1892] A. C. 201, 40 W. R. Dig. 412.

S. T. Evans, K.C., and Bailhache, for the defendant.—Graves was a fictitious person within section 7 (3). If the cheque had reached him he could not have given any title to sue on it by indorsing it to anyone. The name was a mere pretence, and therefore fictitious. "Fictitious" does not necessarily mean imaginary: see observations of Lord Herschell in Bank of England v. Vagliano, 39 W. R., p. 669, [1891] A. C., p. 152. The cheque, therefore, may under the section be treated as payable to bearer and negotiable; there was no need for the indorsement, and the defendant obtained a good title to the cheque. [Upon the question whether the defendant was put upon his inquiry they were stopped by the court.]

WARRINGTON, J.—The question I have to decide is whether the payees of certain cheques were "fictitious or non-existing persons" within the meaning of section 7 (3) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. Independently of authority, it seems to me that "fictitious" does not mean fictitious in the abstract. The circumstances of the particular case must be looked at to see whether the name of the payee is that of a fictitious person. Now, when Vinden signed the cheque it was not a fiction to him then. It was intended to be and was to him a real transaction. He believed that he owed the sum of money represented by the cheque to the person whose name appears upon it, and he signed the cheque in that belief. It was only when he discovered that he had been imposed upon by his clerk that there was—I will not say a fiction, but that there was anything that was not real and in accordance with his intention in connection with the matter; and I think that I am entitled to say that the fraud perpetrated upon him has nothing to do with the construction of the Act of Parliament. The only thing to be looked at is the state of things at the time when the cheque was drawn and signed. Take the case of T. H. Graves. At the time the cheque was drawn Vinden intended to pay Graves the sum of £20, and I should have said that he was not at the moment a "fictitious person." Clutton v. Attenborough is not an authority to the contrary. There the payee was a non-existing person, and the learned lords who decided that case had not to consider the construction of the word "fictitious." In Bank of England v. Vagliano the facts were special and peculiar. The document was not drawn at all, the name of the drawer being forged, and there being no drawer in fact, the use of the name of a person as payee was a mere fiction, although the payee was in fact an existing person; and the expressions of Lord Herschell in that case are explained by that fact. The passages in his judgment relied on by the defendant would be satisfied by a case where the drawer drawing a cheque puts into it the name of a person who exists, but whose name is inserted by mere pretence. Vinden did not draw the cheque here as a mere pretence. He believed, and had reason to believe, that it was drawn for the purpose of being paid to the person whose name appeared thereon. I come to the conclusion that the names of the persons inserted as payees are not those of "fictitious or non-existing persons"; that the cheques therefore cannot be treated as payable to bearer; that the forged indorsement was no authority to the defendant to pay or take the cheque; and that accordingly he is liable to the plaintiff for the loss which has been occasioned. In this view it is not necessary to say whether the defendant is the holder in due course, but I think there was nothing to put him upon inquiry so as to render his payments to Cross other than bonâ fide. If so he would be a holder in due course.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

Solicitors, Hervey, Smith, & Co.; J. T. Lewis.

K. B. Div.
(Kennedy and Jelf, JJ.) Feb. 3.

BOYCE v. WHITE. (a.)

Election law—Municipal corporation—Election of disqualified candidate—Notice of disqualification—Right of unsuccessful candidate to take the seat—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), Schedule III., Part II., r. 16.

Although the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, has declared the nomination of a person for the office of municipal councillor who at the time of the nomination is out of the United Kingdom to be void unless certain notice be given, nevertheless if he be elected by a majority of votes and no previous notice of the disqualification be given, the unsuccessful candidate is not entitled to take the seat vacated by the void election.

Hobbs v. Morey, 52 W. R. 348, [1904] 1 K. B. 74, followed.

Special case stated by Jelf, J., upon a petition made in chambers under rule 47 of the general rules made for the effectual execution of Part IV. of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882.

The respondent was elected by a majority of voters for the office of councillor of the Scarborough Corporation. The election was void under Schedule III., Part II., r. 16 of the above Act, which enacts: "The nomination of a person absent from the United Kingdom shall be void, unless his written consent, given within one month before the day of his nomination in the presence of two witnesses, is produced at the time of his nomination." No notice was given of the disqualification at the time of the election. Jelf, J., declared the election void and stated a special case whether it could be decreed that the appellant, the unsuccessful candidate, do take the seat thereby vacated. Hobbs v. Morey [1904] 1 K. B. 74, was not brought to the notice of the learned judge.

(a.) Reported by MAURICE. N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The respondent did not oppose.

Corrie Grant, for the appellant.—This case is distinguishable from Hobbs v. Morey, because here the statute has declared the nomination void, i.e., void from the very first. The case of Brown v. Benn, 53 J. P. 167, was under the same rule, and there Huddleston, B., seated the unsuccessful candidate. [KENNEDY, J.—Yes; but "Notice to the effect that votes given to the respondent would be thrown away was given on the 30th of October, and before the commencement of the poll, to the public, by posters." Here no notice was given at all.] Huddleston, B., did not base his judgment upon that fact. This is not the case of an imperfect nomination, but one absolutely void.

KENNEDY, J.—we are both clearly of opinion that this case is indistinguishable from the decision in Hobbs v. Morey, and it is unnecessary to now repeat the reasoning in that case. Here White was elected who was unqualified to go to the poll. He went to the poll and was returned, correctly so, as far as any voter was concerned, by a majority of votes. White does not dispute that his election was invalid. We can only declare that the election was invalid; we cannot declare that the petitioner was elected.

JELF, J.—I agree.

KENNEDY, J.—I do not think I can allow the respondent to appear on the question of costs, since, in the first instance, he did not appear on the petition. There will be costs for the applicant up to the time of the summons in chambers.

Solicitors for appellant, Radford & Frankland.

Solicitors for the respondent, Jacques & Jacques, for Willoughby Williams.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy and Ridley, JJ.) — Feb. 1.

CRICK v. NICHOLLS. (a.)

Weights and measures — Coal dealers — Bye-laws — Weights and Measures Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 21).

A bye-law was made by a county council under powers given to it by the Weights and Measures Act, 1889, to the effect that coal dealers who offered coal for sale from their carts should carry scales and weights amounting to 2 cwt. A., a coal dealer, had in his cart sacks of coal weighing, some 1 cwt. and some ½ cwt.; there were also scales on the cart and a weight of ½ cwt.

Held, that there was not a proper compliance with the bye-law, although it was possible to weigh any of the sacks of coal by means of the ½ cwt.

Special case stated by a petty sessional court held at Andover.

By powers given under the Weights and Measures Act, 1899, the County Council of Somerset passed a bye-law, duly approved by the Board of Trade, to the effect that coal vendors should carry on their carts accurate scales with weights amounting to 2 cwt.

On the 22nd of April, 1904, the respondent's cart contained sacks of coal weighing either 1 cwt. or ½ cwt., and scales with a weight of ½ cwt. only.

The appellant, an inspector of the said county council, thereupon took out a summons, but the magistrates refused to convict on the ground that the bye-law had been complied with, inasmuch as by means of the ½ cwt. weight the respondent could have weighed any sacks of coal on his cart.

C. A. S. Garland, for the appellant.

The respondent did not appear.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I think the point is one to which we ought to give effect. The statute contemplates that there should be a means of checking the weight of the bags tendered for sale, and it is intended that the weights should enable the inspector to weigh any bag which he picks out. It is not contended that the weight of the 1 cwt. bag could not be ascertained by weighing it in two portions or what probably would be more feasible, by weighing a ½ cwt. bag and treating it as an equivalent weight. But I think there should be weights to enable the inspector to weigh the bags, and we consider the magistrates ought to have convicted. They have decided that the bye-law was complied with, and, being a decision on the merits of the case, it ought to go back. I do not think there ought to be a heavy penalty, as the man acted innocently. The suggestion that he did not carry the weights because it would have meant carrying less coal is no answer to the section. I think the case must go back for conviction.

KENNEDY and RIDLEY, JJ., concurred.

Case sent back for conviction.

Solicitors, Leslie Field; Brownjohn & Co.

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

C. C. R.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Lawrance, Kennedy, Channell, and Phillimore, JJ.) — March 18.

REX v. CHANDRA DHARMA. (a.)

Criminal law—Procedure—Penal statute, Construction of—Retrospective and prospective operation—Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 69), s. 5, sub-section 1—Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1904 (4 Ed. 7, c. 15), s. 27.

The extension by a subsequent statute of the limit of time within which the prosecution of a statutory offence must be commenced, being a matter of procedure only, has a retrospective operation.

At the sessions held at Old Bailey, the 14th to the 16th January, 1905, the prisoner was convicted before Mr. Commissioner Rentoul of the offence of unlawfully and carnally knowing a girl more than thirteen years but less than sixteen years of age, under section 5, sub-section 1, of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, as amended by section 27 of the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1904. The offence was committed on the 15th of July, 1904.

At the trial counsel for the defence put the following submissions before the learned commissioner:

(1) That the proviso contained in section 5 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, directs "that no prosecution shall be commenced for an offence under sub-section 1 of this section more than three months after the commission of the offence," and that the prosecution had been commenced more than three months after the commission of the offence, viz., upon the 27th of December, 1904.

(2) That although by section 27 of the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1904, "the limit of time mentioned in the second proviso [the proviso above set out] of section 5 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, shall be six months after the commission of the offence," the said Act did not receive the Royal

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Assent until the 15th of August, 1904, and did not, in accordance with section 33, sub-section 3, thereof, come into operation until the 1st of October, 1904, both of such dates being subsequent to the date of the offence charged against the prisoner—viz., the 15th of July, 1904.

(3) That, having regard to the matters already set out, section 27 of the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1904, was not retrospective and did not apply to the offence of which the prisoner was convicted.

The learned commissioner convicted the prisoner, but submitted the following question for the opinion of the court: Whether the limit of time mentioned in section 27 of the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1904, applied to the prisoner's offence under section 5, sub-section 1, of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, or whether the second proviso of the last-named section alone applied.

Crompton Smith (C. W. Nicholson with him).—In Mitchell v. Brown, 1 Ellis & Ellis 267, it was held that although the offence in the first statute was not repealed in terms, yet it was in fact repealed by the later statute. [CHANNELL, J.—Your case is only authority that if provisions in two statutes are inconsistent, the later statute repeals the earlier.] [Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—Your real difficulty is this: Isn't this only a matter of procedure, and the operation therefore retrospective?] In penal statutes, more than in civil statutes, if there is a possibility of two constructions—one retrospective, the other prospective—the court is bound to accept the interpretation in favour of the latter. The latest case is Tuck & Sons v. Priester, 36 W. R. 93, 19 Q. B. D. 629, vide Lord Esher, at p. 638. King v. Griffiths, [1891] 2 Q. B. 145, is almost the only case of a criminal nature wherein the question of retrospective operation has been dealt with. [CHANNELL, J.—In that case there would have been no offence at all but for the statute.] [KENNEDY, J.—In this case there is actually an offence committed; the only point is, within what time must the prosecution be commenced.] [PHILLIMORE, J.—In some civilized countries you cannot prosecute for murder after ten years. Is no murder committed if the prosecution be not commenced within ten years?] By the Criminal Law Amendment Act, if the prosecution be not brought within three months, the man would be free. It would be a good defence to a subsequent prosecution. If the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act be held retrospective it places this man in a worse position than it did at the time the offence was committed. The principle has been laid down for years and is found in Bacon's Maxims, rule 8.

Hutton, for the prosecution, was not called upon.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J. — We none of us have any doubt that the construction of the statute by Mr. Commissioner Rentoul is correct. I think, as stated in the House of Lords, the rule is clearly established that, under ordinary circumstances apart from special considerations appearing upon the face of the statute, alterations as to procedure are retrospective. It has been decided that where there was a shortening of the time the alteration was retrospective, and one can see no reason, if this is so, why the lengthening of the time should not be retrospective. I agree with the principles quoted from Maxwell's Interpretation of Statutes, p. 298, et seq. I think if a new right is created, or a right is taken away, or a new obligation or duty or disability imposed in respect to a transaction then passed, the statute could not have a retrospective operation, and if it could have been fairly and properly argued that an essential ingredient of the offence had been altered, then these provisions could not be applied to offences committed before the passing of the Act. In my opinion it would not be correct to describe the alteration of the limit of time from three months to six months as being an alteration of the character of the offence or of the mode of the defence. The offence is not altered, its character is not altered, the defence to be raised is not altered. The time within which the prosecution can be commenced is extended; that is merely a matter of procedure, and the defence ought not to prevail. The conviction must be affirmed.

LAWRANCE, KENNEDY, CHANNELL, and PHILLIMORE, JJ., concurred.

Solicitors for the defence, Coburn & Co.

Solicitors for the prosecution, Moreton, Phillips, & Son.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

K. B. Div. (B'gham, J.) — Jan. 17.

In re EASTGATE.

Ex parte THE TRUSTEE. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Property of bankrupt—Title of trustee—Goods obtained by bankrupt on credit without intention to pay for them—Contract induced by fraud—Right of creditor to take back goods—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 43, 44.

Where a bankrupt has obtained goods on credit without any intention of paying for them the vendor is entitled to treat the contract of sale as having been induced by fraud, and to disaffirm the contract and take back his goods after notice of act of bankruptcy, provided that he disaffirms the contract within a reasonable time of his discovery of the fraud.

Motion by the trustee in the bankruptcy for a declaration that certain goods sold by the respondent Bowling to the bankrupt on credit, and taken back by Bowling with notice of an available act of bankruptcy, formed part of the estate of the bankrupt, and for an order that they be delivered up to the trustee.

In February, 1904, the bankrupt, Eastgate, took a house at Sutton, Surrey, on the strength of false references, and proceeded to order goods from the tradesmen in the neighbourhood. Bowling, the respondent, supplied him with goods on credit to the value of £9 7s. 4d. between the 9th of March and the 15th of April.

On the 20th of April Bowling issued a summons in the county court for the price of the goods, but on the same day the landlord put in a distress for rent and found that the bankrupt had departed to avoid his creditors, thus committing an act of bankruptcy on or about that date.

On the 27th of April Bowling and some other creditors went to the house, and, having effected an entrance, took back the goods which they had supplied.

A bankruptcy petition was presented on the 4th of May, and a receiving order was made, and Eastgate was adjudged bankrupt on the 20th of May.

The bankrupt having been found guilty of frauds in another part of England, was sentenced to five years' penal servitude, and while serving that sentence he was charged by some Sutton creditors other than Bowling with obtaining credit by fraud, to which charge he pleaded guilty at the Surrey Sessions on the 16th of August, 1904.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Clayton, for the trustee.—The bankrupt did not obtain these goods from the respondent by means of any fraud or false pretence, he obtained them on credit in the ordinary way; the property passed to him under a contract of sale. After notice of an act of bankruptcy the creditor could not disaffirm the contract. If the bankrupt had given him back the goods it would have been a fraudulent preference: In re Fletcher, Ex parte Suffolk, 9 Morr. 8. At the date of the commencement of the bankruptcy these goods were the property of the bankrupt, and consequently became vested in the trustee.

S. G. Lushington, for the respondent.—It is quite clear that at the time when the bankrupt obtained these goods he had no intention of paying for them, and that amounts to a fraudulent representation which will allow the vendor to disaffirm the contract even after he has knowledge of an act of bankruptcy. They were obtained by fraud and the trustee has no title to them: Noad v. Green, 15 M. & W. 216.

Clayton replied.

BIGHAM, J.—The question which I have to determine is whether at the time when Bowling took possession of these goods they formed part of the bankrupt's estate. I think they did not.

The bankrupt took a house at Sutton in February, 1904, and then began to make purchases in the neighbourhood on credit. In my opinion he never had the least intention of paying for any of the goods which he bought. He pretended falsely to the persons from whom he got the goods that he intended to pay for them when in reality he did not intend anything of the kind, and in that way he got possession of the goods.

In my opinion, as soon as the vendors found out that he had bought their goods without any intention of paying for them, they were entitled to treat the contracts as contracts obtained by fraud, and to disaffirm them within a reasonable time after the discovery of the fraud. In this case the sales took place between the 9th of March and the 15th of April. On the 20th of April, as Bowling did not get his money, he instituted proceedings in the county court to recover the price. He did not at that time know the circumstances. But a day or two later Bowling discovered that the bankrupt had absconded and committed an act of bankruptcy, and then for the first time found out the fraud. In my view he then disaffirmed the contract and, as he was entitled to do, he took back his property. The question now arises, did this property, at the time he took it, belong to the bankrupt's estate? The trustee acquires only the interest of the bankrupt in property he finds in the bankrupt's possession, he takes it subject to the rights of third parties. This property was subject to the vendor's right to disaffirm the contract of sale and retake possession of the goods.

Application dismissed.

Solicitors for the trustee, Spence, Gibson, & Co.

Solicitors for respondent, Parker, Garrett, Holman, & Howden, for Rose, Sutton.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (In Bkcy.) (Vaughan Williams and Stirling, L.JJ., and Barnes, P.) } March 3, 11, 13.

In re CARTER & ELLIS.
Ex parte SAVILL BROTHERS (LIMITED). (a.)

Bankruptcy—Lessee—Disclaimer—Mortgage by sub-demise—Vesting order—Liabilities of mortgagee—Discretion of court—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 55 (1) (2) (6)—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 13.

The intention of the Legislature in enabling the trustee of a bankrupt to disclaim onerous property is to interfere as little as possible with the rights and liabilities of third parties. In exercising the wide discretion given to it, in the case of a disclaimer of leasehold property, by section 13 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, the court should give effect as far as possible to this intention, and see that its discretion is so exercised that not only do the sub-lessees, or mortgagees by sub-demise, gain no advantage, but also that no injustice is thereby done to the landlords.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Registrar Giffard.

By seven indentures of lease, each dated the 1st of March, 1904, made in pursuance of a previous building agreement the Coopers' Company demised to Messrs. Carter & Ellis seven messuages in Beckton-road, West Ham, for, in each case, a term of ninety-nine years from the 29th of September, 1903, at a small ground-rent, the rents varying from £4 10s. to £3 10s.

Any assignment of the leases was to be registered with the clerk of the lessor company, but, except for that, there was no restriction on the right of the lesses to assign.

By indenture of the 1st of March, 1904; Carter & Ellis demised the several messuages to Savill Brothers (Limited) for the residues then unexpired of the several terms of ninety-nine years except the last day of each term by way of mortgage for securing the sum of £1,864 11s. 1d., and interest.

On the 24th of March, 1904, a petition in bankruptcy against Carter & Ellis was filed; on the 12th of April a receiving order was made against them, and on the 19th of April they were adjudged bankrupts. The official receiver, the trustee in the bankruptcy, on the 10th of November, 1904, disclaimed all interest in the several leases of the 1st of March, 1904. Savill Brothers made no application for an order vesting the property in them and making them subject to the same liabilities as the bankrupts were subject to under the leases at the date of the filing of the petition. The registrar, on the 6th of February, 1905, upon the application of the lessors, made an order that unless Savill Brothers (Limited) should within the time mentioned "elect to accept and apply for an order vesting in them the premises disclaimed by the trustee, and making them subject to the same liabilities as the bankrupts were subject to under the leases in respect of the premises at the date of the filing of the petition, they should be, and were thereby, excluded from all interest in and security upon the said premises."

Savill Brothers appealed.

The houses built on the property were new houses, and the rent had been paid, and the covenants of the leases had been observed.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The lessees had made a second mortgage by deposit in favour of a Mr. Phillips, but he did not ask for any vesting order.

The following are the material sections of the Bankruptcy Acts:

Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 55: "(1) Where any part of the property of the bankrupt consists of land of any tenure burdened with onerous covenants, of shares or stock in companies, of unprofitable contracts, or of any other property that is unsaleable, or not readily saleable, by reason of its binding the possessor thereof to the performance of any onerous act, or to the payment of any sum of money, the trustee, notwithstanding that he has endeavoured to sell or has taken possession of the property, or exercised any act of ownership in relation thereto, but subject to the provisions of this section, may, by writing signed by him, at any time within three months after the first appointment of a trustee disclaim the property. . . . (2) The disclaimer shall operate to determine, as from the date of disclaimer, the rights, interests, and liabilities of the bankrupt and his property in or in respect of the property disclaimed, and shall also discharge the trustee from all personal liability in respect of the property disclaimed as from the date when the property vested in him, but shall not, except so far as is necessary for the purpose of releasing the bankrupt and his property and the trustee from liability, affect the rights and liabilities of any other person." "(6) The court may on application by any person either claiming any interest in any disclaimed property, or under any liability not discharged by this Act in respect of any disclaimed property, and on hearing such persons as it thinks fit, make an order for the vesting of the property in or delivery thereof to any person entitled thereto, or to whom it may seem just that the same should be delivered by way of compensation for such liability as aforesaid, or a trustee for him, and on such terms as the court thinks just, and on any such vesting order being made the property comprised therein shall vest accordingly in the person therein named in that behalf without any conveyance or assignment for the purpose. Provided always that where the property disclaimed is of a leasehold nature, the court shall not make a vesting order in favour of any person claiming under the bankrupt, whether as underlessee or as mortgagee by demise, except upon the terms of making such person subject to the same liabilities and obligations as the bankrupt was subject to under the lease in respect of the property at the date when the bankruptcy petition was filed, and any mortgagee or underlessee declining to accept a vesting order on such terms shall be excluded from all interest and security upon the property, and, if there shall be no person claiming under the bankrupt who is willing to accept such an order upon such terms, the court shall have power to vest the bankrupt's estate and interest in the property in any person liable either personally or in a representative character, and either alone or jointly with the bankrupt to perform the lessee's covenants in such lease freed and discharged from all estates, incumbrances, and interests created therein by the bankrupt."

Bankruptcy Act, 1890, s. 13: "The period of twelve months shall be substituted for each of the periods of three months and two months limited by sub-section 1 of section 55 of the principal Act, and such period of twelve months may be extended by the court. The court may, if it thinks fit, modify the terms prescribed by the proviso in sub-section 6 of the same section, so as to make the person in whose favour the vesting order may be made subject only to the same liabilities and obligations as if the lease that had been assigned to him at a date when the bankruptcy petition was filed and (if the case so requires) as if the lease had comprised only the property comprised in the vesting order."

Astbury, K.C., and Hansell, for the appellants.—We claim the benefit of section 13 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890. That section was introduced to meet cases which were found to bear hardly upon mortgagees. In the present case unless the section is applied either the mortgagees will lose their security altogether or they will be liable for the whole period of ninety-nine years under the covenants in the lease as if they had been the original lessees. It is difficult to imagine any case in which the court would apply section 13 if not in the present. This case is distinct from In re Walker, 2 Morr. 60, 43 W. R. Dig. 15, where a similar application was refused, because in that case there had been breaches of the covenant prior to the bankruptcy, and the effect of an order vesting the leaseholds in the mortgagees as from the date of the bankruptcy would have been to deprive the landlord of his remedies in respect of those breaches.

They also cited In re Finlay, 37 W. R. 6, 21 Q. B. D. 475.

Upjohn, K.C., and Wace, for the respondents.—Section 13 of the Act of 1890 only gives the court a discretion to modify the terms prescribed by section 55 (b) if it thinks fit. It follows, therefore, that to induce the court to exercise such discretion the appellants must show good cause. There is no reason in the present case why the mortgagees should not be subject to the same terms and liabilities as were imposed on the bankrupt by the original lease.

Astbury, K.C., in reply cited Doe v. Pyke, 5 M. & S. 146; Smalley v. Hardinge, 29 W. R. 554, 7 Q. B. D. 524.

Cur. adv. vult.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., referred to the facts, and continued: The question that we have to determine is whether the order of the learned registrar, having regard to the state of things which are recited in the order, was a right order to make or not. The contention of the appellants is that the order which should have been made was an order in pursuance of section 13 of the Act of 1890 vesting the premises, the subject of the mortgage, in them subject only to the same liabilities and obligations as if the lease had been assigned to them at the date when the bankruptcy was filed. In my judgment, the order of the learned registrar was not the right order, and I think that the contention of the appellants is substantially right. Section 55 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and section 13 of the Act of 1890, taken together, are not very easy to construe, and I can very well understand the difficulty that may have presented itself to the mind of the learned registrar when he was asked to apply these two sections to the state of things existing in the present case. I do not propose in this judgment to determine or to express any opinion upon anything beyond that which it is absolutely necessary to do in the decision of this case.

I propose, before dealing with the sections in detail, to say, generally, what the ground of any decision in this case is. I am of opinion that the intention of the Legislature in cases of disclaimer by a trustee in bankruptcy appears to have been, when providing for the relief of the trustee from liability in respect of onerous obligations, including the obligations arising under a lease, to do so with as little disturbance as might be by reason of the disclaimer of the rights and liabilities of third persons. That appears in sub-section 2 of section 55. The basis of my judgment in this case is that the order made by the registrar does affect the rights and liabilities of the appellants in a way which is not necessary for the purpose of releasing the bankrupt and his property and the trustee from liability.

Under these circumstances I have to consider whether the order asked for by the appellants is an order which will really carry out the intention of the Legislature as declared in sub-section 2 of section 55, and do that without doing any injustice to the ground landlords. I think that such an order, putting the appellants in the position of assignees of the lease, is an order which will best carry out the declaration of intention by the Legislature, and is also an order which inflicts no injustice upon the ground landlords. At common law, if there was a lease and a sub-lease, and the lease for any reason whatsoever became extinguished, the sub-lease disappeared—the branch fell with the tree. But then the Legislature stepped in, and to some extent in the reign of George II., and finally by the Real Property Amendment Act, 1845, provision was made for preserving the rights of the sub-lessee in cases in which there was a voluntary surrender of the lease accepted by the landlords. Under the Acts of Parliament dealing with bankruptcy prior to 1869 there was no particular provision made for disclaimer whatsoever. The assignee in bankruptcy was not bound to accept a damnosa hæréditas, and the lease was left outside the property which passed to the representatives of the creditors. This led to a great deal of difficulty and litigation, and in 1869 provision was made for the first time for disclaimer, and, to put it shortly, that disclaimer was intended expressly to operate as if there had been a voluntary surrender by the disclaiming trustees. No doubt that provision was expressly put into the Act to preserve the rights of sub-lessees and others claiming under the lessee. But this was found not to work perfectly, and when the Act of 1883 was passed section 55 was substituted for section 23 of the Act of 1869, and the words about the disclaimer operating as a surrender are omitted from section 55. The Legislature did not content itself with merely making the declaration, which appears in sub-section 2 of that section, but made a further provision in the first clause of sub-section 6 to enable effect to be given to that declaration. Then, having dealt thus with onerous property generally, the proviso in sub-section 6 goes on to deal with the particular case of leases. If that sub-section had remained unmodified I think the order made by the learned registrar would have been perfectly right; but it became apparent, by reason of cases which came into court, that to make the underlessee, or other person claiming through the lessee, accept all the liabilities of the lessee or otherwise be excluded from all interest in and security upon the property might work injustice, and might be really a most grave departure from the declaration of the Legislature in sub-section 2 of section 55, that the disclaimer should not, except so far as necessary for the purpose of releasing the bankrupt and his property and the trustee from liability, affect the rights and liabilities of other persons; and that being so, the Legislature enacted the provision contained in section 13 of the Act of 1890.

I do not read section 13 of the Act of 1890 as a repeal of the proviso in sub-section 6 of section 55 of the Act of 1883, nor do I read it as making it obligatory upon the court in all cases of a character falling within the proviso in sub-section 6 of section 55 to make an order putting the sub-lessee in a position where he is subject only to the same liabilities as if the lease had been assigned to him at the date when the bankruptcy petition was filed. The court has always a discretion in the matter. I had, when sitting in the Court of Bankruptcy, to construe section 13 in In re Walker, and in that case, which was a case in which the real question at issue between the parties was whether or not the vesting order was to leave the person in whom the property was to vest subject to the liabilites accruing by reason of past breaches of covenant, I thought that it would be unjust to make an order that those persons should take the property subject only to the same liabilities and obligations as if the lease had been assigned to them at the date when the bankruptcy petition was filed. If I recollect rightly, the suggestion in that case was of intermediate breaches between those two dates. I acted upon that view, but I should have declined to make the order contemplated by section 55 of the Act of 1883 if the lessor had not been willing to accept certain conditions which were embodied in my order. I do not mention that case as affecting this case further than this—that it was a case in which I was of opinion that section 13 did not make it obligatory upon me to make the vesting order as upon an assignment of the lease, but gave me discretion as to whether I would make the order or not. I was only willing to make the order if the person desiring it was willing on his part to accept some conditions which I thought essential to doing justice between the parties.

I wish to say, before parting with the discussion, of section 55 and section 13, that I am not satisfied at present that the person to whom the vesting order is offered at the time of the application of the landlord being heard is entitled to say that for all purposes the onus of proof must be thrown upon the landlord, and that for no purpose can the sub-lessee, or other person having an interest derived under the lease, be treated as an applicant. I do not know that I have to decide any such question, and I do not propose, therefore, to decide it; but I am not satisfied at present that the argument which was addressed to us as to the position of the sub-lessee is sound.

Now, asking myself the question whether the order vesting the property in the mortgagees by sub-demise, if it should be made in the shape contemplated by section 13 of the Act of 1890, would give to them anything more than they would have had if there had been no disclaimer. I am of opinion that, in substance, to make them now in the position of assignees of the lease would give them nothing more than they would have had if there had been no disclaimer at all. In these particular leases there is no restriction on assignment. There is a provision that the assignment is to be registered; but, apart from that, the lessee has an absolute right to assign, and it seems to me that if the lessee had assigned this lease to the mortgagees, the landlords could not have interfered or complained at all, and it seems to me further, that the position of the sub-lessees on becoming assignees of the lease would have been substantially identical with the position of a sub-lessee if an order is made in his favour under the powers of section 13 of the Act of 1890. But even if that were not the case (and I express my opinion most positively that it is the case), it is perfectly manifest that to make an order in the terms in which this order has been made would put the mortgagees by sub-demise in a very much worse position than they would have been if there had been no disclaimer. But I do not think that when one has considered in this way the position of the mortgagee by sub-demise, and arrived at the conclusion that no profit, no improvement in position, is being given to him by an order made under the powers of section 13, one has considered all that it is incumbent upon the court to consider, the court having, as I have already stated, a discretion in the exercise of those powers. I think that, having that discretion, the court ought to go a step further and ask whether it may not be that, notwithstanding that the position of the mortgagee by sub-demise is not improved, yet some injustice would be done to the landlord. In my judgment, it is just as obligatory upon the court to see that no such injustice is done to the landlord by making the order as it is to avoid, if possible, giving a profit or advantage to the mortgagee. Asking myself the question in this case, I cannot see, having regard to the terms of these leases, that any injustice whatever is done to the landlords. Of course it is open to a landlord at the time when the lease is made to insert provisions which would put him in a better position than these landlords are in the event either of the lessee wishing to assign or of his becoming bankrupt. But the parties to this bargain have not chosen to insert any such provisions in the leases. Under those circumstances I come unhesitatingly to the conclusion that no injustice is done to the landlord in this case; and I think that when once we come to the conclusion that the mortgagees by subdemise obtained no undue advantage by an order under section 13—that is to say, no improvement in their position from what it was potentially under the terms of the leases and the subdemise—and also to the conclusion that no injustice is done to the landlords, it follows almost necessarily that our judicial discretion ought to be exercised by making the order which is contemplated by section 13.

The result, therefore, in this case is, that the order appealed against will be reversed, and that an order will be made vesting these leases in Messrs. Savill Brothers, subject only to the same liabilities and obligations as if the leases had been assigned to them at the date when the bankruptcy petition was filed.

With regard to Mr. Phillips, who is mortgagee by deposit, he is represented here by the counsel who represents Messrs. Savill Brothers, and he does not ask us to make any special order for his protection. I can quite understand that, because it seems to me that in substance the order for the vesting of this property in the mortgagees by subdemise as if they were assignees affords all necessary protection to Mr. Phillips as mortgagee by deposit.

STIRLING, L.J.—I have arrived at the same conclusion. I only mean to decide that this is a case in which the discretion which is given to the court by section 13 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, may be properly exercised in favour of the mortgagees, and I arrive at that conclusion upon consideration of all the circumstances of the case. [His lordship referred to the facts, observing that there was no question in the case of any right of the lessors to enter in respect of any breach of covenant, and that there was no evidence to show that due care had not been exercised by the lessors in granting the leases and by the mortgagees in making the advance. He continued:] That being so, the question we have to consider is whether the order made by the registrar ought to stand, or whether, in favour of the mortgagees, the discretion conferred by section 13 of the Act of 1890 is to be exercised. The position of the matter as it stood under the Act of 1883 was considered by the Court of Appeal in In re Finley, and Lindley, L.J., in his judgment, points out the striking result of the provisions of sub-section 6 of section 55 of the Act of 1883. He says: "Whether the application is made by the sub-lessee or by the original lessor, in either case the vesting order can only be made in favour of the sub-lessee subject to the covenants and conditions of the original lease; and if the sub-lessee will not take the property on those terms, which, of course, he need not do, then these consequences appear to follow: First, the sub-lessee will be excluded from all interest in the disclaimed property; whether the latter part of the proviso in clause 6 will apply will depend upon whether there is any such person as is there referred to. There may or may not be. If no vesting order is made, the lease will be determined under sub-section 2, the sub-lease will be determined under sub-section 6, and the lessor will take the property freed from both lease and sub-lease. This appears to us to be the logical consequence of the Act, and it is impossible not to see that it is a very startling result. It will very seriously affect the old practice of taking securities on leasehold property by way of sub-demise, the whole object of which was to prevent the mortgagee from becoming liable to the rent and to the covenants and obligations of the original lease. In that state of things the Act of 1890 was passed containing the provision in section 13.

Two things seem to me to deserve notice with regard to that section: First, the operation of the section is somewhat narrow in its scope. Lindley, L.J., in the passage in In re Finley which I have read pointed out that the provisions of sub-section 6 of section 55 of the Act of 1883 would seriously affect the practice of taking securities on leasehold property by way of sub-demise, and that the object of that mode of taking a mortgage was to prevent the mortgagee from becoming liable to the performance of the covenants. The mortgagee lending money only wanted good security for his money, and had no intention whatever of undertaking the performance of the duties of lessee. But the Legislature has not seen fit to give the court any power at all to put him back in his old position. His sole choice is between taking a vesting order making him subject to the same liabilities and obligations as the bankrupt was subject to under the lease in respect of the property at the date when the bankruptcy petition was filed, and being made subject only to the same liabilities and obligations as if the lease had been assigned to him at the same date. The second point which deserves to be noticed I think is the very wide discretion which is given to the court. The court may if it thinks fit modify the terms prescribed by the proviso. No class of cases is pointed at in particular to which that section is to apply. There is no limitation on the discretion except that it is to be a judicial discretion.

That being so, what ought to be done in the present case? In the one case the lessors will get solvent tenants subject for a term of ninety-nine years, with the covenant for a payment of rent and the performance of other covenants which will in the end be more serious than the payment of the rent. In the other case they will only get persons who are solvent who will be responsible for the payment of the rent and performance of the covenants during the period when they occupy or continue to be assignees of the property, and who will be at liberty, as any other assignee of the bankrupt would be, to assign over as they may see fit without any restrictions.

Looking at all the facts of the case, I ask myself which seems to be the better justice of the two? I think that if the lessors were to get solvent tenants who happen to be a corporation, and whose personal liability therefore may be very readily enforceable during the period of ninety-nine years put in the position of their own tenant—the lessors having granted their lease and the mortagees having taken their mortgage on the same day—most people would say that the lessors were very lucky indeed. In my judgment the better justice in all the circumstances of this case is that we should exercise the discretion in favour of the mortgagees and say that they are only to be made subject to the same liabilities and obligations as if the lease had been assigned to them at the date when the bankruptcy petition was presented.

Sir GORELL BARNES, P.—The appellants' contention in this case is that they ought to be at liberty to have a vesting order of the disclaimed property subject only to the same liabilities and obligations as if the lease had been assigned to them at the date when the bankruptcy petition was filed. The opposing contention is that the appellants ought to take a vesting order making them subject to the same liabilities and obligations as the bankrupt was subject to under the lease in respect of the property at the date when the bankruptcy petition was filed. The contention of the appellants appears to me in the circumstances of this particular case to be right. I cannot see that in this case any injustice will be done to the lessor by acceding to the appellants' contention, whereas the order as it stands imposes, in my view, unreasonable tems on the appellants and puts them in a position which is contrary to the intention of the provisions of sub-section 2 of section 55 of the Act of 1883. I therefore agree with the judgments which have been pronounced.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Sandilands & Co.; E. L. Boyce.

From K. B. Div. (In Bkcy.). (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Feb. 3.

In re BUTTON.
Ex parte VOSS. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Petition—Secured creditor—Estimate of value of security—Proof in bankruptcy—Undervalue—Mistake—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 6 (2), 7 (3).

If in a petition in bankruptcy, presented by a secured creditor, an estimate of the value of the security is given in accordance with sub-section 2 of section 6 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the court will not inquire into the correctness of the estimate, provided that the estimate is genuine and not a mere sham. But the secured creditor cannot take any benefit from the administration in bankruptcy except on the basis of the estimate. Whether he may amend his estimate upon proof of mistake as to value, quære.

Ex parte Taylor, In re Lacey, 13 Q. B. D. 128, and In re Vautin, Ex parte Saffery, 48 W. R. 96, discussed.

This was an appeal by a debtor from a receiving order.

On the 31st of March, 1904, the debtor gave William Voss a promissory note for £300 for money lent, and he also charged certain leasehold premises in Bethnal Green in favour of Voss as security for the loan.

On the 7th of October Voss obtained judgment against the debtor on the promissory note for £300 with interest and costs.

On the 4th of November Voss served a bankruptcy notice on the debtor for payment of the amount of the judgment debt. The debtor failed to comply with this notice, and on the 29th of November Voss presented a bankruptcy petition against him for £316 18s. 2d. Voss stated in the petition that he held security for the debt, and that he estimated the value of his security at £265, thus leaving a balance of £51 odd unsecured. The debtor, in an affidavit filed in opposition to the petition, stated that the value of the security was not less than £600, and he asked for an adjournment to arrange a transfer of the security or satisfy the claim.

The petition came on for hearing on the 20th of December, and was adjourned by consent till the 3rd of January, 1905, upon the terms of an agreement whereby the debtor agreed to pay Voss £50 and the costs of his petition, and to pay the debt of another creditor who had also filed his petition, and whose petition came on for hearing concurrently with Voss's petition; and the debtor admitted Voss's debt and undertook not to oppose the petition at the adjourned hearing.

On the adjourned hearing of the 3rd of January, 1905, the debtor attempted to raise the question as to the sufficiency of the petitioning creditor's debt, but the registrar held that he was precluded from doing so by the terms of the agreement for adjournment, and he made a receiving order.

The debtor appealed.

Upon the appeal further affidavit evidence was adduced on both sides as to the value of the security.

The debtor's surveyors fixed the value of the security at from £480 to £560, the petitioning creditor's surveyor at £250.

Tindale Davis, for the debtor.—There is no good petitioning creditor's debt, because if the security were properly valued it would cover the debt. A petitioning creditor may value his security under section 6 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and then rest on his security without proving; or if he does prove there is nothing to bind him to his valuation. It is submitted Ex parte Taylor, In re Lacy, 13 Q. B. D. 128, 32 W. R. Dig. 21, was wrongly decided, because the Divisional Court in that case assumed that the bankruptcy rules apply to the valuation in the petition, whereas they only a ply to the valuation in the proof: In re Vautin, Ex parte Saffery, 48 W. R. 96, [1899] 2 Q. B. 549. The result is that a petitioning creditor may obtain a receiving order by undervaluing his security and then decline to take any further proceedings in the bankruptcy, and so ruin the estate. Such an undervaluation is, therefore, "other sufficient cause" within section 7 (3). The case is also within section 7 (3) because the petitioning creditor put pressure on the debtor and obtained an unfair advantage for himself.

In re Otway, [1895] 1 Q. B. 812, 43 W. R. Dig. 17; Moor v. Anglo-Italian Bank, 27 W. R. 652, 10 Ch. D. 681; In re Pogose, 30 W. R. 930, 20 Ch. D. 289, were also referred to.

Frank Mellor, for the petitioning creditor.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—Having regard to the contents of these affidavits it seems to me impossible to say that the creditor has not complied with the requirements of sub-section 2 of section 6 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, in the case of a petition by a secured creditor. Sub-section 2 is as follows: [His lordship read the sub-section, and continued:] It seems to me that the petitioning creditor has in fact complied with the provision as to valuation of his security; he has given an estimate, and it is admitted that his estimate is such that it is impossible to say that it is a mere sham, or not a substantial estimate. It was urged upon us that the registrar should, when a petitioning creditor estimates his security, inquire whether the estimate is right. I think the intention of this sub-section, which throws on the creditor the duty of making an estimate, was to avoid the necessity for any such inquiries. It is said that that is not likely to have been the intention of the Legislature, because it would enable a malicious or unscrupulous creditor to make a fictitious estimate or undervalue his security and obtain a receiving order upon that estimate, though in truth and in fact his debt was fully secured or was so much secured that the balance would be insufficient to support a bankruptcy petition. The answer is that the petitioning creditor makes the estimate at his own risk, and though when the bankruptcy comes about sub-section 2 of section 6 may not apply, as was stated by Wright, J., in Re Vautin, Ex parte Saffery—and I am inclined to think it would not apply—yet when he comes in to prove the petitioning creditor is bound in this sense, that he cannot take any benefit in the administration in bankruptcy except on the basis of the estimate which he made in his petition. I very much doubt whether he ought in any circumstances to be allowed to amend his valuation and come in. It may be that he is not bound in the sense that the trustee is entitled to redeem the property at that valuation, but that is something which is not the act of the petitioning creditor. In my opinion the moment when we arrive at the conclusion that the estimate is a real estimate and not a sham we ought not to go into the question as to what is the true value after the declaration of the estimated value. There is also the further point as to whether the debtor could in this case go into the question at all, whether the petitioning creditor had complied with the statute, because it was said that he was precluded from doing so by the terms of the consent order. In my judgment the registrar ought always to be careful, although there is a consent that a receiving order is not made in such circumstances that the other creditors might be prejudiced. That, I understand, was the ground of the decision in those cases in which the judgment has proceeded on, that or some other estoppel. In circumstances like that the court has always held that it ought to refuse to make the receiving order, as that would be a case coming under the words "for other sufficient cause" in sub-section 3 of section 7. There is only one other matter to be dealt with in the second point that was made. It was said that the receiving order ought not to be made in this case because the creditor, by getting such an agreement as was embodied in the consent order, was using the bankruptcy law for a purpose for which it was not intended. I am aware that anyone who has any extensive experience of bankruptcy proceedings knows that a petitioning creditor constantly makes use of bankruptcy proceedings for the very purpose of extorting twenty shillings in the pound for himself from a debtor who has a large number of creditors, with the result that they find themselves in a very disadvantageous position if that position is prosecuted. Therefore I think that we should always look with some care at a case where an agreement is obtained as a condition of the adjudication of the petitioner, to see whether the petitioning creditor is obtaining any advantage for himself which he ought not to obtain over the other creditors. But though that is so no one would say that every adjudication to give the debtor an opportunity of paying the debt is contrary to the intention of the Bankruptcy Act. That may be perfectly fair. The Legislature and those who drafted the rules have taken effective means to prevent this abuse from frequently occurring. Under rule 169 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886-1890, after the expiration of one month from the day appointed for the first hearing of the petition no further adjournment can take place except on certain specified grounds or for some other sufficient reason to be stated in the order for adjournment. The result is that on the whole I think that there is nothing in the present case to justify us in saying that the process in bankruptcy was improperly used in order to make it right for us to allow the appeal. The appeal will therefore be dismissed.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ROMER, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion for the same reasons, and I have nothing to add.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons. I only wish to add a few observations on the important question which has been argued as to the effect of the estimate by the creditor of the value of his security in his petition. The statute requires a secured creditor either to give up his security for the benefit of the creditors or to give an estimate of the value of his security. It was said that if the petitioning creditor gives an estimate of the value of his security he is not bound by it, but can, when he comes in to prove his debt, without saying that he made a mistake at the time of presenting his petition, prove for his debt, putting his security at a different value. I cannot agree. If he states that he is willing to give up his security for the benefit of the creditors if the debtor is adjudged bankrupt, and he is adjudged bankrupt, the creditor is not allowed to prove unless he does give up his security, and if he gives an estimate of its value it would lead to serious consequences and would be most unjust if he were allowed to depart from that estimate without evidence of mistake and prove on a different footing—that is to say, if in the same bankruptcy proceedings he were allowed to depart from his own valuation. It is in that sense that I understand the decision in Ex parte Taylor, In re Lacey.

I should be slow to depart from the decision given twenty years ago of two very eminent judges, Cave, J., and Smith, L.J., of whom the former had a special knowledge of the bankruptcy law. I should feel no doubt about it but for the fact that I see there is a difficulty which might occur, and which was pointed out by Wright J., in In re Vautin, Ex parte Saffery. Suppose a petitioning creditor after obtaining an adjudication takes no further step in the bankruptcy and holds his security, I have great difficulty in seeing how his estimate is in that case to be enforced against him. I see the difficulty that Wright, J., did, and I feel the force of his observation, that there is nothing in the Act about that, but all that there is goes to show, and justice requires, that a creditor coming in to prove should be bound by his valuation of his security. I reserve the question which may arise, whether he is entitled to alter his estimate if he proves that it was made under a mistake as to the value. That is a point which Wright, J., has decided, but I prefer to reserve consideration of the question until it arises. I certainly agree that this appeal must be dismissed.

Solicitors, M. Edwards, Williams, & Co.; R. Voss & Son.

From K. B. D. (In Bkcy.).
(Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Dec. 16, 19.

In re FLEW.
Ex parte FLEW. (a.)

Bankruptcy — Scheme of arrangement — Consent of creditors—Reasonable security—Speculative scheme—Approval by court—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 3 (9).

Though the court is reluctant to refuse to approve a scheme which has been passed unanimously by the creditors, it is always open to the court to consider whether the scheme is or is not for the benefit of the creditors, and if the scheme appear to the court to be of too speculative a character the court may withhold its approval, notwithstanding that the creditors are unanimous in support of the scheme. Where the court refuses to approve a scheme an immediate adjudication of bankruptcy against the debtor will only be made in very exceptional circumstances.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal from the refusal of the registrar to approve a scheme of arrangement by debtors with their creditors. The debtors were F. R. Flew and J. P. Flew, who carried on business as builders.

On the 15th of July, 1904, a receiving order was made against them on the petition of a creditor. At the adjourned meeting of creditors, held on the 23rd of August, a resolution was passed by a proper majority accepting a scheme of arrangement proposed by the debtors. The scheme provided for the vesting in a trustee to be appointed by the creditors of all property of the debtors which would become divisible if they were adjudged bankrupt. The trustee was to administer the property as if there had been a bankruptcy, and he had been appointed trustee therein. On approval of the scheme by the court the trustee was to pay in full all Board of Trade and court fees then due, including the fees and expenses of the official receiver. He was then to pay in full all preferential debts directed by the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and the Preferential Payments in Bankruptcy Act, 1888, to be paid in priority to other debts.

Clause 4: "To pay to all their unsecured creditors in respect of all debts provable under the receiving order made against the debtors, and in full satisfaction and discharge of the same a composition of 20s. in the pound, payable in instalments of not less than 2s. 6d. in the pound, as and when the realization of the debtors' assets will allow." By clause 6, on the approval of the court, the receiving order was to be discharged. By clause 7, five persons therein named were to be appointed a committee of inspection. "8. That in consideration of this scheme and upon approval thereof by the court, and only in such case, the mortgagees (under specified mortgages of property belonging to the debtors) agree not to foreclose for a period of twelve months from the date of such approval, provided the same is obtained on or before the 31st of October, 1904, and in the event of the above-named trustee realizing or attempting to realize the said properties, to assist him so far as they can to realize the same as far as possible in the interests of the unsecured creditors, subject, nevertheless, to the payment in full to the mortgagees of all moneys owing under their security." "9. That upon the approval by the court of this scheme, and only in such case, family creditors having claims amounting to £820, whilst reserving their rights to prove and vote at meetings of creditors or upon this scheme, are prepared to postpone their claims to dividend until all other unsecured creditors have received 20s. in the pound."

By his report, dated the 20th of October, 1904, the official receiver reported that proofs had been made by sixty-nine joint creditors for sums amounting to £5,281 17s., and that he estimated that the total ranking joint indebtedness would amount to £5,391 4s. 8d. This estimate was, however, formed upon the assumption that none of the creditors regarded by the debtors as fully secured would seek to rank for dividend. The preferential debts amounted to about £151.

The joint assets were returned, as estimated, to produce about £29,910, but in his view there was no possibility of any such amount being realized. He reported that the debtor's assets were not of a value equal to 10s. in the pound on the amount of unsecured liabilities; that the debtors had omitted to keep proper books of account; that the debtors had brought on their failure by rash and hazardous speculations. "And with regard to the debtors' proposal, that it cannot be regarded as reasonable or as providing the security required by section 3, sub-section 9, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890—i.e., reasonable security for payment of not less than 7s. 6d. in the pound on all the unsecured debts provable against the debtors' estate."

The debtors' application for the approval of the scheme was supported by sixty-seven creditors whose debts amounted to £5,315 4s. 4d. out of a total of seventy-eight creditors whose debts amounted to £5,505 15s. 11d.

The registrar refused to approve the scheme (1) because the agreement of some creditors to stand by until a certain event as to certain debts had occurred, and as to other debts to abstain from foreclosure for twelve months brought the case within the decision in In re Pilling, 51 W. R. 465, [1903] 2 K. B. 50; (2) because the scheme was too speculative.

The debtors appealed.

By section 3 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, sub-section 9: "If any facts are proved on proof of which the court would be required either to refuse, suspend, or attach conditions to the debtor's discharge were he adjudged bankrupt, the court shall refuse to approve the proposal, unless it provides reasonable security for payment of not less than 7s. 6d. in the pound on all the unsecured debts provable against the debtor's estate."

Muir Mackenzie, for the debtors.—There being here a reasonable commercial probability that the unsecured creditors will receive 7s. 6d. in the pound, there is "reasonable security" within section 3, sub-section 9, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890: In re Bottomley, 10 Morr. 262. The creditors are the best judges of what is for their benefit, and they are practically unanimous.

Carrington, for the creditors.

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G., and S. G. Lushington, for the official receiver, were not called upon.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I think that this appeal must be dismissed. I propose to base my judgment on one point, and on one point only. [His lordship read sub-section 9 of section 3 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, and continued:] In my judgment in this proposal there is no such security as is there referred to.

I am of opinion that this scheme is a very speculative scheme indeed, and that it does not provide reasonable security even for 7s. 6d. in the pound. I am quite aware that the learned registrar in his judgment said that as there was a proposal to pay here 20s. in the pound, it may be he had not to decide what is the meaning of "unsecured debts provable against a debtor's estate" in the sub-section. But, in my judgment, we are bound to consider amongst other matters what sort of security is afforded here. Generally speaking, where there is an estate, and especially where there is an estate which may require a considerable expenditure of money to realise, the court would be reluctant to disapprove or refuse to approve any scheme that was passed by the creditors unanimously, or practically unanimously, because primâ facie the creditors are the people who are most interested and most able to judge whether a scheme is for their benefit or is not for their benefit. That is the course that the court would generally adopt in these cases. But as it seems to me that it is always open to the court to consider whether the scheme is for the benefit of the creditors or not, although according to the general practice as I understand it the court is very reluctant to overrule the wishes of the creditors in respect of an estate in the realization of which they, and they alone, are interested. This case is obviously one to which, if the scheme had been for the payment of anything less than 20s. in the pound, subsection 9 of section 3 of the Act of 1890 would necessarily have applied, and under these circumstances it seems to me that we ought to affirm the decision of the learned registrar and dismiss this appeal. There are other points which are discussed in the judgment of the learned registrar such as the question of the conditional withdrawal of the debts of certain persons interested, mortgagees and what are called "family creditors." It is not easy, to say the least, for anyone to get a scheme approved in a case in which the debtor himself is party to this sort of conditional arrangement. The case of In re Pilling makes it difficult to do so, but I do not go the length of saying that in no case would it be possible, if the court thought it had full disclosure of all the facts and all the negotiations for a scheme to be approved.

Therefore, for the reasons I gave at the beginning of my judgment I think that this appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I also think that this scheme (if it can be properly called a scheme) is one that the court ought not to sanction. I say this for the reasons given by my lord, and also because I think there is a good deal in what Mr. Registrar Giffard in his very careful judgment said—namely, "What the creditors will risk is sufficiently clear. The whole of the assets will be put out of the reach of the court, while the debtors through their trustee continue to carry on a speculation which the official receiver has already described as 'rash and hazardous,' and as contributing to bringing about their insolvency."

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree.

Lushington, for the official receiver, asked that an immediate adjudication of bankruptcy might be made against the debtors under section 20 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and referred to Re Burr, [1892] 2 Q. B. 467, 40 W. R. Dig. 16.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—We think that such an order ought to be made only in the most exceptional circumstances.

Solicitors, T. Blanco White; Solicitor to Board of Trade.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } March 23.
Farwell, J. }

In re TURNBULL.
SKIPPER v. WADE. (a.)

Will—Legacy—Gift of duty—No residuary estate—Settlement estate duty—Finance Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 28), s. 19.

A testatrix gave various legacies "free from duty." Her estate was insufficient to pay the legacies in full and there was no residuary estate. Held that the duties were to be considered legacies, and that all legacies should abate in proportion together. Also that a bequest of a legacy free from duty included payment of settlement estate duty; and that a legacy to her husband with a declaration that if he predeceased her, the legacy should vest in his representatives, to be dealt with as part of his personal estate, as if he had died after testatrix, carried legacy duty on disposition of such gift by the husband in his will.

In re Wilkins, 33 W. R. 42, 27 Ch. D. 703; Farrer v. St. Catherine's College, Cambridge, 21 W. R. 643, 16 Eq. 19; In re Bridger, 42 W. R. 179, [1894] 1 Ch. 297, approved of.

Finance Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 28), s. 19, discussed.

Summons.

A testatrix, Mrs. M. E. Turnbull, who died in November, 1903, by her will dated the 28th of June, 1893, bequeathed the following legacies: To her husband £50,000, with a declaration that if he died before her the said legacy should not lapse but vest in his representatives, to be dealt with as part of his personal estate, as if he had died immediately after her; to her nephew, F. M. Skipper, £16,000; to her niece, H. M. C. Skipper, £15,000 for her life, without power of anticipation with remainder to her children as she should by deed or will appoint; to her stepniece, V. G. P. Skipper, £3,000. The total pecuniary legacies bequeathed by the will amounted to £123,000, and were all directed to be paid "free from duty." The estate of the testatrix was estimated at £116,000, a deficiency of £7,000 on the aggregate of the legacies alone. There was thus no residuary estate for the payment of duties.

After the date of the will the said V. G. P. Skipper married, and her marriage settlement contained a provision for the settlement of after-acquired property.

In 1895 the said H. M. C. Skipper married, and in 1904 trustees were appointed of the legacy of £15,000 settled upon her and her children. The husband of the testatrix predeceased her leaving a will.

Legacy duty was ascertained to be payable upon the legacy to the husband's representatives at the rate of 10 per cent., upon the legacy to V. G. P. Skipper, and upon the legacies to F. M. Skipper and to H. M. C. Skipper and her children at 3 per cent.

The questions sought to be determined by this summons included the following, all depending on the construction of the direction in the will that all legacies were to be "paid free from duty": (1) Whether the duties given were themselves legacies, and, if so, how the amount payable to each beneficiary was to be ascertained. (2) Whether the direction included settlement estate duty. (3) Whether the 10 per cent. legacy duty payable in the events which happened on the legacy given to the representatives of the testatrix's husband was included in the direction to pay free from duty.

Upjohn, K.C., and R. J. Parker, on the first point, for the trustees of the £15,000 legacy settled on H. M. C. Skipper (Mrs. Dundas), argued that a direction to pay free from duty was a direction to pay out of some fund not a legacy—that is to say, out of residue. As there was no residue the gifts of duty failed pro tanto: Wilson v. O'Leary, 17 Eq. 419; Hanson's Death Duties (4th ed.), 464.

Jenkins, K.C., and Beebee, for the trustees of the marriage settlement of V. G. P. Skipper (Mrs. Lane), maintained that the proper plan was to first of all pay all duties and then apportion the balance rateably according to the amounts of the actual legacies originally given: In re Wilkins, 33 W. R. 42, 27 Ch. D. 703; Farrer v. St. Catharine College, Cambridge, 21 W. R. 643, 16 Eq. 19 (not cited in In re Wilkins).

Maughan, for the executors.

Jessel, for Mr. Skipper.

(a.) Reported by C. H. CARDEN NOAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment on this point, referred to Noel v. Lord Henley, 7 Price 253, 26 R. R. 660, and said that in Farrer v. St. Catharine College, Cambridge, Lord Selborne held that duty given as in this case is a pecuniary legacy which must abate accordingly. The right principle was that laid down by Pearson J., in In re Wilkins, though his arithmetic was open to question; namely to treat the duty as a legacy and let all the legacies abate proportionately.

Upjohn, K.C., and R. J. Parker, on the second point, as to whether the direction to pay included settlement estate duty, argued that it was payable. Under the Estate Duty Act of 1896, s. 19, it is a "duty." Kekewich, J., had held it payable in In re Lewis, [1904] 2 Ch. 656, though in In re Cayley, 53 W. R. 144, [1904] 2 Ch. 781, Eady, J., had not followed this case. [In re Bridger, Brompton Hospital v. Lewin, 42 W. R. 179, [1894] 1 Ch. 297, was also referred to.] Though the duty was only imposed by the Finance Act of 1896, the imposition of a new duty does not stop the court from finding in a will made before the Act imposing it an intention to include the new duty in the case of such a direction as was to be found in this will: In re Maryon-Wilson, 48 W. R. 338, [1900] 1 Ch. 570; Theobald on Wills, p. 359. "Free from duty" meant free of all duty payable when the legacy was handed over. The will speaks from the death of the testatrix, and intends to give the beneficiary a net sum.

Jenkins, K.C., for the purposes of construction you must regard the law in force at the time when a will is made. This will was made before the Act of 1896, and must be so construed. Jones v. Ogle, Sau. & Sc. 1, where husband and wife took as one person after 1882 in a will made before the Married Women's Property Act of 1882. Both In re Lewis and In re Cayley were cases of wills made after 1896. The nature of the further duty imposed by the Act of 1896 was that it was paid by the executors, not as executors, but as trustees for the legatees, out of the legacy. This was merely a device for collection, not for computation. The words in this will were not "free from all duties," but "free from duty," and would not cover this case if you applied In re March, Mander v. Harris, 32 W. R. 941, 27 Ch. D. 166.

Butcher, K.C., and Austen-Cartmell, for the representatives of the husband, said that the question turned on words in the Finance Act of 1896, s. 19, which also were in the Act of 1894, s. 14—namely, that settlement estate duty shall (unless the will contains an express provision to the contrary) be payable out of the settled legacy in exoneration of the rest of the deceased's estate. An "express provision" was discussed by Kekewich, J., in In re Parker-Jervis, 47 W. R. 147, [1898] 2 Ch. 643. The words "free from duty," speaking of legacies, meant primarily "free from legacy duty," and were not an express provision as to settlement estate duty, which was of a different nature and imposed in place of further estate duties in the future. Settlement estate duty is chargeable, not on this succession, but on a future one. It arises under the Act of 1894, and is only made immediately payable by the Act of 1896. Thus the later Act is not to be construed as changing the nature of the duty.

FARWELL, J.—The testatrix has said that all legacies are to be free from duty. The will is dated in 1893, before the Finance Acts of 1894 and 1896, under which settlement estate duty is payable. But it was laid down in In re Bridger that section 24 of the Wills Act, which enacts that a will speaks from the death of the testator, applied so as to give a larger sum to the legatee than would have been his at the date of the will in that case. I consider that I am bound to follows Lord Davey and read the will as made at the date of death. The words "free from duty" mean paid free from all duty. The settlement estate duty is charged upon the legacy and must be paid by statute before handing over the legacy. One duty is the same as another for this purpose. The executors must discharge the duty before they can pay the legacy. I can make no differences between the various duties payable, and I hold that the settlement estate duty is a legacy like the rest of the duties.

R. J. Parker, on the third point, argued that the legacy to testatrix's husband was payable as if he had died immediately after her. If he had survived her no duty would have been payable on the legacy to him. As it was before handing over the £50,000 to his representatives for distribution, 10 per cent. legacy duty was payable. The words of the will could not be held to cover this payment.

FARWELL, J.—This is in its essence a legacy to the husband's estate. I cannot cut down the generality of the direction to pay "free of duty." The distinction proposed is too subtle for me. All the legacies are given free of duty, and this is a legacy.

Solicitors for the executors, &c., Busk, Mellor, & Norris.

Solicitors for Mr. Turnbull's representatives, Corbould, Rigby, & Co.

Solicitors for Mrs. Lane's trustees, A. Campbell Wade.

Chan. Div.
Buckley, J. } April 7.

In re TAYLOR.
MATHESON v. TAYLOR. (a.)

Company—Bonds—Interest payable out of net earnings as and when available—Proceeds of sale—Capital or income—Tenant for life and remaindermen.

A settlement comprised bonds which carried cumulative interest at six per cent., payable "as and when earned out of any net earnings of any year remaining after interest on 'certain bonds, which constituted a prior charge, "shall have been paid for such year, and if in any year the net earnings so remaining available shall not be sufficient to pay such interest in full there shall be paid any part thereof earned and available, and any deficiency shall not be waived but shall be paid . . . out of the net earnings of any subsequent year or years as and when there shall be any net earnings available for such purpose." Upon a sale of the bonds by the trustees,

Held, that the whole of the proceeds of sale of the bonds was capital money, and that the tenant for life under the settlement was not entitled to any part thereof as arrears of income.

Adjourned summons.

This was a summons taken out by the trustees of the settlement made upon the marriage of the late Mrs. H. N. G. Taylor, asking how, if at all, the proceeds of sale of certain mortgage bonds ought to be apportioned as between capital and income.

The settlement was an ante-nuptial one, dated the 12th of May, 1899.

Part of the property brought into settlement consisted of fifteen second mortgage 6 per cent. Gold Bonds of the Mexican National Railroad Co., the trusts declared of which property were, shortly (after the marriage), for the benefit of the wife for her life, then for her husband (the defendant Walter Taylor) for his life if he should survive her, then for the children of the marriage as the wife should appoint, with an ultimate remainder in favour of the wife's next-of-kin.

(a.) Reported by H. H. KING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mrs. H. N. G. Taylor died intestate on the 22nd of May, 1902, and administration of her estate was granted to her husband, Walter Taylor, on the 31st of July, 1903.

The interest on the bonds was in arrears in 1899, and in or before March, 1902, no interest having been paid in the interval, a reorganization scheme came into operation, under which a new company was formed to take over the assets of the old company, the holders of bonds in the old company being given the right to take certain benefits under the scheme in exchange for their bonds, which were to be deposited.

The trustees did not deposit the bonds they held, but sold them on the 8th of March, 1902, for £2,700. The question thereupon arose whether Walter Taylor, as legal representative of his wife, or as the present tenant for life, was entitled to any part of this sum as arrears of income. The terms of the bond sufficiently appear from the judgment.

Buckmaster, K.C., and G. P. C. Lawrence, for Walter Taylor.—The £2,700 should be apportioned. The fact of there being no profits in any year does not destroy my right to income from the bonds, it only suspends it. My right to income is not contingent on there being profits. The debt due under the coupon is due year by year, and the right to receive that debt remains until payment is made. The proper apportionment would be as in In re Atkinson, [1904] 2 Ch. 160.

Astbury, K.C., and J. I. Stirling, for the remainder-men.—There was not a legal accruing debt in each year. The tenant for life has not suffered the loss of any debt which she was legally entitled to recover. The bonds never carried interest, but only an opportioned part of profits if earned.

They referred to Bouch v. Sproule, 36 W. R. 193, 12 App. Cas. 385, and In re Armitage, [1893] 3 Ch. 337.

T. H. Wright appeared for the trustees.

BUCKLEY, J.—The bonds as to which the question arises were the subject of a tenancy for life, which came to an end on the 22nd of May, 1902. It is admitted that down to that date there were not in existence any net earnings such as are referred to in the bond. In other words, it is admitted that the fund out of which the interest was to be paid was at that time non-existent. The question is whether in that state of things the tenant for life was entitled to any and what part of a sum of £2,700 for which the bonds have been sold. It is obvious that that sum included all expectations of anything which might be payable under the bond; it included the arrears (if that word is applicable in any proper sense) of interest on the bonds, as well as the principal money secured by them, and if there were arrears which accrued during the tenancy for life, I have no doubt that an apportioned part of that sum ought to be paid to the tenant for life's estate; but in my judgment there were no such arrears. The question falls to be decided, I think, on an examination of the bond. The bond was one under which interest was to be paid as and when earned, out of any net earnings of any year remaining after paying the interest on certain first mortgage bonds; so that interest was payable only out of a fund, and as and when that fund came into credit. It seems to me plain from that that until there was a fund there was no debt at all in respect of the interest. The bond went on to provide that if and when in any year there were any net earnings available for payment of the interest which should not be sufficient to pay such interest in full there should be paid any part thereof earned and available, and any deficiency should not be waived but should be paid to the holder thereof out of any subsequent year or years as and when there should be any net earnings available for such purpose. The coupon which is attached to the bond is, if possible, more plain, and is an express obligation to pay the bearer six months' interest, "such interest to be payable only as and when earned out of any net earnings available therefor."

It seems to me that under that instrument there was no interest payable at all as income of a year in which there was no fund available for its payment. Suppose that in the year 1904 there was no fund available and that the tenant for life died on the 31st of December, 1904. There was no income, I apprehend, payable to that tenant for life, because the obligation is to pay out of a fund, and there was no such fund. If in the year 1905 a fund came into existence, the interest calculated for the year 1904 would become payable, I agree, but it would be income of the year 1905 and not income of the year 1904; and if a second tenant for life were in enjoyment of the property in 1905 that tenant for life and not the previous tenant for life's estate would, it seems to me, take that interest. It all turns on this: there is no obligation in this instrument to pay interest; there is only an obligation to pay interest out of a fund, and there is no obligation to pay until there is such a fund; and if there is no such fund during the existence of a tenancy for life, then the tenant for life, as it appears to me, is not entitled to any interest. Under these circumstances it seems to me that the tenancy for life which came to an end on the 22nd of May, 1902, down to which date there was no fund, is not entitled to anything as arrears of income; and the sum which has been received for the purchase-money of the bonds is not apportionable.

Solicitors, Freshfields; Hind & Robinson.

Chan. Div. } April 1.
Buckley, J. }

In re NORTH OF ENGLAND STEAMSHIP CO. (LIMITED AND REDUCED).* (a.)

Company—Special resolution—Notice of two meetings given by one document—Clause in articles of association—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 51.

The articles of association of a company contained a clause providing that "whenever it is intended to pass a special resolution the two meetings may be convened by one and the same notice, and it shall be no objection that the notice only convenes the second meeting contingently on the resolution being passed by the requisite majority at the first meeting."

Held, that a notice so given was not, as regards the second meeting, in accordance with the provisions of section 51 of the Companies Act, 1862.

Petition.

This was a petition presented by the above-named company praying that a reduction of capital to be effected by a special resolution of the company might be confirmed by the court.

On the 4th of February, 1905, a notice in writing was given to the members of the company that an extraordinary general meeting of the company would be held on the 15th of February, at the place and time in the notice mentioned, at which the subjoined resolution (which was a resolution for the reduction of the company's capital) would be proposed. The notice also stated: "Should such resolution be duly passed by the required majority, the same will be submitted for confirmation as a special resolution to a subsequent extraordinary general meeting of the company which will be held on Friday, the 3rd day of March, 1905, at the same time and place." Article 70 of the articles of association of the company provided that seven clear days' notice should be given to members of any meeting of the company, and that whenever it was intended to pass a special resolution the two meetings might be convened by one and the same notice, and it should be no objection to such notice that it only convened the second meeting contingently on the resolution being passed by the requisite majority at the first meeting.

* Reversed by Court of Appeal.—[ED., W.R.]

(a.) Reported by H. H. KING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The resolution was passed by a three-fourths majority at the meeting held on the 15th of February, and was confirmed by a majority of the meeting held on the 3rd of March.

Martelli, for the petition.—The special resolution was validly passed and confirmed, having regard to the special terms of article 70. In Alexander v. Simpson, 38 W. R. 161, 43 Ch. D. 139, where the Court of Appeal held that one notice could not extend to both the meetings, there was no such special article, and the decision turned on article 52 in that case. Here the question is on section 51 of the Companies Act, 1862, which says that a notice is duly given if given in the manner prescribed by the regulations, and that manner is prescribed in this case by article 70.

BUCKLEY, J.—Section 51 of the Companies Act provides: "Notice of any meeting shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to be duly given and the meeting to be duly held whenever such notice is given and meeting held in manner prescribed by the regulations of the company." The regulations of this company contain a provision that "whenever it is intended to pass a special resolution the two meetings may be convened by one and the same notice, and it shall be no objection that the notice only convenes the second meeting contingently on the resolution being passed by the requisite majority at the first meeting." It is necessary, therefore, to determine whether section 51 of the Act of Parliament allows a contingent notice of a meeting. The language of the notice which was sent out here is, I think, identical with, or at any rate substantially, as Mr. Martelli admits, in the words of the notice given in Alexander v. Simpson. It runs thus: "Should such resolution be duly passed by the required majority, the same shall be submitted for confirmation as a special resolution to a subsequent extraordinary general meeting of the company, which will be held on Friday, the 3rd of March." That is to say, it is a notice that only in a contingency—namely, that of the resolution being passed at the first meeting—will there be a second meeting at all. The question therefore is, whether that is a compliance with section 51. The decision of the Court of Appeal in Alexander v. Simpson was simply on the articles of association; it was not necessary to go back to the statute, and the Court of Appeal held that the regulations of the company had not been complied with. I desire to point out why. The relevant article there was article 52, which said that seven days' notice in writing should be given to the members before every general meeting. What the company did was to give exactly such a notice as has been given in this case, and Bowen, L.J., at p. 148, says: "If that paragraph is to be read as a notice that the subsequent extraordinary general meeting of the company would only be held on that day in the event of the passing of the resolutions at the former meeting, it is obvious that it would not be a good notice, because it would leave a shareholder who got the notice in ignorance whether or no the general meeting of the 29th of July was to be held." That is to say, the court was of opinion on the document in question in that case—namely, the articles of association, that notice of a contingent meeting was not, within article 52, notice of a meeting. That being so, it was not necessary to go on to determine the question which I have to determine here—namely, supposing you have complied with you articles, have you complied with the statute? That point I have now to decide.

The document upon which I have to decide it is the Act of Parliament, which says: [His lordship again read the provision at the end of section 51 of the Act.] On the construction of that enactment, with the assistance of the decision of the Court of Appeal in Alexander v. Simpson, is it giving notice of a meeting to give notice of a contingent meeting? Alexander v. Simpson decides plainly that it is not. Of course it is sought to get over that by saying that the section says "in manner prescribed by the regulations," and that these regulations do provide for notice of a contingent meeting. But does that get over the difficulty? Certainly not; because the Act of Parliament says that that of which you must give notice is a meeting. You may give notice of a meeting as your regulations provide; the Act does not allow you to give notice of a contingent meeting as your regulations provide. Therefore the point here is exactly the same as in Alexander v. Simpson, but it arises under the Act of Parliament, and not under the regulations. Of course the articles cannot enlarge the Act of Parliament. I desire only to add that this is not mere pedantry, but is, to my mind, a matter of substance. A special resolution is a serious and solemn thing. The Act of Parliament provides that it shall be submitted to two meetings. The notice of the second meeting ought to be an efficient and effectual thing. The Act of Parliament must have intended to contemplate this: that persons possibly might stay away from the first meeting because they knew they could come and object at the second meeting. The second meeting is not a mere form at all; it is a solemn reality which the Act of Parliament requires, and I think it is not giving due effect to the Act of Parliament to endeavour to give the go-by to the second meeting by an article such as that in the present case, the effect of which is that after the first meeting has been held nobody will know whether there is to be a second meeting or not unless they make inquiry and find out in some way what the result of the first meeting has been.

I therefore hold that the special resolution has not been passed in the manner provided by the Act of Parliament. I think the point is governed by Alexander v. Simpson when applied to a different state of facts. I therefore dismiss the petition.

Solicitors, Gibson & Weldon, for Bertrand Watson, Stockton-on-Tees.

Chan. Div. } Feb. 17; March 9, 16, 18.
Joyce, J. }

In re JONES & ROBERTS. (a.)

Solicitor—Lien—Country solicitor and town agent—Trustee in bankruptcy—Right to production of documents in order to vouch bill of costs—Waiver of lien.

The town agent of a country solicitor who has given notice to the country client of his lien, has a right of lien upon all the documents which have come into his possession during the course of the proceedings for the whole amount of the costs due from the country client to the country solicitor; and this right of lien is not waived because the town agent has acted for the country client in obtaining an order to tax the country solicitor's bill of costs.

Motion to compel the London agents of country solicitors to produce certain documents which had come into their hands as agents in order to enable a bill of costs to be vouched and taxed.

Robbins, Billing, & Co., were formerly the London agents of Jones & Roberts, of Llanrwst, who were the solicitors of one T. Edwards in certain administration proceedings.

In the autumn of 1903, while those proceedings were pending, the country solicitors became bankrupt, and Walter Conway was appointed their trustee in bankruptcy.

In August, 1904, the trustee delivered to Edwards the bill of costs of the said Jones & Roberts, which included part of Messrs. Robbins, Billing, & Co.'s, agency charges, whereupon the London agents gave notice to Edwards not to pay the amount of the bill, and as the trustee would not undertake to pay what was due to them out of the proceeds of the bill, they presented a petition on behalf of Edwards for the taxation of the bill, and on the 25th of October, 1904, obtained an order to tax the said bill, and also that Edwards and the trustee should produce all books and papers in their possession. The trustee's solicitors then gave to the London agents notice to produce before the master all the books and papers in their possession necessary to vouch the said bill, and on the 9th of November the taxing-master ordered that the parties to the order of the 24th of October, and their solicitor, should produce all documents and papers necessary to vouch the the said bill. Thereupon Edwards gave notice of change of solicitor.

On the 13th of January, 1905, the trustee's solicitors obtained from the master a subpœna duces tecum which was addressed to and served upon a member of the firm of Robbins, Billing, & Co., commanding him to produce all the papers and vouchers in the list annexed thereto. He attended before the master, but refused to produce the documents in the subpœna duces tecum on the ground that he had a lien on them, not only for the proportion of the bill that was due to him as agent in that matter, but also for all costs due to him from his country solicitor. The trustee moved for an order that the member of the firm be ordered notwithstanding the lien claimed by him to produce before the taxing-master all the documents in his possession which might be necessary for the purpose of obtaining taxation of the said bill. It appeared that it was impossible to proceed with the taxation of the bill unless the documents were produced.

P. F. Wheeler, for the trustee.—The town agent had no general lien upon the papers for his costs, but only a particular lien in respect of particular items: White v. Royal Exchange, 1 Bing. 20; Ward v. Hepple, 15 Ves. 297; Dicas v. Stockley, 7 C. & P. 587. As against the lay client there was no such general lien, and even if there were it could not be insisted upon to prevent the production of the documents to the trustee in bankruptcy: Ex parte Bramble, 28 W. R. 676, 13 Ch. D. 885. There was a difference between producing documents and handing them over. A solicitor of a company might be ordered to produce to the liquidator in the winding-up documents relating to the company without prejudice to his lien for costs. In re South Essex Estuary and Reclamation Co., 17 W. R. 275, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 215, which clearly marks the difference between the production of documents as asked for in this case and handing them over as in In re Capital Fire Insurance Association, 32 W. R. 260, 24 Ch. D. 408. The lien cannot be allowed so as to enable a solicitor to refuse to produce documents necessary for the taxation of the bills of the country solicitor and so to prevent the trustee from collecting the estate. A solicitor was bound to produce to a creditor of his client the documents in his possession belonging to his client, notwithstanding he had a lien upon them so as to enable the creditor to take steps to get in a mortgage debt due to the estate. In In re Hawkes, 46 W. R. 445, [1898] 2 Ch. 1, which was an administration action in which the conduct of the action had been given to a creditor, there was no privity of contract between the London agent and the lay client. The London agent could have no claim against the lay client, nor could he be liable to the lay client for negligence. The London agent received his retainer subject to the risk that if the country solicitor became banbrupt, he could only prove in the bankruptcy.

Robbins, Billing, & Co. appeared as solicitors for Edwards and obtained the common order to tax, which order required the production of all documents in the possession or power of Edwards and his solicitor; therefore they are, on this ground, estopped from relying on their lien. By obtaining the order to tax they have waived their lien and cannot now insist upon it: Jacobs v. Latour, 5 Bing. 130, where Best, L.C.J., said a lien was destroyed if the party entitled to it gave up his right to the possession of the goods. Lien was a right which could be taken away by very little. The trustee offered to give Robbins, Billing, & Co. all their out-of-pocket expenses and half the profit charges in the action to which the documents related.

R. Younger, K.C., and Alan Macpherson, for Messrs. Robbins, Billing, & Co.—The lien of the town agent as against the country solicitor was a general one and covered all costs due from the country solicitor in respect of agency business and disbursements generally; but as against the client the lien was only good to the amount to which the client was indebted to the country solicitor. The right of the lay client against the London agent was no greater than his right against the country solicitor. The trustee of the bankrupts has no greater right than the bankrupts had. As against the bankrupts the London agents are entitled to payments of, or security for, all sums due on the general account. The broad principle as laid down by James, L.J., in Ex parte Newitt, 29 W. R. 344, 16 Ch. D., p. 531, "is that the trustee in a bankruptcy takes all the bankrupt's property, but takes it subject to all the liabilities which affected it in the bankrupt's hands, unless the property which he takes as the legal personal representative of the bankrupt is added to by some express provision of the bankrupt law." In Lambert v. Buckmaster, 2 B. & C. 616, Abbott, C.J., held that the solicitor had the same right of lien against the assignees that he had against the bankrupts. The Bankruptcy Act 1883, s. 49, showed what transactions are protected from passing to the trustee, and it was evident that all liens without notice of bankruptcy were preserved. In re Johnson & Weatherall, 36 W. R. 374, 37 Ch. D. 433, showed that the lien of a London agent against the country solicitor was a general one. In re Capital Fire Insurance Association decided that a winding-up order could not defeat a valid lien existing at the time when the winding-up petition was presented. The decision in In re Hawkes only applied to administration and other representative actions, and ought not to be extended. In Lawrence v. Fletcher, 27 W. R. 937, 12 Ch. D. 858, it was held that the London agent had a general lien against the country solicitor, which extended to all costs for all agency business and disbursements due from the country solicitor. Messrs. Robbins, Billing, & Co., would be willing to surrender the documents if the trustee would hand over to them all the money received by them from the client subject to the costs of taxation.

(a.) Reported by R. FRANKLIN STUBBING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Cur. adv. vult.

JOYCE, J.—Jones & Roberts were solicitors in the country. Robbins, Billing, & Co. were the town agents of Jones & Roberts. Edwards employed Jones & Roberts in the country as his solicitors, and there were certain matters in which Robbins, Billing, & Co. acted as town agents for Jones & Roberts concerning the country client. Jones & Roberts became bankrupt, and Edwards wanting his papers, I suppose, acting through Robbins, Billing, & Co. as his proper solicitors, obtained the usual order for the taxation of the bill of costs of Jones & Roberts—obtained it, of course, against the trustee—and that order provided for the taxation in the usual way, and "that the trustee in bankruptcy do produce before the master all books, papers, and writings in their custody, or power relating to the matters hereby referred to, or any of them." In the proceedings on the taxation it became necessary to have certain papers in the hands of Robbins, Billing, & Co., the town agents of Jones & Roberts, and a subpœna was issued and served upon Mr. Robbins as to certain papers specified required for the taxation. Robbins appeared upon his subpœna but declined to produce the papers, claiming a lien for costs due to him from Jones & Roberts, including, among other things, costs which were chargeable against Edwards, the country client. Then the present application by motion was made to me for an order against Robbins "that he do produce the papers," and so on.

Now if there had been no bankruptcy of Roberts, and if the country solicitor had been the respondent on the order for taxation and had issued a subpœna and served it upon Robbins, then in the absence of special circumstances, none of which exist in the present case, I think it to be clear that the town agent would not be bound to produce the documents unless his lien was satisfied or secured. It was contended on behalf of the trustee, on the authority of In re Hawkes, 46 W. R. 445, [1898] 2 Ch. 1, that the production being required for the purpose of getting in a debt due to the bankrupt, and so indirectly for the purpose of administering the bankrupt's estate, Robbins was bound to produce the documents notwithstanding his lien. But I think that when the case of In re Hawkes and the other cases that were cited are looked at, no real authority for such a contention can be found, and that argument in my opinion fails.

Then it is said that Robbins, Billing, & Co. waived their lien through having acted as solicitors for Edwards in obtaining the order to tax; no authority has been cited for this proposition, and I do not follow the argument upon which it is based. I think it would very much astonish some of the large firms in London who transact agency business for country solicitors if they were told, that they lost their lien against the country solicitor by the mere fact of acting as solicitor for the country client in another matter and obtaining an order to tax; therefore I hold that there is nothing in that point. Robbins, Billing, & Co. having given notice to Edwards of their lien, it appears to me that they have as against the country solicitor a lien on the documents which they hold of the country client for the whole amount due from the country client to the country solicitor. This is so stated in all the text-books and is referred to in Daniell's Chancery Practice, p. 1693, and Cordery on Solicitors (3rd ed.), p. 360, supports that proposition. I am of opinion that there is nothing in the case of Ward v. Hepple, 15 Ves. 297, conflicting with this proposition. The whole thing was clearly stated, in my opinion, by Fry, J., in the case of Lawrence v. Fletcher, 27 W. R. 937, 12 Ch. D. 858. Early in the case I urged upon the parties that by consent some order ought to be made by which the lien of the town agents should be preserved, or their rights should be preserved, but yet the taxation might proceed, and the payment of the amount due from the country client be obtained. Mr. Younger offered, if his lien or rights were preserved as to the amount coming from the country client, to allow as against the town agent the costs and expenses without deduction of the taxation, and to allow those to be retained by the trustee in bankruptcy. On the other hand, Mr. Wheeler, on the part of the trustee in bankruptcy of the country solicitor, offered to make an arrangement to preserve the lien of the town agent, but only to the extent of the particular charges contained in the bill, which were for work done by the town agent for the country client through the country solicitor. Having regard to the cases which I have referred to in the text-books, in my opinion this offer falls short of what Messrs. Robbins, Billing, & Co., the town agents, are entitled to insist upon. Therefore, with reluctance, I must refuse this motion, and, considering the offer made by Mr. Younger, I must refuse it with costs.

Solicitors, Jacques & Co., for W. Thornton Jones, Bangor; Robbins, Billing, & Co.

Chan. Div. } Jan. 11.
Warrington, J. }

SITWELL v. EARL OF LONDESBOROUGH. (a.)

Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 2, sub-section 10 (iv.); ss. 6, 7, sub-sections 2, 3—Mines—Mining lease—Reservation of mining lease—Support to surface—Lease of power to let down surface—Tenant for life.

Under section 6 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, a tenant for life of settled land has power to grant a lease of a right to let down the surface of the land for mining operations.

Sir G. Sitwell by his marriage settlement conveyed land of which he was owner in fee to uses under which he became tenant for life. The deed contained an exception from the conveyance of all mines under the land in question, with power to work the same. Any person exercising these reserved rights was to make reasonable compensation to the trustees of the settlement for all damages caused to the inheritance, and also to the persons for the time being entitled to the surface of the land for damage to things upon the surface.

(a.) Reported by PERCY H. WINFIELD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that Sir G. Sitwell had no power under the exception to authorize lessees to work the mines so as to let down the surface of the settled land, but that as tenant for life he could, under section 6 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, grant a right to do so by lease.

By his marriage settlement of the 11th of July, 1888, Sir G. Sitwell, Bart., appointed and conveyed lands and hereditaments of freehold tenure except and reserved out of the appointment and conveyance, all mines of coal and ironstone and other mines, whether opened or unopened, lying and being in and under the said premises, together with full power to work, get, carry away, sell, and dispose of the same, and to do all such acts and things upon, in and under the said premises as should be necessary or expedient for all or any or the purposes aforesaid, but so nevertheless that no surface operations should be carried on within () of Renshaw Hall, and that no underground workings shall be carried on within () thereof, and so that the person or person exercising the rights and liberties thereby reserved should make reasonable compensation to the trustees or trustee for the time being of the said settlement (to be held by them or him as capital moneys arising from the exercise of the power of sale conferred on a tenant for life by the Settled Land Act, 1882) for all damages caused to the inheritance of the said premises by the exercise of such liberties, and also to the person or persons for the time being entitled to the surface of the said premises for all damage caused to growing crops or other things upon such surface, the amount of such compensation to be settled as therein mentioned, to the use of the said Sir G. Sitwell during his life without impeachment of waste, and after his death to certain uses therein set forth for securing a jointure rent-charge for his wife, and subject thereto to the use of the defendants the Earl of Londesborough and Sir William Henry Arthington Worsley for the term of 1,000 years, upon trust for raising portions for the settlor's younger children, and subject thereto to the use of his first and other sons by his said wife successively according to seniority in tail male, with remainder to the use of the settlor, his heirs and assigns. By the settlement the defendants were appointed trustees thereof for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, 1882 and 1884, and it was declared that no part of the rent reserved on any mining lease within the meaning of the former Act, which should be granted pursuant to the said Act or otherwise should be set aside as capital money, but the whole thereof should go as rent and profits.

At the date of the settlement the plaintiff was owner in fee of the lands thereby settled, and he afterwards purchased the fee simple of other lands and minerals adjoining the settled lands.

In November, 1903, the plaintiff entered into a contract with the Rother Vale Collieries (Limited), to grant to that company a lease of the Barnsley seam of coal, lying party under the settled land and partly under the land purchased by him, and to authorize the lessees to work the seam without leaving any support to the surface except where there were buildings.

Upon the company raising an objection as to his power to do this, he took out a summons to determine the questions:

(1) Whether upon the true construction of the above-mentioned settlement the plaintiff, as the person absolutely entitled to the mines and minerals in and under the hereditaments settled by the said settlement, had power to work or to authorize other persons to work such mines and minerals without leaving any support for the said settled hereditaments, or so as to let down or otherwise injure the surface of the said settled hereditaments.

(2) If the plaintiff as the person so absolutely entitled had not such power, then that it might be declared that the plaintiff as tenant for life under the above-mentioned settlement had power to demise or grant to a lessee (in any lease made by himself as absolute owner of the said mines and minerals in and under the settled hereditaments) the right to work such mines and minerals without leaving any support for the said settled hereditaments, and to let down or otherwise injure the surface of the said settled hereditaments, and that it might be determined what rent ought to be reserved in respect of such right if granted.

WARRINGTON, J., held, with regard to the first point, that the plaintiff had no power to let down the surface under the reservation of minerals with power to work them. The law was laid down in Davis v. Treharne, 29 W. R. 869, [1881] 6 App. Cas. 460, 467, and the fact that this was a marriage settlement contained two different compensation clauses made no difference.

The second question was then argued.

Rowden, K.C., and Bryan Farrer, for Sir G. Sitwell, asked for a declaration that the plaintiff as tenant for life of the settled estates was entitled, under the Settled Land Act, 1882, to grant to the company a lease of a power to let down the surface. Without this right they could not get anyone to take a lease of the minerals. By section 6 a tenant for life is authorized to lease any easement, right, or privilege over the settled land for any purpose whatever for any term not exceeding in the case of a mining lease sixty years. By section 2, sub-section 10 (iv.), a "mining lease is a lease for any mining purposes or purposes connected therewith, and includes a grant or licence for any mining purposes." The proposed lease of a right to let down the surface will be a grant for purposes connected with mining, and will, therefore, be a mining lease within section 6. The right to let down the surface is an easement which is grantable by law, and any words which clearly show the intention to give an easement which is by law grantable are sufficient to effect that purpose: Rowbotham v. Wilson, (1860) 8 H. L. C. 348, 362, 8 W. R. H. L. Dig. 4. Therefore, this right can be given by way of lease by a tenant for life under section 6, and that lease may be for sixty years. A mining lease may include surface land necessary for the effective working of the minerals: In re Reveley's Settled Estates, (1863) 11 W. R. 744.

H. Terrell, K.C., and Hemmerde, for the trustees.—The proposed grant is not a lease at all. It is a surrender for a term of years of the right to support. That right is in the case of land a right of property, and in the case of buildings an easement: Dalton v. Angus, (1881) 6 App. Cas. 740, 791, 29 W. R. Dig. 75. In this case the settled land is the dominant tenement, and the right is not an easement. A grant of a right to destroy the surface is not a lease within section 6. By section 7, sub-section 3, every lease is to contain a condition of re-entry. It is not possible to re-enter on such a right as this, so no lease can be granted. Even if it is an easement of which a lease can be granted within section 6, the arrangement now suggested ought not to be carried out. The proposed rent is quite inadequate, and it is impossible to ascertain the best rent of such a right; whereas by section 7, sub-section 2, it is provided that every lease shall reserve the best rent that can reasonably be obtained.

(*) Blank in the original.

WARRINGTON, J.—The question which I have now to decide arises upon the Settled Land Act, 1882. The question is whether the plaintiff as tenant for life is, under the provisions of the Settled Land Act, entitled to grant to lessees of his minerals the right to let down the surface of the land. The material provisions of the Act are these: By section 6, "a tenant for life may lease the settled land, or any part thereof, or any easement, right, or privilege of any kind over or in relation to the same, for any purpose whatever, whether involving waste or not, for any term not exceeding . . . (ii.) in the case of a mining lease sixty years." By the definition clause, section 2, sub-section 10 (iv.), "Mining purposes include the sinking and searching for, winning, working, getting, making merchantable, smelting, or otherwise converting or working for the purpose of any manufacture, carrying away, and disposing of mines and minerals, in or under the settled land or any other land, and the erection of buildings, and the execution of engineering and other works, suitable for those purposes; and a mining lease is a lease for any mining purposes or purposes connected therewith, and includes a grant or licence for any mining purposes."

What is proposed is to grant to the lessees of the mines a right during the continuance of their lease so to work the mines as to let down or damage the surface of the settled land. It seems to me that, assum- the right so to do is within section 6, then the purposes for which it is proposed to grant that right are mining purposes within sub-section 10 (iv.) of the definition clause, and it only remains to consider whether such a right as it is proposed to grant is "an easement, right, or privilege" over the settled land within section 6. What is the right which it is proposed to grant? It is a a right to damage the surface. It is true that it is a right to damage the surface by underground workings, but for the purpose of construing section 6 the source of the damage is immaterial.

If the section allows, as I think it is plain that it does allow, a lease of a right to damage the surface either, for instance, by opening a pit and removing that part of the surface altogether, or by constructing a railway or tramway over the surface, which cannot be done without damaging part of the surface, it must, I think, also authorize the granting of a lease of a right to damage the surface in any other way. That this is so is shown by Rowbotham v. Wilson, and particularly by a passage at p. 362. Lord Wensleydale says: "I do not feel any doubt that this was the proper subject of a grant, as it affected the land of the grantor; it was a grant of the right to disturb the soil from below, and to alter the position of the surface, and is analagous to the grant of a right to damage the surface by a way over it; and it was admitted, at your lordships' bar, that there is no authority to the contrary. It is undoubted law, that no particular words are necessary to a grant; and any words which clearly show the intention to give an easement which is by law grantable are sufficient to effect that purpose." That is sufficient authority for saying that a right to damage the surface, however the damage is caused, is a right which is grantable at law. If that be so, I see no reason why under the Settled Land Act a tenant for life should not be authorized to lease that right, and to lease it in a proper case for mining purposes.

It is said that it is impossible to ascertain the best rent. I do not follow that.

The Act only says that the lease shall reserve the best rent which can reasonably be obtained. It may be a difficult question to decide, it may be a question for experts, but that such a rent could be ascertained one ought to have no doubt.

It was said that such a lease cannot comply with section 7, sub-section 3, as to a condition of re-entry. I do not think that can be maintained. Strictly, a condition of re-entry is only applicable to corporeal hereditaments. It is clear from the express words of section 6 that a tenant for life has the right to lease incorporeal hereditaments. The two sections, therefore, must be read together, and section 7, sub-section 3, must be understood to apply only to a lease to which a condition of re-entry is applicable.

I therefore hold that the tenant for life has power to grant the right in question for mining purposes.

Solicitors, Arnold & Henry White.

K. B. Div. (Farwell, J.) — Feb. 15, 21.

YOUNG v. NAVAL AND MILITARY AND CIVIL SERVICE CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETY OF SOUTH AFRICA (LIMITED). (a)

Company—Directors—Remuneration—Travelling and hotel expenses—Attending board meetings—Resolutions of directors—Reimbursement inter se—Articles of association of company—Special circumstances.

Directors of public companies who receive payment for attending to the business of the company are not entitled to be paid their travelling expenses to and from board meetings out of the company's assets in addition, unless there are special circumstances existing, or there is an authority in the instrument which regulates the company or the shareholders at a properly convened meeting to sanction it. Therefore a resolution of the directors, general in terms, purporting to give their travelling expenses to all the directors is clearly bad in the absence of such special circumstances or authority.

Action.

This was an action before Farwell, J., sitting as an additional judge of the King's Bench Division, and was brought by the plaintiff as a director of the defendant company, the question being raised whether a director who, in his capacity as director, had always received a fixed remuneration for his services, was entitled to the expenses which he had incurred in travelling to and fro to attend the board meetings of the company.

The company was incorporated in the year 1902, and on the 25th of April, 1902, the plaintiff was appointed one of its directors.

On the 13th of May, 1902, a board meeting was held at which the plaintiff and four other directors were present, and amongst various resolutions passed was the following: "(16) That all reasonable travelling expenses be reimbursed to the directors from time to time."

The articles of association of the company provided —viz., by article 91, for the payment of £200 per annum to each director "by way of remuneration for his services."

Article 92 provided for special remuneration for directors rendering special services or making special exertions in going abroad or otherwise for the purposes of the company.

Article 93 was the usual one for authorizing the directors to exercise the general powers of the company.

(a.) Reported by A. R. TAYLOUR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By article 105 directors were forbidden to vote on matters in which they were interested, and article 161 provided that every director, manager, secretary, and other officer or servant of the company should be indemnified against, and it should be the duty of the directors, out of the funds of the company, to pay all costs, losses, and expenses which any such officer or servant might incur or become liable to by reason of any contract entered into or act or deed done by him as such officer or servant, or in any way in the discharge of his duties. The plaintiff, while he was director of the company, was living at Totnes, and he was present at several board meetings, and was paid out of the company's funds, on each occasion, his travelling expenses to and from London and his hotel bills whilst in London. Nineteen receipts were produced by him, all signed, some of them containing details on the back—e.g., one for the 25th of October was endorsed: "Return fare to and from Totnes, £2 18s. 4d.; cab hire to and from station, 3s. 6d.; hotel charges, 19s. 8d." The plaintiff claimed a balance of director's fees, and a small sum for unpaid travelling expenses. The defendant company counterclaimed repayment of a larger sum paid to the plaintiff while he was a director for travelling and hotel expenses, and also claimed from him payment of travelling expenses paid out of the company's funds while he was director to two other directors.

A. C. Clauson, for the plaintiff.—Trustees are entitled to just expenses under section 24 of the Trustee Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 53), and directors are rather like trustees, and in certain cases are entitled to their travelling expenses.

He cited Ex parte Joyner, In the Matter of Sharpe, 2 Mont. & Ayr Bkcy. Reps. 1; Attorney-General v. The Mayor, &c., of Norwich, 2 My. & Cr. 406, on p. 424; Cullerne v. London and Suburban General Permanent Building Society, 39 W. R. 88, 25 Q. B. D. 485; Lagunas Nitrate Co. v. Lagunas Syndicate, 48 W. R. 74, [1899] 2 Ch. 392, on p. 418; Hirsche v. Sims, [1894], A. C. 654, on p. 660, 43 W. R. Dig. 36; Dovey v. Corr, 50 W. R. 65, [1901] A. C. 477, on pp. 485, 486.

Upjohn, K.C., Cozens-Hardy, and Park Goff, for the defendants, referred to In re George Newman & Co., 43 W. R. 483, [1895] 1 Ch. 674. Directors can only be considered trustees when considering their liability in dealing with the funds of the company, and the difference between them and trustees is this: A trustee is always a trustee, but a director is not always so; he acts at the board meetings, also he may be considered in the light of a trustee when exercising the powers conferred on him by those board meetings, but not when he is at home. Articles 91 and 92 refer to all payments, article 161 only indemnifies them for expenses incurred in the discharge of their duty. Article 105 renders the resolution of the 13th of May, 1902, inoperative, for all the directors passed a resolution that their own travelling expenses should be paid. Directors, as a rule, are remunerated. If they desire more than their remuneration, as a general rule, they must go to the company. Here there were no special circumstances. If a man accepts an appointment at a stipulated salary it is his duty to go to the place where his duty lies, and he cannot claim out-of-pocket expenses, and here the director goes to the board meetings at his own expense.

Clauson, in reply.—General principles cannot be argued. This case must be decided on its facts and there are special circumstances.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 21.—FARWELL, J., read the following judgment: [After stating the facts set out above, he continued:] No imputation of any sort is made against the plaintiff. It is not suggested that he had any design of travelling for his own pleasure or living at hotels at the company's expense. He was living in the West of England when he was elected, as was apparent from his address, and had to travel and stay at least one night in town in order to attend the directors' meetings, nor is it contended that such payments as were made are ultra vires the company; but it is said by the company that they are payments which cannot properly be allowed to be made by directors to themselves.

I am told that it is not unusual for directors to receive their travelling expenses to and from board meetings out of the company's assets, and I was unwilling to charge the plaintiff in this case, who was obviously honest, and whose sole salary as a director will not cover his travelling expenses, if I could avoid it. But, in my opinion, the law on the subject is plain. "Directors have no right to be paid for their services, and cannot pay themselves or each other or make presents to themselves out of the company's assets, unless authorized so to do by the instrument which regulates the company or by the shareholders at a properly convened meeting": In re George Newman & Co., 43 W. R. 483, [1895] 1 Ch., at p. 686. But directors being both agents of and trustees for the company are entitled to be indemnified by the company against all losses and expenses properly sustained and incurred by them in the due performance of their office. They are both trustees and agents—trustees of the company's property, with the liabilities of trustees in respect thereof—In re Lands Allotment, 42 W. R. 404, [1894] 1 Ch. 616, 631—and agents in the transactions which they enter into on behalf of the company: Great Eastern Railway v. Turner, 20 W. R. 73, 68 Ch. App., p. 152. Their right to indemnity arises by the implication of a contract from the relation between themselves and the company, and therefore depends on the particular relation existing, for different contracts are implied from different relations. Thus an unpaid trustee is entitled to complete indemnity for all proper expenses incurred by him in the execution of his trust. The reasonable inference from his consent to act as a trustee gratuitously is that he is not to be out of pocket by reason of any proper expenditure in the matter, and I have no doubt of the correctness of the statement in Lewin on Trusts (11th ed.), p. 771, that a trustee will be entitled to be reimbursed his travelling expenses provided they are properly incurred, although the cases cited in the note are not cases of trustees in the usual signification of that term. But different considerations apply to the case of a paid agent or a paid trustee. The question, then, is: What outlay does his remuneration cover? For, if he is paid on the basis of providing anything at his own expense, he cannot get paid twice over by claiming the costs thereof under his right to indemnity. A paid agent is bound to discharge all the duties incident to his agency for the payment agreed on, and cannot make extra charges for work properly within the scope of his employment as agent. Thus in Marshall v. Parsons, 9 C. & P. 656, a commission agent for the sale of goods sought to charge, in addition to his commission, for attendances at Somerset House, where the patterns of the goods were inspected by Government officers. Lord Cranworth, then Baron Rolfe, directed the jury that the question was whether what the plaintiff did was or was not done in the ordinary course of his business as an agent—if the former, he was paid by his commission; if the later, he was entitled to be paid for them separately. I ask myself, then, if remuneration to a director for his services does or does not include his travelling expenses to and from the board room, and I am of opinion that it does. It is the chief part of the ordinary business of a director to attend board meetings. Directors as a rule do not reside at the registered office of the company, where board meetings are usually held. The director lives where he pleases and suits his own convenience. He is paid a fixed sum for attending and advising with his co-directors. His expense in getting there is included in his salary, because it is necessarily incident to the duty undertaken by him that he should be in that particular place. He has undertaken for a fixed sum to do work at particular meetings of himself and others. He cannot perform his obligations without attending, and such attendance, being necessary for, is paid by the remuneration for such work. The banker, merchant, or solicitor who employs managers or clerks to work for salaries at his bank or offices does not thereby fall under any implied liability to reimburse them their travelling expenses to and from the bank or offices. Counsel for the plaintiff relied on article 161; but that merely states the general law applicable to agents and trustees, and must be read with the qualification that I have just pointed out. If it were not so every servant of the company could insist on his travelling expenses to and from the company's work in addition to his wages.

The reasons that I have given for holding travelling expenses included in the remuneration apply with even greater force to the hotel expenses. I can see no ground whatever on which they can be successfully claimed. The foregoing observations apply, of course, only to the case before me of travelling and hotel expenses to attend board meetings, and have nothing to do with similar expenses incurred on special occasions for special purposes. Then it is said that the plaintiff is entitled by reason of the special resolution of the 13th of May, 1902, but this resolution is clearly bad. It is general in terms, and purports to give their travelling expenses to all the directors. As I have already held that these expenses are included in their salaries, this resolution is equivalent to voting a present or additional remuneration to themselves and is bad. It might also be put on the ground that the resolution is a nullity under article 105, as all the directors present were incapacitated, from voting on it, and it is a single resolution and cannot be split up, as was suggested by counsel for the plaintiff, into a series of resolutions in which four directors might be taken as voting his expenses to the fifth. Further, the resolution does not mention hotel expenses, and these would be wrongly paid in any event. The company further claims from the plaintiff repayment of the sums paid to two other directors, but there is no evidence that the plaintiff did more than vote in favour of the resolution of the 13th of May, 1902, and had a general knowledge that travelling expenses were being paid, except in the case of £10 to Colonel Peile, the cheque for which he signed. I must hold him liable for this £10; but with regard to the rest I am of opinion that the case is covered by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Cullerne v. London and Suburban, &c., Building Society, 39 W. R. 88, 25 Q. B. D. 485, and that the plaintiff is not liable. The result is that the plaintiff recovers in the action £37 14s. 4d., and the defendants recover on the counter-claim £124 2s. Judgment will be entered for the defendants for £86 7s. 8d., and the plaintiff will have the costs of the action on the High Court scale, and the defendants the costs of the counter-claim with set-off.

Judgment.

Solicitor for plaintiff, S. J. R. Stammers.

Solicitors for defendants, Cox & Lafone.

Court of Appeal.

From Court of Passage, Liverpool. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) } Feb. 13, 14, 15, 16.

MAGUIRE v. MAYOR OF LIVERPOOL. (a.)

Local authority—Highway—Statutory duty to repair—Neglect to repair—Liability—Indictment—Damages—Liverpool Improvement Act, 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. cxxvii.), ss. 36, 37, 38, 58.

Where by statute a liability to repair highways, which by common law would be thrown upon the inhabitants at large, is transferred to a new corporation or body created for the purpose of taking over the liability, it is not to be inferred that a new liability is created unless distinct intention on the part of the Legislature can be found in the terms of the Act. Primâ facie, therefore, such new corporation or body is not liable to be sued by an individual for damages resulting from nonfeasance any more than the inhabitants of the parish would have been. And an intention on the part of the Legislature to impose the larger liability will not be inferred from a provision that the new corporation or body is to be liable to be indicted at common law for the want of the sufficient repair of any public highway in the same manner as any person or persons liable to the repair of highways was or were before the passing of the Act in question. If and so far as the case of Hartnell v. Ryde Commissioners, 11 W. R. 963, lays down any general proposition of law with regard to the liability in respect of the repair of highways, it must be taken to be overruled by the decision in Cowley v. Newmarket Local Board, [1892] A. C. 345, 41 W. R. Dig. 85.

This was an appeal by the defendant corporation against a decision of the judge of the Court of Passage at Liverpool.

On the 5th of November, 1903, the plaintiff's horse and trap were being driven down Brownlow-hill, a public highway in the city of Liverpool. At a point in Brownlow-hill where it is entered by Blake-street there is a crossing made by slabs of stone placed in the roadway. On the lower side of the crossing, near one of the slabs of stone, a hole had been formed, described as being five inches in depth, shelving up to three inches, and nine inches across. Into this hole the plaintiff's horse put its foot, fell on its knee, and received such injuries that it had to be destroyed, with consequent agreed loss to the plaintiff of £24.

The action was brought to recover that amount from the defendants.

It was not contended by the defendants that the driver had been careless, and the want of repair was admitted. But it was contended that the evidence proved only nonfeasance on the part of the defendants, not misfeasance, and the judge held that there was no evidence of misfeasance. It was contended for the defendants that, this being so, they were not liable.

Down to 1830 some of the roads in Liverpool were repairable by the corporation and the others were repairable by the inhabitants of the parish.

It was admitted for the purposes of the case that Brownlow-hill was of the latter class.

By an Act passed in 1830 the duty of repairing all the roads was transferred to commissioners appointed by the Act. That Act was repealed by the Liverpool Improvement Act, 1846, under which the duty was transferred to the Corporation of Liverpool.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The learned judge, on the authority of Hartnell v. Ryde Commissioners, 11 W. R. 963, 4 B. & S. 361, held that the defendants were liable, and gave judgment for the agreed amount with costs.

The defendants appealed.

The following are the material provisions of the two Acts:

The Liverpool Act, 1830, s. 1, recited that certain ancient streets within the town of Liverpool had been accustomed to be paved and repaired at the expense of the mayor, bailiffs, and burgesses of Liverpool, and that certain other streets had of late years been also paved and repaired at the expense of the said mayor, bailiffs, and burgesses, and that other streets had been used and accustomed to be paved and repaired at the expense of the inhabitants of the said town, and that it was expedient to appoint one body of commissioners, and appointed nine of the common council of the town of Liverpool, together with fifteen owners or occupiers, commissioners for putting the Act into execution.

Section 75 appointed the commissioners surveyors of highways within the town of Liverpool.

Section 76 required the mayor, bailiffs, and burgesses to pay to the commissioners out of the borough fund a yearly sum of £5,000 to be applied for the purposes of carrying the Act into execution or as the commissioners should direct.

The Liverpool Improvement Act, 1846, s. 1, recited that the borough of Liverpool had been extended; and that it was expedient that the powers to be granted should be combined under one management and be uniform throughout the whole of the said borough; and enacted that the council of the said borough should carry this Act into execution.

Section 6 repealed the Act of 1830, and enacted that all powers and authorities thereby granted to the commissioners appointed by that Act should cease and determine.

Section 36: "And be it enacted, that the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses shall be and they are hereby declared to be the surveyors of highways within and throughout the said borough, and shall have and they are hereby invested with, and by the said council may exercise, all such powers and authorities as any surveyors of highways in that part of the United Kingdom called England are or shall be invested with by virtue of the laws now or hereafter to be in force, and shall also be subject to all the liabilities to which surveyors of highways are now by law subject or may hereafter become subject."

Section 37: "And be it enacted, that the management and control over all and every of the streets within the said borough existing and being at the time when the provisions of this Act shall come into operation, or which shall thereafter be made (not being turnpike roads), and the pavements and other materials as well in the footways as carriage-ways of the said streets, and all erections and buildings, materials, implements, and other things provided for the purpose of the said highways by the surveyors of the highways, or by the said commissioners, under the hereinbefore recited Acts respectively, or by the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses, or the said council, shall be the property of and are hereby vested in the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses."

Section 38: "And be it enacted, that it shall be lawful for the said council from time to time to cause all or any of the streets within the said borough so vested in the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses as aforesaid, or any part thereof, to be formed, paved, or flagged, and the ground or soil thereof to be raised, lowered, or altered, in such manner and with such materials as they shall think proper, and also to pave or make, with such materials as they shall think fit, any causeways, pavements, or footways for the use of passengers in or on the sides of any such street, or elsewhere within the said borough, and to cause such streets, causeways, and footways to be repaired from time to time as may be required: Provided always, that if in consequence of carrying the said power and authority into execution, any alterations of any steps, doors, or entrances into any houses or buildings, or of any pavement, sewer, or drain adjoining or belonging to any property, shall be rendered necessary, such alteration shall be made by the said council by and out of the rates to be raised by virtue of this Act."

Section 58: "And be it enacted, that the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses shall be liable to be indicted at common law for the want of the sufficient repair of any public highway within the said borough, in the same manner as any person or persons liable to the repair of such highways was or were before the passing of this Act."

Section 160 enacted that the various parishes and townships which then composed the borough should be separate and distinct districts for the purpose of laying and levying the rates imposed.

Section 161 enacted that the £5,000 required to be contributed under the Act of 1830 should be paid from the borough fund towards the sewerage and paving rates in the district of the parish of Liverpool.

Pickford, K.C., and Oulton, for the appellants.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Stewart-Brown, for the plaintiff.

Pickford, K.C., replied.

The following authorities were cited in the course of the arguments: Hartnell v. Ryde Commissioners, 11 W. R. 963, 4 B. & S. 361; Russell v. Men of Devon, 2 D. & E. 667; Ohrby v. Ryde Commissioners, 12 W. R. 1079, 5 B. & S. 743; Atkinson v. Newcastle and Gateshead Waterworks Co., 25 W. R. 794, 2 Ex. D. 441; Couch v. Steel, 2 W. R. 170, 3 E. & B. 402; Gibson v. Mayor of Preston, 18 W. R. 689, 5 Q. B. 218; Parsons v. St. Matthew, Bethnal Green, 15 W. R. 85, 3 C. P. 56; Cowley v. Newmarket Local Board, [1892] A. C. 345, 41 W. R. Dig. 85; Pictou Municipality v. Geldert, 42 W. R. 114, [1893] A. C. 524; Sydney Municipal Council v. Bourke, [1895] A. C. 433, 43 W. R. Dig. 74; Saunders v. Holborn Board of Works, 43 W. R. 26, [1895] 1 Q. B. 64; Young v. Davis, 11 W. R. 735, 2 H. & C. 197; Henley v. Mayor of Lyme, 5 Bing. 91; Lyme Regis Corporation v. Henley, 8 Bligh N. S. 690; Mayor of Lynn v. Turner, 1 Cowp. 86; Mackinnon v. Penson, 2 W. R. 262, 8 Ex. 319, 9 Ex. 609; Sutton v. Johnstone, 1 B. & E. 493; Guardians of Holborn Union v. Vestry of Shoreditch, 25 W. R. 40, 2 Q. B. D. 145; Nitrophosphate Manure Co. v. London and St. Katharine Docks Co., 9 Ch. D. 503, 26 W. R. Dig. 152; Gorris v. Scott, 22 W. R. 575, 9 Ex. 125; Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Gibbs, 14 W. R. 872, L. R. 1 E. & I. App. 93; Wilson v. Mayor of Halifax, 16 W. R. 707, 3 Ex. 114; Forbes v. Lea Conservancy Board, 27 W. R. 688, 4 Ex. D. 116; Glossop v. Heston and Isleworth Local Board, 12 Ch. D. 102, 27 W. R. Dig. 121; Borough of Bathurst v. Macpherson, 4 A. C. 256, 27 W. R. Dig. 139; Reg. v. Mayor of Poole, 36 W. R. 239, 19 Q. B. D. 602; Rex v. Mayor of Liverpool, 3 East 86; Bull v. Mayor of Shoreditch, 20 Times L. R. 254; Clerk and Lindsell on Torts (3rd ed.), pp. 31, 32; Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes (3rd ed.), p. 575, et seq.; Pratt on Highways (13th ed.), p. 319.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is an appeal from the decision of the judge of the Liverpool Passage Court, who considered himself bound by the decision in Hartnall v. Ryde Commissioners, and therefore gave judgment for the plaintiff, but it is obvious from his judgment that the learned judge would have arrived at a different conclusion if he had not felt himself bound by that decision. Now it is said that Hartnall v. Ryde Commissioners, if it has not been overruled, has at all events been commented on in the House of Lords, particularly by Lord Herschell, in such a way as to cast grave doubt upon its authority. I do not myself think we need go the length of saying that Hartnall v. Ryde Commissioners has been overruled. It is a decision that is based upon a particular Act of Parliament, and it may be doubted whether the Court of Queen's Bench in that case intended to lay down the general principle that has been attributed to it, or intended to say that that general principle so laid down applied universally in every case where a liability to repair highways is imposed by an Act of Parliament. If the Court of Queen's Bench did mean to lay down such a general principle, then it would seem to be inconsistent with the subsequent decision of the House of Lords in the case of Cowley v. Newmarket Local Board. That case turned upon the liability of the local board established by the Public Health Act, 1875, in respect of non-repair of a highway, and the House of Lords, affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal, held that no action would lie in such a case against a local board created under that Act. It is difficult to see how the House of Lords could have come to that conclusion consistently with the case of Hartnall v. Ryde Commissioners if the latter case really did lay down the principle which it has been suggested that it did lay down in respect to highways generally. Looking therefore to the decision of the House of Lords in Cowley v. Newmarket Local Board, we may at all events act upon the assumption that Hartnall v. Ryde Commissioners is not good law, if it is right to assume that it did lay down the general proposition suggested in cases of nonfeasance. Our duty in this case is to look at the Act of 1846 and consider what is the liability of the Corporation of Liverpool when sued in a civil action for damages through injuries sustained by reason of the highway being out of repair. I think it is right to say here that, notwithstanding the observations addressed to us by counsel for the plaintiff, I am clearly of opinion that there is no evidence whatsoever that the court ought to consider, or which, if the case had been before a jury, ought to have been left to the jury, of any fact of misfeasance on the part of the corporation. Our attention was called to a recent decision of the House of Lords in Shoreditch Corporation v. Bull, and it was suggested that there was something in that case to lead us to say that there is evidence in this case of an act of misfeasance by the defendants having caused the accident, the subject of the action, I do not find anything in that decision compelling us to come, or which ought to induce us to come, to any such conclusion. It is quite true that there may be cases in which an act of misfeasance by the body liable to repair has thrown the road into a condition which amounts to a nuisance, and would make it dangerous for the public to use it. If by an act of misfeasance a road has been reduced to such a condition, it is impossible for the defendants to say that the complaint relates to mere misfeasance in not putting the road right, when it really relates to an act of misfeasance in first putting the road wrong. The evidence in Shoreditch Corporation v. Bull did show that acts of misfeasance on the part of those who were under the obligation to repair had reduced the road to a condition which made it unfit to use; and, as I understand it, they could not then say that the fact that they had omitted to remedy the wrong done entitled them to treat the action as an action for nonfeasance as distinguished from an action for misfeasance. Having said that, I will now deal with the only question that is left for us. We have to consider what was the intention of the Act of 1846. I do not propose to say much about the previous history of the obligations to repair in the borough of Liverpool. Shortly stated, there was a time prior to 1830 during which the streets in the town of Liverpool were partly repairable by the inhabitants of the parish in that town, although there were other streets which were repairable by the corporation of the borough, such liability being a prescriptive liability. The fact that boroughs frequently do incur a liability by prescription to repair streets, or certain streets, within the limits of the borough is undoubted —I see that the fact is mentioned in 2 Coke's Institutes, p. 700—and that was the state of things prior to 1830. Then came the legislation under the Act of 1830, and then came the legislation under the Act of 1846. Some suggestion was made that under the Act of 1830 the liabilities were definitely imposed upon the commissioners. Another suggestion was that according to the true construction of the Act of 1830 that was not so, but I do not think we need take that question into consideration. We have to construe the Act of 1846, and construing that Act, the first thing it deals with is liability to repair, which by the common law, independently of other special legislation or the existence of some liability ratione tenuræ or some prescriptive liability, would be thrown upon the inhabitants at large. That is the liability which is dealt with in this Act of Parliament and which is imposed upon the corporation, and we have to say whether the liability so imposed on the corporation ought, according to the true construction of this Act of Parliament, to be held to be a liability of the same nature as the liability of the inhabitants to repair by the common law, or whether it ought to be treated as a different liability and a larger liability, or, to state the particular question that we have to decide, whether the liability so imposed upon the corporation is one which, so far as nonfeasance is concerned, can only be enforced by the Crown by indictment and not by action on the part of a subject at all, or is a liability coming within the rule that where a duty is laid upon a public body by statute an action for damages will lie by any individual member of the public who sustains particular injury by reason of the neglect of such public body to perform that duty. We have to decide within which of those two rules, according to the true construction of this Act of Parliament, the corporation must be held to come. In my opinion the corporation under this Act of Parliament come within the former proposition and not the latter. I think that according to the true construction of this Act of Parliament there has been transferred to the corporation the same duty of repair and the same liability which, ordinarily speaking, is incurred by the inhabitants of a parish in respect of the maintenance of the highway in repair, and not such a statutory duty as to render the corporation liable to an action at the suit of a subject who has sustained particular injury by the neglect of the corporation to perform the duty of repair which is cast upon them by this Act of Parliament. But it is necessary to refer a little at length to the provisions of this Act. The Act by section 1 sets forth that it is expedient that powers be granted for the construction and maintenance of drains and sewers and for the paving and flagging of the streets should be combined under one management and should be uniform throughout the whole of the borough; and then, by section 36, throws on the corporation the duties of surveyors of the highways—a section which it is worth while to notice is almost identical with section 144 of the Public Health Act, 1875, upon which Cowley v. Newmarket Local Board was decided. No one has argued that section 36 taken alone would impose upon the defendants the liability to be sued in such an action as the present. Then comes section 37, which vests the control of the streets and the pavements and materials in the corporation; and it is said that the effect of that section and section 38, which deals with the paving of streets and other matters, is to impose upon the corporation a primary duty to repair, and that they are not entitled to the benefit of the undoubted doctrine of law which has been established in respect to inhabitants of parishes when the liability to repair was thrown upon them. There again, however, an answer is found in Cowley v. Newmarket Local Board, because if we look at the later sections in the Public Health Act, 1875, and in particular at section 149, we find that they also contain similar provisions as to the vesting of the streets in the urban authority, and also as to the control of such streets. There is in substance no difference between the effect of section 149 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and the provisions in sections 37 and 38 of the Act of 1846. Undoubtedly in Cowley v. Newmarket Local Board the House of Lords, and also the Court of Appeal, held, notwithstanding provisions with regard to the vesting of streets to which I have called attention, that the case fell exactly within the same limits of liability as had always existed at common law in cases where the obligation to repair was the obligation of the inhabitants at large. Therefore, so far as that is concerned, the construction thus far of the provisions of the Act of 1846 seems to necessitate the same conclusion as to the meaning of that statute as the House of Lords arrived at in construing the Public Health Act of 1875. Now, I should like, before dealing with section 58, to say a word or two upon what was the ground of the decision in Cowley v. Newmarket Local Board. I observe that both Halsbury, L.C., and Lord Herschell assume that under the Public Health Act, 1875, the primary obligation to repair was imposed by that Act upon the urban authority and they assume that, notwithstanding the fact that in section 144 that which is said to be imposed upon the local board is the offices and duties of a surveyor of highways, just as it is under the Act of 1846 which we have to consider; and I also assume with reference to this Act that the primary duty to repair is similarly thrown upon the corporation. That statutory obligation having been created, how is it that by the decision in Cowley v. Newmarket Local Board escape is made from the general proposition that where a statutory duty is created of such a nature that indictment would lie, or a remedy by criminal law be good, for neglect to perform the statutory duty, an action will lie at the suit of a subject sustaining a particular injury? How is it that the undoubted general principle is avoided? According to my understanding of the judgments both of Lord Halsbury and of Lord Herschell, it is by going back to the nature of the liability which is thrown upon the inhabitants of the parish in respect of the repair of roads and the limitation of procedure for neglect to perform that duty to procedure by the Crown; and I arrive at the conclusion that in this Act of Parliament—an Act, in my judgment, mainly passed for purposes of remedy and convenience in performing the duties relating to a large accretion of houses and streets—the object was that, and that alone, and by no means to alter the liability of those upon whom, for convenience, the carrying out of this work is thrown, but to leave it exactly as it was when the obligation to repair was thrown upon the inhabitants of the parish. What Lord Herschell said was this: [His lordship read from p. 353 in 1892 A. C., "And in Young v. Davis it was held . . . I think the judgment appealed from ought to be affirmed," and continued:] This speech of Lord Herschell is followed by the speech of Lord Hannen, who was a party to the judgment in Gibson v. Preston Corporation. Lord Hannen said: "This principle"—that is, the principle that exempted both the surveyor of highways and inhabitants from a civil action—"is equally applicable where the duties and liabilities of the surveyor have been transferred to other bodies, unless a distinct intention on the part of the Legislature can be inferred from the particular statute under consideration to create a new liability. This was laid down in 1870 in the case of Gibson v. Preston Corporation." In the present case for the present purpose the provisions in the Act which we have to consider are substantially the same as those contained in the Public Health Act, 1875, and the Public Health Act, 1848, and in those circumstances we ought to say, as was said in Cowley v. Newmarket Local Board and in Gibson v. Preston Corporation, that we do not find any distinct intention on the part of the Legislature by the Act of 1846 to create any new liability. If we apply that principle the result is that we ought to say that the corporation is not liable to be sued by the individual for damages resulting from nonfeasance any more than the inhabitants of the parish would have been. I do not forget that in seeking to sue the inhabitants of a parish in a civil action there were technical difficulties; but, without lengthening my judgment by referring to the cases upon the subject, it is perfectly plain that the technical answer to such an action was not the only one upon which the court proceeded in holding that no such action would lie. The only other question is this: Does section 58 of the Act of 1846 make any difference? That section enacts that the corporation "shall be liable to be indicted at common law for the want of the sufficient repair of any public highway within the said borough, in the same manner as any person or persons liable to the repair of such highways was or were before the passing of this Act." It is said that those words "person or persons" would cover the liability of persons who were liable to repair not by the common law, but, say, by ratione tenuræ; and they suggest that by reason of the provisions in that section a distinct intention is found on the part of the Legislature to impose upon the Corporation of Liverpool a liability to be sued in civil actions where an individual has sustained damage by reason of the non-performance of the obligation to keep the roads in proper repair. I cannot agree that there is anything in that section to make it right that we should find such a distinct intention on the part of the Legislature. I think that, having regard to the legislation that has taken place and to the various decisions which have been given, we ought, in construing this Act of Parliament, to start with a primâ facie presumption that in the transfer of the common law obligation to repair lying on the inhabitants of the parish at large and on other bodies for the purposes of the public convenience, the Legislature did not by such transfer intend to impose any greater duty or any greater obligation upon the person or bodies to whom the obligation was transferred than that which would have existed before the transfer. If one starts with that primâ facie presumption, then we must find in the Act of Parliament something that shows a distinct intention on the part of the Legislature to throw upon the transferee of the obligation a larger liability. In my opinion we cannot do so from anything that appears in this Act of Parliament. On the contrary, I think that this Act of Parliament is an Act which was manifestly passed merely for convenience in carrying out the duties imposed by the public and for the public, and in these circumstances the presumption I have spoken of is rather stronger than otherwise. I think for these reasons that the judgment must be set aside and judgment entered for the defendants.

ROMER, L.J.—I have arrived at the same conclusion. No case was proved or made by the plaintiff at the trial of the action that the highway in question was one of the ancient or special streets which the Corporation of Liverpool were liable to repair by prescription, as stated in the preamble to the Act of 1830. Therefore I need not consider whether, if that fact had been proved by the plaintiff, the corporation, before the Act of 1830, would have been liable to an action for damages for non-repair, or whether, if that corporation had been so liable, that liability passed first by the Act of 1830 to the commissioners thereby appointed; or, secondly, under the Act of 1846, to the present defendants. It was admitted in the court below, and the appeal before us was argued on the same footing, that the case is to be determined on the hypothesis that the highway in question was one originally repairable by the inhabitants of the parish of Liverpool. Now clearly those inhabitants would not have been liable to an action for damages for non-repair. That was finally determined by the case of Russell v. Men of Devon. That being so, the next question arises: Were the commissioners appointed by the Act of 1830 then made liable to such an action? Of course, in considering that question the fact of there being such ancient streets as stated in the preamble to the Act is to be borne in mind, so far as relevant in construing the Act; but before coming to the special provisions of the Act of 1830 I desire to make some observations on some questions of principle governing the construction of such Acts as those of 1830 and 1846. In the first place, it has been said that the reason why the inhabitants of a parish were held not liable for non-repair was really because, as a matter of form, they could not be sued by a member of the public injured by the want of repair. It was said that if you find the liability to repair formerly placed on the inhabitants of a parish transferred by an Act of Parliament to a new corporation or body created for the purpose of taking over the liability to repair, then, inasmuch as the new body or corporation could be sued, there was no longer any reason why an action should not lie against that new body for non-repair of the highway. That view, however, has long since been shown to be wrong, although from time to time the contention is raised again, and is freshly urged. In Cowley v. Newmarket Local Board Lord Halsbury dealt with the point. After referring to the case of Russell v. Men of Devon, he continued: "That that has been considered to be the law for now more than a hundred years is certain, and, as has been pointed out, the objection in point of form to an action against the surveyor of the highways was not only an objection of form, but underlying it there was the objection of substance. The question of whether it was form or substance came before the Court of Exchequer in Mackinnon v. Penson. The effort there had been to argue that inasmuch as the county could not in point of form be sued, and that previous judgments had referred to that fact, the 43 Geo. 3, c. 59, s. 4, which enacted that the county might be sued in the name of its surveyor, disposed of the objection of form, as indeed it did. But the court went on to say that that statute did not give, and was not intended to give, an action for such an injury against the county, but that in cases where right could be maintained against the county an action might be brought against them in the name of their surveyor. That was, therefore, a distinct authority that no new right of action was intended to be created, and so far as I am aware that has continued to be the state of the authorities down to the present hour." Furthermore, I think that certain other principles are now established with reference to the Acts of Parliament which create new bodies with duties and obligations cast upon them to do the repairs of highways in lieu of the inhabitants of the parish. Modern authorities show that the question whether in such cases the liability to an action for damages for non-repair is thrown upon the new body created by an Act of Parliament such as I have mentioned, and such as those of 1830 and 1846, in the present case is one to be gathered from the words of the special Act. And it was pointed out in the case of Picton Municipality v. Geldert by Lord Hobhouse, who delivered the judgment of the Privy Council in that case, that "it must now be taken as settled law that a transfer to a public corporation of the obligation to repair does not of itself render such corporation liable to an action in respect of mere nonfeasance. In order to establish such liability it must be shown that the Legislature has used language indicating an intention that this liability shall be imposed." I need not go through these modern authorities in detail. I think the result of them, and in particular of the case of Cowley v. Newmarket Local Board, is accurately summed up by Mathew, J. (as he then was), in the case of Saunders v. Holborn District Board of Works, where, after referring to the cases, he said: "The result of these decisions is plain. It is that in order to establish that a public body of this description is liable to an action for default in performing a duty imposed by statute, it must be shown that the Legislature has used language indicating an intention that this liability shall be imposed, and unless such an intention on the part of the Legislature is clearly disclosed no action will lie." As I have said, those observations appear to me accurately to sum up the new authorities, treating the observations of Mathew, J., as being confined, as I think they were intended to be, to the question of the construction of such Acts of Parliament as those to which I have referred. But I ought, before parting with the question of principle, to say a word about the case of Hartnall v. Ryde Commissioners, for, as I understand the judgment of the learned judge of the court below, he seems to feel himself constrained to decide this case in the way he did, contrary to his own judgment, because he thought he was bound to do so by the authority of that case. Now with regard to the case of Hartnall v. Ryde Commissioners. I must say that that case cannot now be regarded as law, if and so far as it seems to indicate an opposite view on the question of principle to that which I have previously expressed or to lay down as a general proposition that the mere fact of a new body being created with the duty and liability to repair in itself makes that new body liable to an action for non-repair. That case, if it is to be supported at all at the present day, must be treated merely as a decision on the special wording of the Act there in question. I must, however, say that, governed by the light of more recent authorities to which I have referred, I think I should not myself now, if obliged to construe the Act there in question, arrive at the same conclusion as that arrived at by the judges who decided that case. Now, applying those principles to the Acts in the present case, it seems to me to follow that in the present case the defendants are not liable in the way suggested by the plaintiff. When I turn to the Act of 1830, though I bear in mind the preamble to which I have previously referred, I find that in sections 75 and 76 the general scope of the duties of the commissioners is referred to as being that of surveyor of highways. I find a special provision at the end of section 76 with regard to the liability to repair, and it is noticeable that it runs in this form—namely, that it provides that such of the streets and highways as were theretofore repaired or repairable by the mayor, alderman, and burgesses—that is to say, the ancient and particular streets to which I have previously referred—shall from and after the passing of the Act be repaired and repairable, and have sewers made therein and kept in repair by the commissioners. In other words, their express liability to repair is not extended to the streets repairable by the inhabitants of the parish on the construction of that Act, and therefore I have no doubt that the commissioners would not by virtue of that Act have been placed in the position of being liable to an action for non-repair, and the highways repairable by the inhabitants of the parish of Liverpool.

That brings me to the last question on the point of law—namely, the question of the construction of the Act of 1846. With regard to that Act, I may say shortly that when I look at the preamble and the provisions of it, and especially when I look at sections 36 and 37, I should come to the conclusion that speaking generally the Act of Parliament intended to impose upon the new body created by that Act to repair the highways only limited liabilities. Sections 36 and 37 generally say that the new body shall be subject to all the liabilities to which surveyors of highways are now by law subject or may hereafter be subject. Now surveyors of highways certainly would not be liable as such merely as surveyors to an action for damages for non-repair. And one certainly cannot gather from sections 36 and 37 any intention to cast upon the new body any such general obligation as that now insisted upon by the plaintiff. The only other section which avails the plaintiff at all is section 58. That has already been read by my lord, and all I will say is this, that in my opinion not only does it clearly not carry the liability of the new body beyond indictment so as to extend the liability to an action for non-repair, but I cannot help thinking that on the true construction it shews that it was intended that the liability of the new body beyond the general liability to which the surveyors of highways would be liable was to be limited to the remedy by indictment. That ends the case, and the conclusion therefore I arrive at is that the defendants are under no liability to the plaintiff in this action for non-repair. On the mere question of fact which has been raised at the last moment, or as a second string to his bow by counsel who argued the case on behalf of the plaintiff, I need only say that in my opinion on the facts there was no evidence against the defendant of misfeasance by them as distinguished from nonfeasance. I think it is clear that the action occurred to the plaintiff merely by reason of non-repair and for no other real reason. It follows, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with what has been said by my brethren, and I will add but very few words. The action is brought against the Corporation of Liverpool to recover damages caused by the non-repair of a street within the borough. Now, if this street is to be taken upon the admissions made in the court below and in the course of the arguments before us to have been a street which originally was repairable by the parish simply no action could be maintained against that parish by reason of nonfeasance on their part. It must, I think, be taken in this case, as I understand the learned judge to have found, that no misfeasance was proved, and therefore it is simply a case of nonfeasance. The duties which originally fell upon the parish of Liverpool have been transferred to the Corporation of Liverpool by a statute, and the action is based upon the provisions of that statute. I think the law to be—as it is stated by the Lord Hannen in the passage which has already been read by my lord—that in dealing with a statute of this kind it is not to be inferred that a new liability is created unless distinct intention on the part of the Legislature can be found in the terms of the Act. That brings us to consider the terms of the Act. Now we start with this—that in the year 1830 an Act was passed which appointed certain commissioners to control the highways within the parish of Liverpool, part of which were at that time repairable by that parish and part by the corporation by prescription. The corporation were by that Act released from their obligation to repair upon the terms of paying a sum of £5,000 per annum to the parish for the purpose of the Act. The Act of 1846, with which we have to deal, repealed that Act of 1830, and the main ground on which it was passed was the great growth which had taken place in the intervening time in the development of Liverpool. After reciting the various Acts, the preamble goes on to recite the extensions of the borough of Liverpool and that it was expedient that provision should be made for dealing with streets and sewage, and also that these powers should be combined under one management and should be uniform throughout the whole of the borough. Then, as regards the streets, the material provisions are those in sections 36, 37, and 38, which, as was correctly pointed out in argument, resemble sections 144 and 149 of the Public Health Act, 1875. These sections standing by themselves certainly do not when read in the light of the decision of the House of Lords in Cowley v. Newmarket Local Board impose any new liability. Then we come to section 58, which has already been referred to, and I will also refer to section 160, which shows that though the various parishes and townships which then constituted the borough were brought under the control of the corporation for the purposes mentioned, yet it was provided that they should be separate and distinct districts; and to section 161, which provided that the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses should continue out of the borough fund to pay the sum of £5,000, as to which liability was imposed by the Act of 1830. Are we to infer, looking at the Act as a whole, that these provisions—more particularly those which I have enumerated—and reading all the sections together—intended to impose a new liability on the corparation and to make the corporation liable for nonfeasance where the parish would not have been liable? I am unable to arrive at that conclusion. It seems to me that section 58 was merely intended to provide convenient machinery by which the remedy by indictment might be put in force, and that the person who complained of non-repair should not be driven to consider what person or persons of the corporation or parish or township was or were the proper party or parties to be indicted, and that the indictment should be in such a case against the corporation, but I cannot see under section 58 any intention on the part of the Legislature to impose a liability which previously did not exist. For these reasons I agree that the appeal ought to be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, F. Venn & Co., for E. R. Pickmere, Town Clerk of Liverpool; Charles Russell & Co., for T. P. Maguire, Liverpool.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. }
Buckley, J. } March 28.

In re WEST COAST GOLD FIELDS (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Winding up—Bankruptcy of contributory—Liability on shares—Proof in bankruptcy—Surplus assets—Right of participation.

The holder of shares in a limited company which has gone into liquidation, upon which shares there is a liability for calls, cannot share in the distribution of the surplus assets of the company until he has paid all sums due to the company in respect of his liability on the shares, and this is so with regard to his trustee in bankruptcy where the shareholder has become bankrupt, even when the company have proved against his estate for the amount of the liability, and have received a dividend thereon before they went into liquidation.

The principle of In re Overend, Gurney, & Co., Ex parte Grissell, 14 W. R. 1015, L. R. 1 Ch. 528, applied.

Summons.

The above company was incorporated in 1901 with a capital of £1 shares. It had issued 18,000 shares fully paid up, and 12,107 shares upon which 10s. per share had been paid, and a call of 1s. per share had been made in December, 1902.

By their articles of association the company had a lien upon all their shares for moneys due to them (including calls) and for liabilities on the part of the registered holders.

A. S. Rowe was the registered holder of 1,800 of the 12,107 partly paid-up shares.

On the 22nd of January, 1903, Rowe became bankrupt, and the applicant, Salaman, was appointed the trustee of his estate.

On the 26th of January, 1903, the company lodged a proof against the estate for £900, made up of £90 in respect of the call of 1s. per share, and £810 for the uncalled liability of 9s. per share. This proof was admitted at £819, being the £90 and the £810 less 10 per cent. discount. The company did not value their lien upon the shares of the bankrupt in their proof.

In January, 1904, the company received from the trustee in bankruptcy £61 18s. 6d. as a dividend of 1s. 6d. in the £ upon their proof.

In May, 1904, the company went into voluntary liquidation, and the respondent was appointed liquidator.

In June, 1904, an application was made to the court by the company for leave to amend their proof by valuing their lien, or to withdraw it and lodge another. This was refused: see In re Rowe, Ex parte West Coast Gold Fields (Limited), 52 W. R. 608, [1904] 2 K. B. 489.

In the winding up it turned out that the unpaid capital on the shares would be sufficient to satisfy all the liabilities of the company and provide a surplus for the contributories of some 2s. per share.

The trustee in bankruptcy claimed that in the distribution of the assets of the company amongst the contributories the 1,800 shares of Rowe ought to be treated as fully paid up, and that the trustee ought to be placed upon the list of contributories as the registered holder of these shares as fully paid up; and upon the liquidator refusing to do this he took out this summons asking for a declaration to the above effect.

F. Cassel, for the applicant.—By proving for the liability of Rowe the company gave up their lien upon his shares and also their rights against him, and had only a claim upon his estate. They must be treated as having been paid their claim for liability on the shares, and consequently the trustee of Rowe is entitled to share in the distribution of assets. The principle is that proof is equivalent to payment of the debt. This was conceded in the case of In re MacMahon, [1900] 1 Ch., p. 177. The same principle has been recognized as between an executor of an estate and a debtor to the estate who is entitled to a share in it and who has become bankrupt (Stammers v. Elliott, 16 W. R. 489, 3 Ch. App. 195), and in the case of a secured creditor in bankruptcy: Ex parte Hornby, Buck. 351; Ex parte Solomon, 1 G. & J. 25.

He also referred to Ex parte West Riding Union Banking Co., 30 W. R. 239, 19 Ch. D. 105, 112.

Astbury, K.C., and P. M. Walters, for the respondent.—The debt of Rowe may have been discharged by the proof of the company, but it was not paid. If it were paid then a surety for the bankrupt would become discharged by the proof. Stammers v. Elliott turned upon the fact that the proof was by an executor who had absolute power over debts due to his testator. The distribution of assets is really a return to the shareholders of the capital paid by them on the shares, and those who have not paid up all the capital due cannot have part returned. [BUCKLEY, J., referred to In re Overend, Gurney, & Co., Ex parte Grissell.]

Cassel, in reply.—In Grissell's case the shareholder had not become bankrupt, and consequently there was no proof as here.

BUCKLEY, J.—In Grissell's case it was decided, many years ago, that where a person is both a creditor of and a shareholder in a company, his shares being partly paid up, he must satisfy all his obligations as shareholder and contributory, by paying into the common fund all sums due from him in respect of calls, before he can say: "As a creditor I am entitled to take something out of the common fund." There can be no set-off; the man must pay in before he can be heard to say he can take out. Now, the case with which I have to deal is not that of a creditor who also holds shares, but is simply that of a person who is a shareholder, and a shareholder only, and all that he is entitled to receive from the company is receivable not in respect of a debt, but in respect of a distributive share of the assets of the company in liquidation. I am asked to say that he is entitled to receive on distribution before he has discharged himself of his obligation to pay in. In other words, the case is a much stronger case, as it seems to me, against the applicant than was Grissell's case. It is said that these are his rights because he is a bankrupt. In fact these shares have had paid on them £900—viz., 10s. a share—and £61 8s. 6d., making together £961 8s. 6d. The trustee says that he ought to receive in distribution the same amount as if there had been paid £1,800 on the shares. Is that right or is it wrong? In my judgment it is wrong. The argument is that proof is equivalent to payment. To my mind that is an axiomatic or epigrammatic way of stating something which, in the circumstances, is quite untrue for the material purposes of this case. Of course proof is equivalent to payment in this sense, that the debtor can be pressed no further than for that amount; he is discharged, but his estate is not discharged. The proof is the record of the fact that his estate is liable, and that from his estate you are entitled to receive, rateably with the other creditors, dividends until the whole amount has been paid. That is not payment at all for any purpose which is material here. The cardinal fact is that the amount proved for is not paid. What will be the rights of the company in the future? In respect of this proof, if there are further assets of the bankrupt—and only if there are further assets—there will be a right to receive back part of these moneys. Now what is the right decision under these circumstances? Why does Grissell's case not apply? I do not want to use any terms that are misleading, but I shall not be misunderstood if I say that the trustee is the owner of the shares, and the trustee is the person who is liable to pay for these shares. In both cases there are the rights against the estate. It is said that the principle of Grissell's case does not apply to such a state of things as this. It seems to me that it does apply, and à fortiori when, as here, the trustee is seeking to get distribution as a contributory when he has not complied with his liability to pay as a contributory. Another ground on which Mr. Astbury puts it, and which I think is also worthy of consideration, is this, that what you do in distribution of surplus assets is in substance to repay that which has been paid; that you are returning to the shareholders that which they have paid; and that where one man has paid more than another, the first thing you do is to repay the man who has paid most until you bring him down to the level of the man who has paid less. Here the shareholder has only paid £961, instead of £1,800; then you pay the other contributories until you have brought them down to the same level. That would seem to me a proper mode of administration under these circumstances. The other view of the case resolves itself into this, that the trustee would be entitled to take, by way of distribution, moneys now which, of course, would become part of the estate of the debtor, and then in respect of this proof the company would be entitled to rank against that sum with other creditors, and would thus get back some part of that which it had just paid into the estate. That is exactly what in Grissell's case was held not to be the right mode of administration. The right view is that the person liable as contributory must discharge himself in that character before he can set up that, as a creditor, he is entitled to distribution, and à fortiori, as it seems to me, before he can set up that, as a contributory, he is entitled to receive anything. I therefore think that this summons fails.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Summons dismissed.

Solicitors, Morley, Shirreff, & Co.; Dollman & Pritchard.

Chan. Div.
Swinfen Eady, J. } April 7, 13.

PRICE v. JOHN. (a.)

Rent-charge—Apportionment—Release of part of the hereditaments—Law of Property Amendment Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 35), s. 10.

Upon a release of a portion of hereditaments charged with a rent-charge, where the persons entitled to the remaining hereditaments concur in and confirm the release, the release operates only to bar the right to recover any part of the rent-charge out of the hereditaments released, and the remaining hereditaments remain liable to the whole of the rent-charge without apportionment.

Action.

By his will dated the 5th of December, 1856, P. Taylor devised a moiety of mines and minerals in the county of Glamorgan to his niece Ann Williams, subject to an annuity of £70 per annum which the testator charged upon his share and interest in the said mines and minerals in favour of H. E. Evans and her heirs for ever.

By an indenture dated the 14th of February, 1863, the said annuity of £70 per annum was granted and conveyed unto and to the use of David E. Williams, his heirs and assigns.

By an indenture of settlement dated the 29th of December, 1868, David E. Williams and the said Ann Williams granted and released two equal undivided eight parts of the said mines and minerals and all the estate, right, title, interest, property, claim and demand of the said David E. Williams and Ann, his wife, upon the trusts thereby declared.

Ann Williams died on the 18th of April, 1883.

David E. Williams died on the 1st of April, 1902.

By his will, dated the 19th of July, 1899, David E. Williams gave the said annuity of £70 per annum to the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs asked for a declaration that they were entitled to an annuity or rent-charge of £70 per annum, or, alternatively, an annuity or rent-charge of £35 per annum charged upon or issuing out of the unsettled share of Ann Williams in the said mines and minerals.

R. J. Parker, for the plaintiffs.

J. G. Wood, for the defendants.

SWINFEN EADY, J., in giving judgment, said: The question is—What was the legal effect of the voluntary settlement of the 29th of December, 1868, upon the rent-charge of £70, charged upon and issuing out of the hereditaments thereby conveyed and other hereditaments.

It is not disputed that the hereditaments thereby conveyed were released from all liability in respect of the charge. It was contended on behalf of the first two defendants, either that the whole rent-charge of £70 passed to the grantees of the voluntary settlement, or that a moiety of it passed to them, leaving only a moiety charged on the remaining hereditaments.

By the Law of Property Amendment Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 35), s. 10, it is provided as follows: "The release from a rent-charge of part of the hereditaments charged therewith shall not extinguish the whole rent-charge, but shall operate only to bar the right to recover any part of the rent-charge out of the hereditaments released, without prejudice nevertheless to the rights of all persons interested in the hereditaments remaining unreleased, and not concurring in or confirming the release."

Before this Act a person having a rent-charge, by releasing his right in part of the land charged, extinguished the whole rent: 18 Vin. Abridg. 504. The effect of the settlement, which was executed since the Act, was to release from the rent-charge the part of the hereditaments comprised in the deed, but not to extinguish the whole rent-charge.

Upon a release of a portion of hereditaments charged with a rent-charge, if the persons entitled to the remaining hereditaments have not concurred in or confirmed the release, their rights are not affected under the statute, and accordingly it was held in Booth v. Smith, 33 W. R. 142, 14 Q. B. D. 318, that the remaining hereditaments in such a case will be subject only to a proportionate part of the whole rent-charge. But in the present case the persons entitled to the remaining hereditaments did concur in and confirm the release, and as regards Mrs. Williams by deed duly acknowledged, so that they are not entitled to the benefit of that portion of the section beginning "without prejudice nevertheless." Their rights are governed, therefore, by the earlier words of the section—that the release shall operate only to bar the right to recover any part of the rent-charge out of the hereditaments released. The remaining hereditaments remain liable, therefore, to the whole of the rent-charge without apportionment. This, in my opinion, is the legal effect of the transaction, and probably was also the intention of the parties, so far as can be gathered from the settlement. The deed contains no reference to the rent-charge, or to the release of it or any part of it, and it may well be that the husband was willing to concur in the deed, and release the hereditaments comprised in it, being satisfied that the remaining hereditaments were a sufficient security for the whole rent-charge, as indeed I understand they were and are.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

After concurring in the settlement, and conveying all his estate and interest in the hereditaments conveyed, the husband could not have afterwards contended successfully that he retained any charge upon or interest in the land conveyed, and the two cases of Drew v. Lord Norbury, 9 Ir. Eq. 171, 177, and Johnson v. Webster, 3 W. R. 84, 4 De G. M. & G. 474, 488, cited by Mr. Wood, support this view, but they are not any authority for the proposition contended for by him: that all or some part of the rent-charge of £70 actually passed by way of grant to the grantees under the voluntary settlement. The effect of that deed is to release the hereditaments conveyed from all and every part of the rent-charge, but not to grant all or any part of the rent-charge to the grantees. It remained vested in the grantor, and his right to enforce it against the remaining hereditaments charged by it was not affected by that deed.

There must be a declaration accordingly and the defendants must pay the costs of the action.

Solicitors, Sharpe, Parker, Pritchards, Barham, & Lawford, for Jeffreys & Powell, Brecon; J. Clement Brown, for C. Valentine Pegge, Neath.

Chan. Div. Warrington, J. } Jan. 13.

HILL v. FEARIS. (a.)

Partnership—Stockbroking business—Goodwill—Asset of partnership—Division of assets—Dissolution—Sale.

T. B. Hill and the defendant carried on business as stockbrokers in London under articles of partnership which contained no mention of goodwill. After the term for which the partnership was constituted expired the business was carried on by them as partners at will, the conditions of the articles being maintained as far as practicable. T. B. Hill died, and the defendant continued to carry on the business under the style of the old firm by permission of the committee of the Stock Exchange. Defendant accounted for Hill's capital, but declined to pay anything in respect of goodwill.

Held, that the nature of a stockbroker's business was not such that there could not be a saleable goodwill thereof; and that, in the absence of any provisions to the contrary in the articles, the goodwill must be sold and the proceeds accounted for.

Wilson v. Williams, [1892] 29 L. R. Ir. 176, 40 W. R. Dig. 166, distinguished.

Thomas Bourne Hill had for some time previously to 1895 carried on business at 29, Threadneedle-street, as a stockbroker under the name of Hill, Fawcett, & Hill.

In that year he took into partnership the defendant Walter Bourne Fearis and his own son, Charles Henry Bourne Hill.

On the 18th of May, 1895, articles of partnership were executed, whereby the partnership was to continue under the name of Hill, Fawcett, & Hill for seven years at the present offices of the firm. The capital was to consist of £3,500 brought in by T. B. Hill, and £750 brought in by each of the other partners.

Clause 26 gave T. B. Hill power to determine the partnership as regards C. H. B. Hill.

Clause 27 was as follows: "In the event of the death of the said T. B. Hill during the partnership the same shall be continued by the surviving partners, who shall pay to his executors or administrators any capital then standing to his credit beyond the said sum of £3,500 in addition to his share of profits to the date of his death, and during the remainder of the term of seven years the executors or administrators of the said T. B. Hill shall also be entitled to receive in addition to interest upon his said capital of £3,500 at the rate hereinafter provided, one-fourth part of the profits of the said business, one other fourth part being paid to the said C. H. B. Hill, and the remainder of the said profits to the said W. B. Fearis."

Clause 29 continued: "Within three calendar months after the determination of the partnership by effluxion of time a full and general account in writing shall be taken by the partners of all moneys, securities, debts, and effects then belonging to the partnership, and of all moneys and debts due by and of the liabilities of the partnership, and a just valuation shall be made of all the particulars included in such account which require and are capable of valuation, and immediately after such last-mentioned account shall have been so taken and settled the partners shall forthwith make due provision for the payment of all moneys and debts then due by the partnership and for meeting all the liabilities thereof, and subject thereto the capital of the partnership shall be repaid to the partners entitled thereto and the residue of the moneys, debts, and effects then belonging to the partnership shall be divided between the partners in the shares to which they are then entitled to the net profits of the partnership. And such instruments in writing shall be executed by the partners for facilitating the getting in of the outstanding debts and effects of the partnership and for indemnifying each other touching the premises and for vesting the sole right and property in the said respective shares of the said debts and effects in the party to whom the same shall upon such division belong and for releasing to each other all claims on account of the partnership as are usual in cases of the like nature." The partnership articles contained no mention of goodwill.

By a memorandum of the 4th of January, 1899, indorsed upon the deed, it was agreed by the three partners that the partnership should, as regards C. H. B. Hill, be dissolved in all respects as if it had been dissolved under clause 26. From this date the business was carried on by T. B. Hill and W. B. Fearis, the former taking two-thirds and the latter one-third of the profits. C. H. B. Hill was appointed an authorized clerk of the firm, with power to draw and sign cheques on their account. The partnership would have expired by effluxion of time on the 20th of May, 1902, but the partners agreed that it should continue in force for another year. From the 20th of May, 1903, until the death of T. B. Hill on the 17th of May, 1904, they carried on business under the same style as partners at will upon the terms of the deed so far as applicable.

The committee of the Stock Exchange having given their permission, Fearis carried on the business after the death of T. B. Hill, in the firm's name and at the same premises. He had repaid T. B. Hill's capital, but declined to account for the profits since his death or to sell the goodwill. He alleged that there was no such thing as a goodwill of a stockbroker's business; and that the partners as members of the London Stock Exchange were bound by the rules of that body; that he had since the death of T. B. Hill carried on the business as his own; that the name of the firm could only be used by permission of the committee, which he had obtained; and that if any goodwill existed it was not saleable.

(a.) Reported by PERCY H. WINFIELD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

C. H. B. Hill, who was also a member of the Stock Exchange, offered £1,000 in August, 1904, which Mrs. Hill, the widow and executrix of T. B. Hill, intended to provide, for the goodwill of the business, but the defendant refused the offer.

Mrs. Hill, the plaintiff, brought this action against Fearis to have the affairs of the partnership wound up by the court, and the assets, including the goodwill thereof, realized; accounts and inquiries, a declaration that the defendant must give credit for profits of the business since T. B. Hill's death, and the difference between £1,000 and the price ultimately obtained for the goodwill.

H. Terrell, K.C., and R. J. Parker, for the plaintiff.—The defendant is bound to sell the goodwill of the business and account to us for the proceeds. If he carries on the business, he does so as trustee and not for himself only. An outgoing partner's estate is entitled to a share of the profits and of the assets: Lindley on Partnership (6th ed.), p. 592; section 42 of the Partnership Act, 1890. The value of the goodwill is an asset of the partnership: In re David and Matthews, 47 W. R. 313, [1899] 1 Ch. 378. Goodwill involves a right to represent that you are carrying on the business of the firm, to solicit the customers of the old firm, to have the books of the firm, and to prevent anybody else from saying that he is carrying on the business. In this case a bonâ fide offer has been made to buy the goodwill for £1,000, so it cannot be of no value.

Gore-Browne, K.C., and Willoughby Williams, for the defendant.—There is no saleable goodwill of the business of a stockbroker practising on the London Stock Exchange: Wilson v. Williams, [1892] 29 L. R. Ir. 176, 40 W. R. Dig. 166. There can be no goodwill, for by the rules of the Stock Exchange no one but the defendant can use the name of the firm. Goodwill is not mentioned in the partnership articles and has not been treated by the partners as an asset, therefore it ought not to be considered an asset on a dissolution: Stewart v. Gladstone, 27 W. R. 512, (1879) 10 Ch. D. 626. The relationship between a stockbroker and his client is purely personal. It is not the fact that every business has a goodwill. For instance, there is no goodwill of a solicitor's business: Austen v. Boys, (1858) 2 De G. & J. 626, 6 W. R. Ch. Dig. 50, and Arundell v. Bell, 31 W. R. 477, (1883) 52 L. J. Ch. 537. There is no mention of goodwill in the deed. In In re David and Matthews the word "effects" was held to include goodwill, but the facts in that case were quite different. The effects consisted of securities, and there was no special custom or rule. Clause 29 of this deed provides for division of the assets, not for realization: Banks v. Gibson, 13 W. R. 1012, (1865) 34 Beav. 566.

H. Terrell, K.C., in reply.—All these old cases have been overruled. At one time it was held that the goodwill belonged to the surviving partner: Hammond v. Douglas, (1800) 5 Ves. 539, 40 R. R. 168n. Then that it was attached to the premises: Cruttwell v. Lye, (1810) 17 Ves. 335, 346, 11 R. R. 98. Now the whole question is covered by Trego v. Hunt, 44 W. R. 225, [1896] A. C. 7, where goodwill is defined. Wilson v. Williams followed Pearson v. Pearson, 32 W. R. 1006, (1884) 27 Ch. D. 145, which was overruled by Trego v. Hunt.

WARRINGTON, J., who had stopped the learned counsel, said that the dispute in this case was between the executrix of a deceased partner and a surviving partner, and for the purposes of his judgment it resolved itself into a question whether amongst the assets of the partnership for the purpose of winding up is to be included the goodwill. In Trego v. Hunt Lord Macnaghten, speaking of "goodwill," says: "Generally it means much more than what Lord Eldon took it to mean in the particular case actually before him in Cruttwell v. Lye, where he says: 'The goodwill which has been the subject of sale is nothing more than the probability that the old customers will resort to the old place.' Often it happens that the goodwill is the very sap and life of the business, without which the business would yield little or no fruit. It is the whole advantage, whatever it may be, of the reputation and connection of the firm, which may have been built up by years of honest work or gained by lavish expenditure of money." Lord Herschell expresses the same thing in rather different words—he says: "It is the connection thus formed, together with the circumstances, whether of habit or otherwise, which tend to make it permanent, that constitutes the goodwill of a business." I summarize that by saying the goodwill of a business is the advantage, whatever it may be, which a person gets by continuing to carry on, and being entitled to represent to the outside world that he is carrying on, a business which has been carried on for some time previously. That seems to me to be the meaning of "goodwill." Here it is said first of all that in a stockbroker's business there is no such thing as goodwill. First, because of the nature of the connection between the stockbroker and those with whom he does business. But there are many cases which one can conceive in which the client, not knowing who to go to, if he knew that his old broker had a successor, might well give that man a trial, and see whether he would continue to employ him or not. It seems to me, therefore, that that branch of the argument fails. Then it is said that in the case of members of the London Stock Exchange the goodwill of a business can have no saleable value, because if the purchaser of a business wishes to carry it on under the original name he can only do so by the permission of the committee of the Stock Exchange. But the successor may be able to represent to clients that he is the successor in the business, and get such advantage as there may be arising out of the connection without saying that he is entitled to carry on the business in the old name. But I am pressed with authority, and I am referred to a case in Ireland, Wilson v. Williams, in which it was decided that in the case of stockbrokers there was no such thing as goodwill. In the first place, I do not think the Vice-Chancellor who decided that case intended to lay down a rule of law. On the contrary, at the conclusion of his judgment he said: "The question is one of mixed law and fact. Without going so far as to lay down any hard-and-fast rule as to stockbrokers' business being in every case incapable of goodwill, I hold that in this case there is no saleable goodwill." He therefore carefully abstained from laying down any rule which would bind a judge in another case on a different consideration of facts.

The result is, therefore, that in dealing with the matter without reference to the partnership articles, I cannot come to the conclusion that there is no advantage arising from the connection and the business of the old firm, and, therefore, that there is nothing that can be treated as a saleable goodwill. I do not for this purpose attribute much importance to the offer made of £1,000. I cannot regard that as an offer made by an outsider. It was really made by the plaintiff, the executrix. But quite independently of that offer, I cannot hold that there is nothing to which a saleable value can be attributed.

It is said, secondly, that by the contract in this particular case the sale of the goodwill, which I must now assume does exist, in the events which have happened, is precluded by the articles of partnership. That is a question of construction. The articles contain only one provision which really bears, even if that can be said in strictness to bear, upon the present question. That is clause 29. In my judgment the real effect of this clause is not only not to exclude the goodwill, but not to exclude any of the assets from the sale. The goodwill is an asset of such a nature that the only division that can be made of it is by means of a sale. Supposing that the particulars enumerated in clause 29 in the description of the assets do not comprise goodwill, then what happens? There is a provision in the partnership articles for a division of part of the assets of the firm. That leaves the distribution of the remainder of the assets of the firm not included in that particular clause to be dealt with by the ordinary law—that is, to be sold and the proceeds to be divided. I cannot, in short, read clause 29 as indicating that the parties intended to exclude from the assets of the firm on the final dissolution any consideration of goodwill.

I hold that in winding up the affairs of this partnership the goodwill must be treated as one of the assets of the firm, and must be realized with the other assets of the firm.

Solicitors, James Robinson; Morley, Shirreff, & Co.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy and Ridley, JJ.) — Jan. 31.

SCOTT v. SOLOMON. (a.)

Revenue—Licence to deal in plate—Sale of packets of tea with coupons—Coupons entitling purchaser to plate as prize—Revenue Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 90), s. 3.

Section 3 of the Revenue Act, 1867, provides that all persons who deal in plate without having in force a proper licence authorizing them to do so shall be liable to a penalty. The appellants, a firm of tea merchants, sold packets of tea, each packet containing a coupon, and they advertised that they would give away (inter alia) articles of plate as prizes in exchange for the largest number of coupons sent in to them during a certain period.

Held, that this was a dealing in plate within the meaning of section 3 of the Act of 1867.

Case stated.

The appellants were charged with dealing in plate without a proper licence contrary to section 3 of the Revenue Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 90).

The appellants carried on business as tea merchants, and gave away coupons with the packets of tea sold by them, and these coupons entitled the customers who had purchased the largest quantity of tea, as evidenced by the coupons sent in by them, to various articles, among them being gold watches and articles of plates. Witnesses who had obtained gold watches by means of this competition were called before the justices. They admitted in cross-examination that the tea was as good and the price of it the same during the competition as it was before and after the competition, but said they understood that in purchasing tea during the competition they were purchasing the possibility of obtaining a gold watch or one of the other prizes. It was admitted the appellants had not a licence to deal in plate, and the justices found as a fact they did deal in plate without a licence within the meaning of the section. They accordingly convicted them, but stated this case.

By 30 & 31 Vict. c. 90, s. 3: "Every person who shall do any act or carry on any business for which a licence to deal in plate is required by this Act, without having in force a proper licence authorizing them to do so, shall for every offence forfeit the sum of £50."

Danckwerts, K.C. (J. R. Atkin with him), for the appellants.—There was no dealing in plate here. To bring the appellants within the section it must be proved that they traded in and sold the articles: see the language of Lord Davey in Grainger v. Gough, 44 W. R. 561, [1896] A. C. 325, at pp. 345, 346, and Wills, J., in Harris v. Amery, 14 W. R. 199, 35 L. J. C. P. 89. It may be this was a lottery, but the Crown cannot require the appellants to take out a licence for conducting a lottery.

Rowlatt (Sir R. Finlay, A.G., with him), for the respondents. — The evidence shows here that the customers when they purchased the tea also purchased a coupon, a sufficient number of which would entitle them to a gold watch. There was therefore a dealing or dealing within the meaning of the section. [He referred to Hall v. McWilliam, (1901) 85 L. T. 239.]

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This case seems to me to be near the line, but the evidence, I think, shows that there was only one transaction —viz., a sale of the tea and also the coupon. It is suggested that a full value in tea was given in return for the price paid, but that is absurd, as the business of the appellants could not be carried on if there were no payment for the coupons. I think that this is a system of trading in watches by means of receiving payment for them in instalments. Reliance has been placed on the language of Lord Davey in Grainger v. Gough, but I do not think that Lord Davey can have meant to say that there can be no trading unless the money for the article passes at the time of purchase. Then it is suggested that this transaction is a lottery. Whether that is so or not it seems to me it would be wrong to find that there was no trading here, because possibly the proceeding is a lottery.

I think, therefore, the conviction must be affirmed.

KENNEDY and RIDLEY, JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for appellants, Chester & Co., for Holt, Risque, & Robson, Manchester.

Solicitor for respondent, Solicitor for Inland Revenue.

C. C. R.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills, Kennedy, Channell, and Phillimore, JJ.) — Jan. 21, 31.

R. v. LAWSON. (a.)

Criminal law—Manager of company—Publication of false statements—Larceny Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96), s. 84.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

A person who in fact acts as the manager of a public company, though he has never been appointed to that position, is a "manager" within the meaning of section 84 of the Larceny Act, 1861, and is therefore liable to be convicted for having published false statements with intent to deceive or defraud.

Case stated for the opinion of the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved by A. T. Lawrence, J.

"1. Henry John Lawson was tried before me on the 22nd of November, 1904, and following days at the Central Criminal Court on an indictment charging him under section 84 of the Larceny Act, 1861, with unlawfully making, circulating, and publishing written statements false to his knowledge, with intent to induce persons to become shareholders in the Electric Tramway Construction and Maintenance Co. (Limited).

"2. The said company was a limited company registered under the Companies Acts, 1862-1900.

"3. The articles of association (which were put in evidence) contained provisions empowering the board to appoint a manager.

"4. No minute of the board appointing a manager was in existence, and there was no evidence of any actual appointment of the prisoner as manager by the directors of the company.

"5. The nominal capital of the company was £250,000, divided into 250,000 shares of £1 each.

"The issued capital consisted of £55,000 shares issued as fully paid.

"6. The whole of these shares, with the exception of about 5,000, were held by the prisoner or his nominees.

"7. The prisoner had given the then existing directors their share qualifications, and the said directors had executed blank transfers of such shares and lodged the same with the prisoner.

"8. The prisoner, with the assent and concurrence of the directors, dictated the policy of the company and managed its affairs. He also paid the expenses of publishing the incriminated matter.

"9. The indictment counts 8-16 inclusive charged the prisoner with publishing in the Financial News, the Statist, and a report or circular certain false statements.

"10. The prisoner submitted that he was not a 'manager' within the meaning of section 84 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96.

"11. I directed the jury that if the prisoner was the person who in fact managed the affairs of the company he was a manager within the meaning of the section.

"12. The jury found the prisoner guilty.

"13. I sentenced him to twelve months' imprisonment with hard labour, but respited the execution of the sentence until after the decision of this case.

"The prisoner was admitted to bail.

"The question for the opinion of the court is whether my direction to the jury was right.

"If right the conviction is to stand; if wrong the conviction is to be quashed.

Rufus Isaacs, K.C. (Horace Avory, K.C., and Kenneth Chalmers with him), for the defendant.—This case ought to go back to the judge, as paragraphs 7 and 8 do not properly represent the evidence. [Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—At present we are not satisfied there is any ground for sending the case back.] A person cannot be made liable for having acted as a manager when he was never appointed to that position. Gibson v. Benton, 23 W. R. 858, L. R. 10, Q. B. 329, is distinguishable, but the defendant adopts the dissenting judgment of Quain, J., in that case as part of his argument. This section is a criminal one and must be strictly construed.

He also cited Coventry and Dixon's case, 28 W. R. 775, 14 Ch. D. 660; In re Western Counties Steam Bakeries and Milling Co., 45 W. R. 263, [1897] 1 Ch. 617.

Sir E. Carson, S.G., H. Sutton, and R. D. Muir, were not called upon to argue.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C J.—In this case the first application made to us was to send the case back for some correction of paragraph 7 with regard to the qualifications given to certain directors, and of paragraph 8 which regard to the actual position of the defendant. Of course this court has ample power to send a case back if it find upon the argument that the case has not been properly stated, and does not raise the point; and if the allegations which Mr. Isaacs sought to correct could be said to be the allegations upon which this direction of the learned judge depended, we should have had to consider whether or not we ought to ask the judge to restate it. But it seems to me that the allegations contained in paragraphs 7 and 8 are only matters of history which lead up to the point which the learned judge has submitted to the jury. It cannot be disputed that there was evidence in support of the direction which he gave to the jury which would justify the jury in coming to a conclusion of fact on that direction if the direction is right.

Now, the direction was in these terms: "I directed the jury that if the prisoner was the person who in fact managed the affairs of the company he was a manager within the meaning of the section." Now, if we must read that direction, which was given after a trial lasting a great many days, and which was no doubt the summary of a much fuller explanation of the facts to the jury—if we are to construe that direction as merely meaning that the defendant was pulling the strings behind the company and dictating the policy of the company, I should entirely agree that that was not being a manager within the meaning of the section.

It is abundantly clear to my mind on reading the whole case that the learned judge when he used the words "managed the affairs of the company" did did not mean merely directed its policy. It is plain from the earlier part of the case that he was quite alive to the effect of the expression "dictating the policy of the company," and he has in his final direction described the conduct of the defendant as of the person who in fact managed the affairs of the company. I understand that to be a direction to the jury that if the defendant was in fact the manager of the company he came within the section. Now, is that right or wrong? The very able argument for the defendant alleges that the manager meant by the section must be a constituted officer of the company, and must be at any rate under the control of directors so as to be the servant of the company, and that therefore the direction is not sufficient because those conditions have not been explained to the jury. Now, construing the direction as I think it ought to be construed, is that within the section? This section was originally enacted in the year 1857. It was enacted in an Act the title of which is: "An Act to make better provision for the punishment of frauds committed by trustees, bankers, and other persons entrusted with property." Section 8 is for all practical purposes identical with section 84 of the Larceny Act, 1861: "If any director, manager, or public officer of any body corporate or public company shall make, circulate," &c., "with intent to deceive or defraud," "he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour." Now, I think the mere perusal of the language of that section shows that the word "manager" cannot be used in a technical sense. "Director" is possibly a term of art; but ought the word "manager" to have the limited meaning for which Mr. Isaacs contends? He says the manager must be an appointed officer of the company at any rate, whether all the formalities of appointment have been complied with or not, and that the word in the section does not apply to a person who in fact manages the affairs of company. I think it is not immaterial to note that prior to 1861 the only technical use of the word "manager" was in connection with the official manager, who was an officer of the court who could act when companies got into difficulties in connection with winding up the affairs of the company. That cannot have been the manager referred to in this section. Therefore we have not before us anything that would lead us to think that the word "manager" is used in any technical or limited sense, and, looking to the mischief intended to be aimed at by the section, it seems to me that a de facto manager is as much a person whose conduct might be the subject of the section as a person who had been formally appointed manager. Therefore, if the case stood upon the section alone, and there was no authority upon it, I have a strong view that the direction of the learned judge was perfectly right, that a person who has in fact managed the affairs of the company is a manager within the meaning of that section.

But I feel it right to say that the argument to which we have listened has not displaced the weight of authority which has dealt with this matter. Mr. Isaacs has criticized the case of Gibson v. Barton. He has adopted the reasoning of the dissentient judge, Quain, J. He has said that that case is not an authority on the present case, because the particular thing done by the person whose conduct was there implicated was something which must be done by an officer of the company. I confess I think that the language of Blackburn and Lush, JJ., does not seem to support that distinction. The section there in question (section 26 of the Companies Act, 1862) says: "And every director and manager of the company who shall knowingly and wilfully authorize or permit such default" shall incur a penalty. In what sense are the words "director" and "manager" used in that section? Says Blackburn, J.: "When the section says 'director,' it is plain enough a director is a director, but the words are 'and manager.' We have to say who is to be considered a manager. A manager would be, in ordinary talk, a person who has the management of the whole affairs of the company; not an agent who is to do a particular thing, or a servant who is to obey orders, but a person who is entrusted with power to transact the whole of the affairs of the company." The language of Lush, J., can only be reconciled with the same view. He says: "Then is he a manager within section 27? I think he is, and that 'manager' in that section must mean manager de facto. I do not think that it is competent for him to say, 'True, I acted as manager of the company, but yet, not being manager de jure, I can evade the liability imposed as between the public and the company by section 26.'" No doubt the section we have now to consider is not the same section, and if it could be shown from the language of the section itself or from the character of the offence that there are reasons why the word "manager" in the present section should be construed in a more narrow sense that decision would not be an authority. It seems to me, however, that the argument for the defendant has failed to show any ground for applying a different principle to the construction of the present section. Gibson v. Barton came before the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of Edmonds v. Foster. I think it is right to say that the learned judges in that case do not express an opinion either one way or the other as to the correctness of the decision in Gibson v. Barton, but they certainly say nothing which shows that they had any doubt as to the opinion of the majority being correct. Lord Coleridge says: "It is unnecessary to discuss the opinions of the judges in Gibson v. Barton, but, so far as it goes, the decision of the majority is very strongly in point for the respondents." Archibald, J., does not refer to the case. Amphlett, B., says: "Upon the principle laid down by the majority of the judges in Gibson v. Barton, the appellant being a director is liable to be convicted." I mentioned that case, not as adding much weight to the authority of Gibson v. Barton, but as showing that it came in 1875 before three judges, and that they did not throw any doubt upon it. But, in my opinion, Coventry and Dixon's case is much more important. There Sir George Jessel certainly went very far in supporting the principle of Gibson v. Barton. He cites the language of Blackburn and Lush, JJ., in that case, and then he says: "I agree with the judgment of Blackburn, J., and Lush, J. agreed with it, but my lamented friend Quain, J., did not agree with it." That case then went to the Court of Appeal. They overruled Sir George Jessel upon the point as to whether or not the act complained of was a misfeasance under the particular section which was then under consideration; but James, L.J., says: "It was admitted by the appellants that these persons, as de facto directors, would be liable for any act of commission or any omission on their part in the same manner and to the same extent as if they had been de jure as well as de facto directors." Baggallay, L.J., does not make any definite reference to the matter, but Bramwell, L.J., says: "If he has done anything wrong as a de facto director, no doubt he can be got at under the clause."

It is contended, and I think the observation is perfectly well founded, that having regard to the decision in that case, to a certain extent those opinions of the Lords Justices are obiter. I only desire to say that I think certainly Lord Bramwell would not have hesitated to express his opinion if he thought Sir George Jessel had been wrong in the view he took of the decision of the majority in Gibson v. Barton. The decision again came before the Court of Appeal in In re Western Counties Steam Bakeries and Milling Co., where it was considered by Lindley, A. L. Smith, and Rigby, L.JJ. I cannot at all agree with the view suggested, that Rigby, L.J., did not agree with Gibson v. Barton. I think the language of his judgment shows that he did. It is not too much, therefore, to say that some ten judges have had this case before them, and as far as I can see there is nothing to indicate that they thought the language of Blackburn and Lush, L.JJ., wrong. Therefore, since the words of the section in question apply to a person who is called manager, and we find no technical meaning for that word at the time the Act was passed, I decline to accede to the argument that the word as used in the section can only have been intended to apply to persons who might be appointed managers under subsequent legislation or under a subsequent rule. Then finding the offence aimed at and contemplated by the section is an offence the consequences of which might be just as serious if a de facto manager was guilty of the offence as if a de jure manager was—in fact in some senses more so—and that the principle has been applied in Gibson v. Barton, and approved of, or at least not dissented from, by this large number of judges, I have myself no doubt in coming to the conclusion that the direction of A. T. Lawrence, J., was right, and that the conviction must stand.

RIDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion.

DARLING, J.—I only desire to say that my judgment does not all go upon the ground that was pressed upon us in the argument as being the basis of the decision in Gibson v. Barton — that this defendant was a manager de son tort, and, therefore, for that reason properly convicted upon the indictment. To me that argument might in certain instances be a very technical one, and possibly at variance with the real facts in the case. But here the jury found upon plenty of evidence that the defendant was the person who in fact really managed the affairs of the company. That is a great deal more than being a manager de son tort in the narrow sense. The defendant was a person who was doing the things which if there had been a manager the manager would have done. He was, as far as I can see, the only person who did them, and to hold that he was not the manager of the company would be to take an extraordinary technical view in his favour, whereas I think that the real facts should be looked at, and that, the jury having properly found that he was in fact the man who did the things which a manager and only a manager could have done, he was properly indicted as manager, and properly convicted under the statute.

CHANNELL, J.—I also agree that this conviction should be affirmed. I want just to say that I personally agree with a considerable portion of Mr. Isaacs' argument. I think that this is one of a group of sections dealing with offences which can only be committed by persons who occupy certain positions, but I think they can be convicted if they occupy those positions quite apart from whether they happen to have been either duly appointed or appointed at all to those positions. It is necessary under this section both to charge in the indictment that the man was manager, and to prove it to the satisfaction of the jury. Of course it is also necessary that there should be a proper direction to the jury as to what a manager within the meaning of the section is, and the only question that seems to me to be of any doubt in this case is whether this direction was quite correct. On the whole I interpret it in the way in which I think the direction ought to have been given. The learned judge says that the jury must find that the defendant was a person who in fact managed the affairs of the company; the direction does not say "managed the company." If that meant or was understood to mean that a person behind the scenes who controlled the whole of the policy of the company, because the directors and all the officers of company were his puppets—if it only meant that—I should not think it was being a manager within the meaning of the section. But if the direction to the jury meant, as I think it did, if you find that the defendant was the person who did the acts in the management of the company as managing its business —"its affairs" is what is said in the direction—if he did that, then it does not signify that there was no appointment of him as manager. It seems to me that upon a fair interpretation of it that is what the direction must have meant, and I think that therefore it is correct.

PHILLIMORE, J.—I agree, and I have nothing to add.

Conviction affirmed.

Solicitors for defendant, Cox & Lafone.

Solicitor for the Crown, Solicitor to the Treasury.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — Dec. 8, 9, 13, 14, 15.

KINE v. JOLLY. (a.)

Easement — Light — Dwelling-house — Prescription — Actionable nuisance—Mandatory injunction—Damages.

The result of the decision in Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores, ante, p. 30, is that the right to light gained by prescription is a negative easement, and is properly enforced by an action of nuisance. To give rise to such an action the interference with the access of light through the ancient windows must be of such a character as sensibly to interfere with the comfort and convenience or usefulness of the building according to the ordinary notions of mankind.

In the case of a dwelling-house in which such obstruction to light had been caused as to make one room less convenient and less comfortable, so as to materially diminish the letting value of the house, though the room was still well lighted and there was sufficient light to enable it to be used for the purposes for which it was designed,

Held (by Vaughan Williams and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ., Romer, L.J., dissentiente), that an actionable nuisance had been committed. If there is no case of sharp practice or unfair conduct on the part of the defendant, and the case is not one in which damages cannot be regarded as reasonable and adequate compensation, the relief to be given should be by granting damages and not by mandatory injunction.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J.

The action was brought to obtain an injunction to restrain the defendant from erecting, or permitting to remain erected, any wall or building so as to obstruct the access of light to certain windows of the plaintiff's house, or so as to cause any nuisance, injury, or annoyance to the plaintiff in the use and enjoyment of her premises, and damages.

The plaintiff resided with her family in a detached house, of which she was the owner, at Acton. She alleged that the defendant had recently built a house which materially obstructed the access of light to the windows of the drawing-room, morning-room, and hall. The morning-room, which was the most affected, was lighted by two windows, one on the north and one on the west, the latter only being affected by the defendant's building.

It appeared that plaintiff's house had been built on certain property which had been laid out as a building estate, and a plan of the estate was in evidence. The house was built by the owner of the freehold, and the plaintiff bought it from his representatives. It was admitted that the lights were ancient.

The defence denied that the defendant had materially obstructed the light from entering the plaintiff's dwelling-house by the said windows or either of them, or that he had in any way interfered with the plaintiff in the use and enjoyment of her dwelling-house, and alleged that she had abundant light for the house for all ordinary purposes of inhabitancy, and for the comfortable use and enjoyment of the same as a dwelling-house. But, in case he should be under any liability in respect of the matters complained of, he paid £12 10s. into court as sufficient to satisfy the same.

The defendant alleged that he had completed the building complained of prior to the date of the writ to the knowledge of the plaintiff.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The action was tried in December, 1903, by Kekewich, J., who granted a mandatory injunction in respect of all the windows, but pending an appeal the judgment of the House of Lords was delivered in Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores (Limited), ante, p. 30, [1904] A. C. 179, and the Court of Appeal therefore remitted the case to the judge for retrial.

The second trial took place in August, 1904.

Kekewich, J., held that the obstruction in the case of the drawing-room was not such as to create a nuisance, nor in the case of the hall taken alone, but taking that with the morning-room the obstruction did create an actionable nuisance. His lordship found that the room had been an exceptionally well-lighted room, and was still well lighted so as to enable it to be used for the purposes for which it was designed, but that there had been a large obstruction of light by the erection of the defendant's house and a large interference with the cheerfulness of the room, and that the character of the room was altered, and although still well-lighted it had lost in the obstruction of light one of its chief charms and advantages. His lordship also found that the obstruction had caused a substantial depreciation in the letting and selling value of the plaintiff's house, and he granted a mandatory injunction ordering the defendant to pull down so much of his house as caused a nuisance to the plaintiff by the obstruction of light to the windows of the morning-room and to the hall as the same existed previously to the erection of the defendant's house.

The plaintiff appealed.

Hughes, K.C., and Vernon, for the appellant.—Even on the findings of Kekewich, J., there is no cause of action. The plaintiff's only right is to have sufficient light for the comfortable use and enjoyment of the house as a dwelling-house. On the findings of fact that right is not interfered with.

They cited Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores, ante p. 30, [1904] A. C. 179; Clarke v. Clarke, 14 W. R. 115, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 16; and Kelk v. Pearson, 19 W. R. 665, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 809.

P. O. Lawrance, K.C., and Cann, for the respondent.—In Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores the House of Lords in effect adopted the test applied in Back v. Stacey, 2 Car. & P. 465; Parker v. Smith, 5 Car. & P. 438; and Wells v. Ody, 7 Car. & P. 410—namely, that there must be such a diminution of light as to make the plaintiff's premises less fit for business or occupation. All that the court has to do in the case of a dwelling-house is to see whether there has been such a privation of light as sensibly to affect its other amenities: Clarke v. Clarke, Kelk v. Pearson. This rule has not been affected by Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores.

They also referred to Pringle v. Wernham, 7 Car. & P. 377; Warren v. Brown, 50 W. R. 97, [1902] 1 K. B. 15; and Shelfer v. City of London Electric Lighting Co., 43 W. R. 238, [1895] 1 Ch. 287.

Hughes, K.C., replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The question of what tests are to be applied in an action brought for obstruction of ancient lights in order to ascertain whether the plaintiff has a good cause of action has recently been very much discussed in Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores, and I think that the House of Lords there intended to lay down rules which should be applied in future cases of this nature. I do not think that I am saying anything disrespectful of judges in days gone by, whether common law judges or Chancery judges, in saying that the cases which have been decided are not quite consistent as to the tests that should be applied; and, under these circumstances, it was obviously very desirable that the differences, such as they were, in the principles laid down by these cases should be settled once for all. This being the first occasion on which the Court of Appeal has had to apply the principle which has now been laid down by the House of Lords, I hope that we may be able to apply that principle—I say deliberately "that principle," because I think that in substance there was only one principle laid down in the various speeches of the law lords in Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores—so as to show that the law has now been reduced to sufficient clearness to make it capable of practical application. The main distinction which runs through the two lines of cases which one finds in days gone by is this: The right of a house owner to light gained by prescription, whether before or after the Prescription Act, 1832, was regarded by one school as being a mere right of property, and by the other school not as a right of property in light, or, as is sometimes inaccurately stated, in light and air, but as a negative easement—a right to prevent some landowner from using his land so as to constitute a nuisance to the owner or occupier of a house upon adjoining land. As the result of the decision of the House of Lords in Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores, we must now apply the view of that school who held that the only right that was gained by the prescription was a negative easement—a right to prevent your neighbour from so using his land as to injure you, who happen to be the adjoining owner or to occupy the adjoining land. This view is shortly expressed by saying that the rights which are to be enforced in respect of this prescriptive easement are rights which would properly be enforced by an action of nuisance. An action of nuisance is different from an action of trespass. An action of trespass is the action which was brought where the body or the land of a person had been invaded. An action of nuisance is the action which was brought where there was no invasion of the property of somebody else, but where the wrong of the defendant consisted in so using his own land as to injure his neighbours. This action of nuisance was not in any way limited to cases where the plaintiff had acquired a legal right, and still less was it limited to cases in which the plaintiff had acquired a legal right, in the nature of prescription. The action, in the most popular as well as the precise legal sense of the word, would lie if a man so used his own land as to cause the air which passed over his neighbour's land, in which he had and could have no special right of property whatsoever, to be noxious and harmful. There was some doubt about that down to the case of Angus v. Dalton, 30 W. R. 191, 6 App. Cas. 740. That was an action brought against a defendant who, by digging on the edge of his own land, had let down the surface of his neighbour's land. There there was no right dependent on prescription, because the right of lateral or subjacent support for land uncovered with buildings is a common law right, and one which exists independently of any property in anything vested in the plaintiff. The action in that case was not and could not be an action of trespass; it was in the nature of an action of nuisance. But, supposing the land to be burdened by buildings, buildings of such weight that the subsidence of the land would not have occurred but for the buildings, in that case the plaintiff would have a prescriptive right, and it would be his prescriptive right, and his prescriptive right only, which enabled him to bring the action. Nevertheless, his action was an action of nuisance. I mention this case of the subsidence of land in particular, because it seems to me to illustrate the proposition that the action is equally an action of nuisance whether the plaintiff is relying upon his common law rights or whether he is relying upon a prescriptive right. In all these cases of nuisance one has to consider what it is that must be proved by the plaintiff in order to support his action. It seems to me that the House of Lords went upon the principle that, whether the plaintiff is relying upon his common law rights or whether he is relying upon his prescriptive rights, or his rights of property of any sort or kind, the conditions precedent to constitute a cause of action are really identical. The courts have always been unwilling in these cases of nuisance to hold that every nuisance, apart from the rule which prevents the law concerning itself de minimis, should be a cause of action. On the contrary, in all these cases of nuisance which involve a limitation of a man's right to use his own land, the courts will not enforce the alleged rights of the plaintiff, unless that which has occurred is a substantial interference with his comfortable or profitable occupation of his dwelling-house, or warehouse, or house of business, as the case may be. Whether or not this rule, which has, according to my view, been applied in Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores, is logically justifiable, I do not take upon myself to say, and I do not think that it is very important, because it seems to me that there can be no doubt that such a rule, whether logical or not, is a rule which owes its existence to the convenience and comfort of the people at large. It is convenient that people should not be allowed to enforce rights to such an extent as to interfere with the good and the progress of the community. That is what I understand the meaning of the judgment in the House of Lords to be; and I cannot bring myself to the conclusion that that rule is wrong, because for reasons of convenience or any other reason the judges have thought fit to refer the origin of easements to grant, in such a way that easements may be rightly spoken of as conventional rights. They are conventional rights, and it may be that in strict logic conventional rights ought to be enforced according to their verbal definition; but I take it that that is not the law. I think we must bear in mind that in these cases which are conveniently grouped together as cases in which the proper form of action is an action of nuisance, citizens are not to be allowed to enforce rights which limit the user by others of property, unless the facts relied upon as constituting a nuisance are such as interfere with the ordinary rights that according to the ordinary notion of people they have a right to exercise in relation to one another, and in relation to their property. Having said that, I will try to apply what was said by the law lords in Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores to the facts as found by Kekewich, J., in this case. Lord Halsbury there says: "The test of the right is, I think, whether the obstruction complained of is a nuisance, and, as it appears to me, the value of the test makes the amount of right acquired depend upon the surroundings and circumstances of light coming from other sources, as well as the question of the proximity of the premises complained of. What may be called the uncertainty of the test may also be described as its elasticity. A dweller in towns cannot expect to have as pure air, as free from smoke, smell, and noise, as if he lived in the country, and distant from other dwellings, and yet an excess of smoke, smell, and noise may give a cause of action, but in each of such cases it becomes a question of degree, and the question is in each case whether it amounts to a nuisance which will give a right of action." Lord Macnaghten in his speech refers to the summing up of the judges at nisi prius in Back v. Stacey, Parker v. Smith, and Wells v. Ody, and he adopts them as supplying a definite test. The definition by Tindal, L.C.J., in Parker v. Smith, which he cites, is as follows: "That diminution of light and air which the law recognizes as the ground of an action against a party who builds near another's premises is such as really makes them to a sensible degree less fit for the purposes of business or occupation." Then Lord Macnaghten having quoted Wells v. Ody, tried before Parke, B., says: "In his charge to the jury the learned judge said that he entirely adopted the law as laid down by Tindal, C.J., in Parker v. Smith. And then, after reading a passage from Parker v. Smith, he concluded his address to the jury by saying: 'The question, therefore, which I shall leave to you is whether the effect of the defendant's building is to diminish the light and air so as sensibly to affect the occupation of the plaintiff's premises, and make them less fit for occupation.'" Although Lord Macnaghten deals, and deals very clearly, with the various difficulties that may arise in various cases, he never at any point in his speech departs from the definition of the circumstances under which such an action will lie, as they appear in Back v. Stacey, Parker v. Smith, and Wells v. Ody. Later on he cites the judgments in Kelk v. Pearson and City of London Brewery Co. v. Tennant, 22 W. R. 172, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 212, but they seem to me only to follow out the definitions in the three nisi prius cases which I have cited. The passage in the judgment of James, L.J., in Kelk v. Pearson, to which Lord Macnaghten refers, is as follows: "Now, I am of opinion that the statute has in no degree whatever altered the pre-existing law as to the nature and extent of this right. The nature and extent of the right before that statute was to have that amount of light through the windows of a house which was sufficient, according to the ordinary notions of mankind, for the comfortable use and enjoyment of that house as a dwelling-house, if it were a dwelling-house, or for the beneficial use and occupation of the house, if it were a warehouse, a shop, or other place of business. That was the extent of the easement"—James, L.J., it is to be observed, states it properly as a negative easement—"a right to prevent your neighbour from building upon his land so as to obstruct the access of sufficient light and air, to such an extent as to render the house substantially less comfortable and enjoyable." Lord Davey's judgment, in respect to the definition of what is essential to constitute this cause of action, does not, I think, in any way differ from the judgment of Lord Macnaghten. He relies upon the same cases, and he sums it up thus: "According to both principle and authority, I am of opinion that the owner or occupier of the dominant tenement is entitled to the uninterrupted access through his ancient windows of a quantity of light, the measure of which is what is required for the ordinary purposes of inhabitancy or business of the tenement according to the ordinary notions of mankind." That is general to all cases, and contains the definition generally of what is essential to constitute this right to light. Lord Lindley, in his judgment, says: "Kelk v. Pearson shows that in ordinary cases a person does not necessarily acquire a right to enjoy in future all the light he has had for twenty years. He may have had more than was reasonably required either for domestic or business purposes; and in that case his right to protection is limited to the amount of light reasonably required." That is to the same effect as a passage in the judgment of Lord Halsbury: "The question may be very simply stated thus: After an enjoyment of light for twenty years, or, if the question arose before the Act for such a period as would justify the presumption of a lost grant, would the owner of the tenement in respect of which such enjoyment had been possessed be entitled to all the light without any diminution whatsoever at the end of such period? He answers that by saying that he would not be entitled to all the light. Lord Lindley quotes Kelk v. Pearson and City of London

Brewery Co. v. Tennant with approval. The doctrine as stated in City of London Brewery Co. v. Tennant is the same as that stated in Kelk v. Pearson. "That doctrine," Lord Lindley says, "as stated in City of London Brewery Co. v. Tennant, is that generally speaking an owner of ancient lights is entitled to sufficient light according to the ordinary notions of mankind for the comfortable use and enjoyment of his house as a dwelling-house, if it is a dwelling-house, or for the beneficial use and occupation of the house, if it is a warehouse, a shop, or other place of business. The expressions 'the ordinary notions of mankind,' 'comfortable use and enjoyment,' and 'beneficial use and occupation' introduce elements of uncertainty; but similar uncertainty has always existed and exists still in all cases of nuisance, and in this country an obstruction of light has commonly been regarded as a nuisance, although the right to light has been regarded as a peculiar kind of easement." I think I have read sufficient to show that, in principle, the result of all these cases is that the interference with the access of light through the ancient windows of the house must be of such a character as sensibly to interfere with the comfort and convenience or usefulness of the building, according to its character as a residence, or a place of business, or warehouse, or whatever else it may be, according to the ordinary notions of mankind. Unless it amounts to that, there is no cause of action; the mere proof that a given percentage of light has been taken away is not sufficient; and in order to support the action of nuisance it must be shown not only that there has been this or that considerable percentage of light abstracted, but also that the abstraction of this quantity of light has interfered with the comfortable or convenient occupation of the premises according to the notions of the citizens of this country. Applying that test, I am going to ask myself that question in this particular case, and I am going to take into consideration the light coming from other sources than through the particular window, the obstruction of the access to which is complained of in this action. I need not discuss that at length, because the defendant can hardly complain if I, in his favour, have taken into consideration light coming from other sources, even if I ought not to have done so in this particular case; but I do not feel any doubt about the matter, and it seems to me that in Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores the law lords came to the conclusion not only that we might, but that we must, take into consideration the light coming from other sources. I will now read the facts which are found by Kekewich, J., in his judgment. [His lordship referred to the judgment, and continued:] I do not think that Kekewich, J., meant to find anything definite as to how far reading was interfered with by the obstruction, or how far sewing was interfered with by the obstruction, and I do not propose to do so myself. But he does point out that these people actually ceased to use the room; he treats them as honest witnesses, and he thinks that they ceased to use the room because they personally honestly found the room much less convenient to use, and not for any strategic reasons in view of an action, or in that sort of temper which might make a man find every possible wrong or bad result present in a case in which he was making a complaint. [His lordship then referred to the remarks of Kekewich, J., as to the alteration in the character of the room, and continued:] I think that the learned judge was perfectly right in supposing that he must not leave out of consideration the fact that the plaintiff had purchased with the knowledge that the house that she purchased was one of a projected row of houses that sooner or later was sure to be erected on the adjoining plot. I think that, whether one treats this as a mattter of prescription under the Act or on the theory of lost grant, the grant always in theory had to be qualified in accordance with the surrounding circumstances; but we have had no real evidence as to what the knowledge was that was to be imputed to the plaintiff. No contract or plan binding on the owner of the land has ever been produced to us. All we know is that there was certainly an idea of cutting up this estate into plots, and this house was built, and for some twenty or thirty years there was no other house built; but, assuming the knowledge that Kekewich, J., imputes to the plaintiff, the building of a house in this row, having regard to these plots, could have been perfectly well carried out without obstructing the light coming to the plaintiff's windows. On these facts I have to ask myself, applying the test laid down in Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores, whether there has been an obstruction which has rendered the house substantially less comfortable and convenient. I do not say that I should have come to the conclusion of fact that Kekewich, J., has, but I think there is evidence on which he could have come to that conclusion; and I have to bear in mind that he saw the witnesses and was able to judge of their demeanour, and I do not think that I ought to go behind the conclusions of fact of the learned judge. There are statements in his conclusions which cause some little trouble to my mind. He says that this room is, notwithstanding the obstruction, still a well-lighted room. One cannot help asking oneself whether a house can be substantially less comfortable and convenient when the learned judge says that the room is still a well-lighted room, but I am not prepared to say that a room may not be still a well-lighted room after the obstruction, and yet be a room which is substantially less comfortable and less convenient according to the ordinary notions of mankind in this country. I think that may be so. I do not know what the exact standard is that one applies when one uses the word "well-lighted." "Well-lighted" is obviously a comparative expression; it may mean well lighted taking the average of rooms, or it may mean well lighted taking the average of the opinions of people of the present day as to the quantity of light that is required. I do not know in which sense it is used here; but if it means merely that the room is well lighted taking the average of rooms of houses in the suburbs or the average of rooms in the metropolis, or in large towns, it seems to me that, notwithstanding that the room is well lighted in that sense, it still might be that the obstruction has rendered the house substantially less comfortable and convenient according to the ordinary motions of mankind. Under those circumstances there is nothing in this finding in fact by the judge which prevents my adopting it. Again, he says, "if the test were whether there is sufficient light left to enable the room to be used for the purposes for which it was designed, there would be no further question." As I understand, he means to find that there is sufficient light left to enable this room to be used for the purpose for which it was designed. There, again, it seems to me that, notwithstanding that sufficient light is left, it may be that the obstruction has changed a room which had ample light for all the purposes likely to be carried out in it into a room in which there is a bare sufficiency of light for its occupation for the purpose designed. In that case, again, I think it may be true to find, as the learned judge has found, that, according to the ordinary notions of mankind, the house has been substantially made less comfortable and less convenient. In dealing with this question of fact I do not think that we can leave out of consideration the evidence of the experts as to value. These experts are men who very often can tell with great accuracy and certainty what effect the taking away of a particular convenience in a house may have upon its letting or selling value. It is not suggested here that these witnesses were prejudiced, or that there was any ground for distrusting them. They say that the house has diminished in value to the extent of (I think) £20 or £25 a year; and even if it were taken at a less sum, I cannot doubt but that the house must have been made substantially less comfortable and convenient, according to the ordinary notions of mankind, by reason of the obstruction. In one sense I entirely agree with what was said by Kekewich, J., about the leaving of sufficient light not being a test. It seems to me that it is absolutely impossible to apply the test which has been defined by the House of Lords without taking into consideration, amongst other things, the amount of light which is left in a particular room at the time when the obstruction takes place. Under these circumstances, I do not see my way to differ from the judgment of Kekewich, J., that there is a cause of action here. Then one has to consider whether there ought to be damages or a mandatory injunction. With regard to that, I propose to apply the test laid down by Lord Macnaghten in Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores, or that laid down by Smith, L.J., in his judgment in Shelfer v. City of London Electric Lighting Co. It seems to me here impossible to say that there ought to be any injunction by reason of any act by the defendant which could be properly termed high-handed, or upon which anyone could impute to him the desire to steal a march upon the plaintiff, or to evade the jurisdiction of the court. I think—and I wish emphatically to state this—that both parties honestly acted in accordance with what they believed, and not unreasonably might believe, to be their legal rights. Some suggestion was made that the plaintiff might have lost her right to an injunction by reason of delay; but I think the delay has been accounted for. The only other matter which, according to Lord Macnaghten's judgment, remains to be considered, is whether the injury cannot be fairly compensated by money damages. I think it can be, and under those circumstances I think there ought to be no mandatory injunction. I will not refer in detail to the rules laid down for general application in the judgment of Smith, L.J., in Shelfer v. City of London Electric Lighting Co., but the observations I have made will make it plain that, according to my view, there is nothing in any one of those rules which makes it right that a mandatory injunction should be granted here. There remains the question of damages. With regard to that, I do not think that Kekewich, J., has definitely found any sum for damages, and I think the amount of damages ought to be the subject of an inquiry in chambers, unless, of course, the parties can agree them. Notwithstanding the evidence of the experts—evidence to which attention ought to be given by reason of their knowledge, and also by reason of, I think I may say, their impartiality in this matter—I have great difficulty in agreeing with them in putting the damage quite as high as £25 a year, or at the capital sum which is placed on this house by them. I think it is only right, therefore, that there should be an inquiry if the parties cannot agree upon the amount.

ROMER, L.J.—This case is a simple one in one respect. It is a case where the house which is alleged to be injured is occupied by ordinary persons for the common purposes of domestic life. It is not the case of a business being carried on, nor a case of extraordinary user of any kind. The case is further narrowed by this—that practically the only part of the plaintiff's premises that we need consider is that which is called the morning-room. As I understand it, it is in respect of that room alone that the learned judge has thought the plaintiff entitled to relief. That being so, I have to consider what is the law applicable to this case. That law has recently been expounded by the House of Lords in the case of Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores. I have carefully considered, as was my duty, the addresses of the noble lords who decided that case, and I think I am enabled to gather from those addresses on what principle I am to deal with the case now before us, and I think I may state that principle shortly. The case has to be approached undoubtedly now from the point of view that the plaintiff has to establish what might fairly be called a nuisance. That of course in itself is no sufficient guide; but I am enabled to gather from Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores how a jury should be directed, or how a judge should direct himself in trying to determine in each case what would constitute a nuisance. I think all the noble lords were agreed that, at any rate for the purposes of such a case as this, the law is laid down, though not quite in the same language, yet for all substantial purposes in the same way, and accurately, in the four cases of Back v. Stacey, Parker v. Smith, Kelk v. Pearson, and City of London Brewery Co. v. Tennant. I take the law to be now, as stated in City of London Brewery Co. v. Tennant, as follows, strictly limiting the statement to such a case as we have now before us: An owner of ancient lights is entitled to sufficient light, according to the ordinary notions of mankind, for the comfortable use and enjoyment of his house as a dwelling-house, if it is a dwelling-house. That I take to be in the present case a sufficient and proper direction of law, coupled only with this further statement, which I think is essential. I think that, in considering what, according to the ordinary notions of mankind, is sufficient light for the comfortable use and enjoyment of the house, one ought to bear in mind the locality, and, further, I think that in considering what is sufficient light one must bear in mind the statement made by Lord Lindley in Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores, and approved of, as I gather, by the other lords. "As regards light from other quarters, such light cannot be disregarded; for, as pointed out by James, V.C., in Dyers Company v. King, 18 W. R. 404, L. R. 9 Eq. 438, the light from other quarters and the light the obstruction of which is complained of may be so much in excess of what is protected by law as to render the interference complained of non-actionable"; and he goes on: "I apprehend, however, that light to which a right has not been acquired by grant or prescription, and of which the plaintiff may be deprived at any time, ought not to be taken into account." It appears to me that those are sufficient directions to me as to the law on the subject, and all I have to do is to see how the facts of the present case are to be dealt with in accordance with that law. I think it is impossible to say that the present case, on the facts, is free from difficulty. It appears to me to be one which may fairly be said to be on the border line. That it is difficult, I think, may fairly be said, owing to the fact that I, unfortunately for myself, have come to a different conclusion of fact in this case from that taken by my brothers. After considering the evidence in this case, and doing my best to arrive at a conclusion as to whether, according to the law, the defendant's building has caused a nuisance to the plaintiff, trying to come to the conclusion which an intelligent jury ought to come to in such as a case, I can only say that the conclusion I have come to is that the plaintiff has failed to prove that the defendant has committed a nuisance in respect of these lights. I will shortly state my reasons for coming to that conclusion, and I will first deal with the question irrespective of the judgment of Kekewich, J. I have no doubt whatever that the defendant's building, by its erection, caused less light than before to come to the west window of the morning-room in question, and that not to an immaterial extent; and I bear in mind in the conclusion I have come to what the locality is here, and how matters stood before the erection of the defendant's house. I will first deal with the evidence that arises from an inspection, as it were, of the premises themselves. We have not the advantage, of course, of being able to go and see the premises themselves, but we have very good models before us, and it is not suggested that those models do not accurately give a proper representation of the two houses, and enable the court to judge how the defendant's house interferes with the light of the plaintiff's premises; bearing in mind, as one ought to do, that the defendant's house is to the west of the plaintiff's. To my mind the evidence that a jury could get from an inspection, or that a judge could get if he saw the premises himself, or from seeing a fair and proper representation of the premises, is very important. And I say this, not only because it is my own opinion, but because in Back v. Stacey Best, C.J., told the jury, who had viewed the premises, that they were to judge rather from their own ocular observation than from the testimony of any witnesses, however respectable, of the degree of diminution which the plaintiff's ancient lights had undergone; and Best, C.J.'s, address to the jury has been approved by the House of Lords. When I look at these two premises, and consider the defendant's house with relation to the plaintiff's, and particularly with relation to the morning-room, I notice that the morning-room is a comparatively small room extremely well lighted by two windows—the north window and the west. The north window is wholly uninterfered with by the defendant's premises, and it is an ancient light; and therefore, bearing in mind what was said by Lord Lindley, I am entitled to consider for present purposes that that light remains. Then, with regard to the west light, I notice that to the north, even the west window of the plaintiff's morning-room has light coming from nearly the whole, if not the whole, of a quarter of a circle—that is to say, due north to nearly due west, wholly uninterfered with. Of course that would not be direct sunlight, but it is light coming from the north, and even the defendant's house does not interfere with the light from the west and south; there is a margin wholly uninterfered with from the south, and to a certain extent from the south-west. Therefore there is only a partial interference with the west window itself, between west and south-west. Moreover, the height of the defendant's house is not excessive, in my opinion. It is not a case where it takes away forty-five degrees of light. So far as even the highest point may be said to affect the west window of the morning room, it does not interfere to that extent. If, then, I had to answer the question before me by reason of a knowledge of these premises, when I saw how the north light was wholly uninterfered with, and the west light was only partially interfered with, I should myself have been disposed to come to the conclusion on the evidence that the room would still remain well lighted and would have sufficient light, according to the ordinary notions of mankind, for its comfortable use and enjoyment as a dwelling-house. At any rate, I could not come to the opposite conclusion, or say that I was satisfied from looking at these models that any nuisance had been committed. Then how does the evidence stand, apart from the most important evidence that arises with regard to the premises themselves? I must say that, so far as the experts are concerned, speaking for myself, they give evidence, no doubt, in accordance with their opinions, but they are of course influenced, naturally, by the side on which they are called. It is not possible that this should not be so, otherwise how could one explain what we have here, and what we have in every case—experts on one side giving one view, and experts on the other side giving another? I do not think that the expert evidence removes the impression on my mind caused by a knowledge of the two houses together. Now I come to the other evidence—the evidence of certain residents in this house. They gave certain evidence with regard to reading, which, if it could have been accepted, would have been most material. Personally, I must say that I should have had very great difficulty in accepting it, but I am fortunately excused, if I may say so, from arriving at that conclusion, because Kekewich, J., having heard the witnesses, has said, "The evidence about reading must be dismissed altogether." The rest of the evidence of the occupiers of the house is open, to my mind, to this observation: They are not considering, of course, a question of nuisance; they are comparing the morning-room as it now is with that room without any obstruction whatever to the west; and they would naturally think, if they got any interference with their light, that it interfered with their comfort. They would naturally not appreciate the point that there may be an interference with light which is not a nuisance at law; and, speaking for myself, having regard to their evidence, coupled with the evidence of the expert witnesses and with the evidence derived from looking at the models, I am not satisfied on the evidence as a whole that there has been what amounts to a nuisance in this case. If I had thought that the learned judge had come to an opposite conclusion of fact, I should have hesitated to give effect to my view; but, doing the best I can do with the judgment of the learned judge, I do not come to the conclusion that his findings of fact do show that a nuisance has been committed. In fact, I think, on a fair interpretation of his judgment, he has made certain findings which negative the idea of nuisance. The very first finding he has with regard to this morning-room is this: "It was an exceptionally well-lighted room, and even now is well lighted." It is not well lighted generally, or irrespective of what he means by well lighted, because he goes on. "So that if the test were whether there is sufficient light left to enable the room to be used for the purposes for which it was designed there would be no further question"; in other words, he holds as a fact that this is a well-lighted room still, and well lighted for the purposes for which the room was built; and the purpose for which that room was built we know was that of occupation as a morning-room for ordinary family domestic purposes. Therefore this is, to my mind, a clear finding that, notwithstanding anything the defendant has done, the plaintiff still has, following the words used in City of London Brewery Co. v. Tennant, sufficient light, according to the ordinary notions of mankind, for the comfortable use and enjoyment of his house as a dwelling-house, and of this morning-room in particular. That is, I think, the conclusion at which he has arrived on that finding, and I think there is nothing in the rest of his judgment to negative that. He certainly finds that there has been a large obstruction of light. As regards that, I am as well able to judge as the learned judge himself to what extent there has been an obstruction. I do not think it can be said that there is a large obstruction. That there has been an obstruction I agree, and the amount of it

I am aware of; but, even taking it that there has been a large obstruction of light to the west window, that does not decide the question. Then he says that the cheerfulness of the morning-room is essential. I do not know what he means by that; but what I think he means is that, like every morning-room, the lighter it is the more cheerful it is. Then he says that there has been a large interference with the cheerfulness of the room—not with its comfortable use and enjoyment as part of the dwelling-house, but with its cheerfulness. He makes it clear later on what he means, because he says, "I am convinced that the character of the room is altered"—that means in respect of the cheerfulness—"and that though still a well-lighted room it has lost in the obstruction of light one of its chief charms and advantages." In other words, when the plaintiff had used the morning-room with a look-out to the west wholly unobstructed it had a charm and advantage in its special cheerfulness, and by reason of the deprivation of that the character of the room to that extent has suffered; but the judge does not find that which amounts to a nuisance. On the contrary, as I have pointed out, he finds as a fact that which in my own opinion shows that there was no nuisance. That being so, it appears to me that the judgment of the learned judge, far from enabling me to depart from the opinion that I should otherwise have formed on this case, confirms it; and I come to the conclusion on the whole of this case that the plaintiff's case fails, and that the action ought to have been dismissed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—This is a very important and extremely difficult case, and, as there is a difference of opinion, it is necessary that I should shortly state why I agree with the judgment given by my lord. It is needless to say that I approach this case with an anxious desire to follow loyally the decision of the House of Lords in Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores, so far as I can gather the principles which ought to govern it. I am not sure that I entirely agree with my lord when he says that there was in substance only one principle laid down by the law lords in that case. I think I can trace several points of difference, though they are not, perhaps, material for the purposes of the present case. It may be that in the very lengthy and interesting and elaborate discussion which we have had over that case we have somewhat forgotten that all the law lords based their judgments upon the findings of fact by Joyce, J. There was there a clear finding that the proposed building would not affect the selling or letting value of the respondent's premises; and there was also a finding that the diminution of light would not materially affect the respondents' comfort or convenience. The decision in Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores, therefore, does not seem to me to amount to more than this—that an obstruction which neither lessens the letting or selling value of the house nor materially affects the comfort or convenience of the occupier does not in law justify an action, even though a large proportion of light previously enjoyed has been lost. In the present case I think it is clear that the learned judge has held that the letting or selling value of the house has been affected by the defendant's building, and he has also certainly found that the comfort or convenience of the occupier has been affected by it. That being so, there is nothing, I think, in the decision in Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores which in any way prevents me from arriving at the conclusion which I propose to adopt. It has been strenuously argued on behalf the appellant that all we have to consider is the amount of light which has been left. I cannot accept that view of the law. It seems to me that the law as approved by the House of Lords, particularly by Lord Macnaghten, cannot be better stated than it was by Parke, B., in Wells v. Ody: "The question, therefore, which I shall leave to you is, whether the effect of the defendant's building is to diminish the light and air so as sensibly to affect the occupation of the plaintiff's premises, and make them less fit for occupation." Is it any answer to say that the room is still a well-lighted room? I think not, if the building makes the room less fit for occupation; and I do not think that we can bring in the phrase "according to the ordinary notions of mankind" to cut down the effect which would otherwise result from a building of this nature. I for my part accept the findings of fact of Kekewich, J. He has found, as I read his judgment, that the letting and selling value has diminished, and that the plaintiff's morning-room is materially affected so far as the comfort and convenience of the occupiers are concerned. That being so, I agree with my lord that there is a good cause of action. I pass from the judgment with this sole remark, that it seems to me that the learned judge applied the law quite correctly, or, to use a common phrase, he directed himself properly as to the law. When I come to the relief which he gave I am bound to say that I think this is not a case for a mandatory injunction. There is no case of sharp practice or unfair conduct on the part of the defendant. It is not a case of irrecoverable damage, or of the house being rendered uninhabitable, nor is it a case in which damages cannot be regarded as reasonable and adequate compensation. I think it is impossible to doubt that the tendency of the judgments of the House of Lords in Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores is to go a little further than was done in Shelfer v. City of London Electric Lighting Co. and to indicate that as a general rule the court ought to be less free in granting mandatory injunctions than it was in years gone by. Then, assuming that there is no mandatory injunction, are we in a position to assess the amount of damages? I think not. Although Kekewich, J., held that the plaintiff had suffered damages, he did not specify them. That being so, it seems to me that we are driven even at this late stage to say that there must be a reference to the master in chambers in the usual way, or to the official referee to ascertain the amount of damages.

Solicitors, Graham Gordon; Redfern & Hunt.

From Railway Commission. (Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — March 29.

PICKFORD'S (LIMITED) v. LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Railway—Traffic—Rates—Dissection of rate—Particulars of services—Particulars of charges—Regulation of Railways Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 48), s. 14.

Under section 14 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, the Railway Commissioners have jurisdiction, on the application of an interested person, to order a railway company to state not only the items of the services in respect of which a rate is charged, but also the particular sums charged for each particular service.

Colman v. Great Eastern Railway Co., 4 Ry. & Ca. Tr. Cas. 108, and Birchgrove Steel Co. v. Midland Railway Co., 5 Ry. & Ca. Tr. Cas. 229, approved.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from a decision of the Railway and Canal Commission Court (Bigham, J., Sir Frederick Peel, and Viscount Cobham).

On the application of Pickford's (Limited), who carried on business as general carriers, the Railway and Canal Commission Court made an order on the London and North-Western Railway Co. for the dissection of certain rates charged by the company for goods traffic, under section 14 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873.

The railway company having supplied the applicants with certain particulars in pursuance of the order, the applicants applied to the commissioners for the infliction of a penalty for disobedience to the order, alleging that the particulars supplied by the company did not constitute a sufficient compliance. The following is an instance of the information given by the particulars. The rate for soap from Bradford to Dewsbury was 7s. 10d. Of this the company in their particulars attributed 2s. 10d. as applicable to conveyance (this being the maximum chargeable under their special Act), and 5s. as applicable to "other expenses." The "nature and detail" of the other expenses were stated to be "provision of station at each end, covering and uncovering, loading and unloading, collection and delivery." The applicants contended that in default of a specific sum being allotted to each one of these items the order made had not been complied with.

Section 14 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, provides as follows: "The commissioners may from time to time, on the application of any person interested, make orders with respect to any particular description of traffic, requiring a railway company or canal company to distinguish in such book how much of each rate is for the conveyance of the traffic on the railway or canal, including therein tolls for the use of the railway or canal, for the use of carriages or vessels, or for locomotive power, and how much is for other expenses, specifying the nature and detail of such other expenses."

The judgment of the commissioners was delivered by Bigham, J., and was to the effect that the order had not been sufficiently complied with. The learned judge expressed his own personal opinion that the railway company had done everything which the Act and the order contemplated. But he felt himself bound to follow a decision of the commissioners given in the year 1882 in the case of Colman v. Great Eastern Railway Co., 4 Ry. & Ca. Tr. Cas. 108, before the court was presided over by a judge, in accordance with the principles laid down by Collins, J., in Didcot, Newbury, and Southampton Railway Co. v. Great Western Railway Co., 9 Ry. & Ca. Tr. Cas. 210, at p. 229, that the decisions given by the Commission Court since its commencement are binding on the Commission Court.

The railway company appealed.

Cripps, K.C. and W. J. Noble (Moon, K.C., with them), for the railway company.

Foote, K.C., and Rowland Whitehead (Balfour Browne, K.C., with them), for the applicants.

The following cases were cited: London and North Western Railway Co. v. Lee, 7 Times L. R. 603; Pidcock & Co. v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co., 9 Ry. & Ca. Tr. Cas. 45; New Union Mills Co. v. Great Western Railway Co., [1896] 2 Q. B. 290, 44 W. R. Dig. 140; Colman v. Great Eastern Railway Co., 4 Ry. & Ca. Tr. Cas. 108; Birchgrove Steel Co. v. Midland Railway Co., 5 Ry. & Ca. Tr. Cas. 229; Tomlinson v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 7 Ry. & Ca. Tr. Cas. 22; Coxon v. North-Eastern Railway Co., 4 Ry. & Ca. Tr. Cas. 284; and Liverpool Corn Traders' Association v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 7 Ry. Ca. Tr. Cas. 125.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of the Railway Commission. An application was made by a trader against a railway company under section 14 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, asking for an order on the railway company to disintegrate certain rates, and to state not only the nature of the particular rates of which the rates appearing in the rate-book consisted, but also the particular sums charged in respect of the particular rates. Section 14 provides as follows: "Every railway company and canal company shall keep at each of their stations and wharves a book or books showing every rate for the time being charged for the traffic, other than passengers and their luggage, from that station or wharf to any place to which they book, including any rates charged under any special contract, and stating the distance from that station or wharf of every station, wharf, siding, or place to which any such rate is charged." That is a provision for a station to station rate. Up to that point in the section that is the extent of the obligation on the company with regard to the condition of their rate-book. No larger obligation is imposed on the company till later in the section. All that is provided for so far is a station to station rate. The section then proceeds: "Every such book shall during all reasonable hours be open to the inspection of any person, without the payment of any fee." Then follows the part of the section with which we have especially to deal in this case: "The commissioners may from time to time, on the application of any person interested, make orders with respect to any particular description of traffic requiring a railway company or canal company to distinguish in such book how much of each rate"—that is to say, each rate appearing in the rate-book under the earlier part of the section—"is for the conveyance of the traffic on the railway or canal, including therein tolls for the use of the railway or canal, for the use of carriages or vessels, or for locomotive power, and how much is for other expenses, specifying the nature and detail of such other expenses."

In this case the applicants are rival traders—viz., Pickford's (Limited)—and they are interested in the charges made for cartage. Unlike other customers who deal with the railway, they do their own cartage, and, when the time came for them to pay the charges due from them to the railway company, they desired to know how much was charged for cartage. They claimed to be interested persons within the meaning of the section, and they asked for an order under the section, the ground of their application being that otherwise they would be liable to the risk of being prejudiced by undue preferences. The commissioners made an order; and, on the matter coming before them again, the point was taken on behalf of the railway company that, on the true construction of the section, they were not under any obligation to disintegrate their rates any further than they had already done in particulars given by them in answer to the application, with which particulars, however, the applicants were not satisfied. To take an example of the particulars, the company stated, with regard to the rate for soap from Bradford to Dewsbury, that the inclusive rate was 7s. 10d., and they attributed 2s. 10d. to conveyance and 5s. to other expenses. They also stated the nature and detail of the other expenses by enumerating the well-known incidents which constitute station terminal services and the services of collection and delivery, but they did not state the charges in respect of each of those services. They contended before the commissioners, and they

Held, as to the first appeal, that the barge-owners had no right of appeal from the judgment against the tug-owners; and as to the second appeal, (1) that the contract of towage did not relieve the tug-owners from liability for loss or damage to third persons, but only gave them an indemnity from the person employing them in respect of such liability; and (2) that the tug-owners, having reasonably defended the action, were entitled to recover from the barge-owners the costs as well as the damages.

Appeal by the defendants, the owners of The Millwall, from the judgment of Sir Francis Jeune.

The action was brought by Page & Co., the owners of the cargo in the barge Millwall, against Darling Brothers, the owners of the barge Millwall, and Gaselee & Son, the owners of the tug Bee, to recover the damage sustained by their cargo through the negligence of the defendants.

The plaintiffs loaded 572 bags of sulphate of ammonia on board The Millwall for conveyance to a steamer loading in a dock in the Thames, and instructed Darling Brothers to employ a tug to tow the barge, as time pressed, and to debit their account. Darling Brothers accordingly ordered a tug from Gaselee & Son; and on the 21st of January The Millwall, while in tow of the tug Bee, came into collision with a barge at anchor and made so much water that the cargo was seriously damaged. The charge for the carriage of the cargo, apart from the charge for the tug, was 1s. 6d. a ton. The plaintiffs, besides claiming on the ground of negligence, also sought to recover their damage against Darling Brothers under a contract by which Darling Brothers undertook to carry the cargo safely.

The defendants, the owners of The Millwall, denied that they had been negligent, or that they had failed to carry the cargo safely. In the alternative they alleged that the cargo was carried on the terms established by the course of business and dealing between the parties—viz., that Darling Brothers should not be liable for any loss of or damage to the cargo, which could be, or in fact was, covered by insurance, whether such loss or damage did or did not arise from the negligence of Darling Brothers, or their servants, or agents, and on the terms that the plaintiffs should insure against loss of or damage to the goods, and that the underwriters should in no case have recourse against Darling Brothers, and that in pursuance of the arrangement the plaintiffs did insure the cargo, and had been paid by the underwriters. The owners of the tug put in a defence denying negligence. The owners of the tug delivered their defence on the 14th of June, 1904; and on the following day they served the defendants Darling Brothers with a third-party notice, claiming that they were entitled to be indemnified by Darling Brothers against any sum which the plaintiffs might recover from the tug-owners for damages and costs, and against the costs of defending the action and of the third-party proceedings, upon the ground that the towage of The Millwall was upon their usual terms (as stated on their billheads and notepaper)—viz.: "Gaselee & Son hereby give notice that they will not be answerable for any loss or damage which may happen to, or be occasioned by, any barge or vessel, or its cargo, while in tow, however such loss or damage may arise and from whosesoever fault or default such loss or damage may arise; and the services of their tugs must be understood and agreed to be engaged or accepted upon the terms that they are to be held harmless and indemnified from any such loss or damage, and against the faults or defaults of their servants or any claim therefor by whomsoever made. And the customers of the said Gaselee & Son undertake and agree to bear, satisfy, and indemnify them accordingly." Darling Brothers, in their defence to the claim by Gaselee & Son for indemnity, pleaded, so far as material, that if the tug was employed upon the terms alleged, she was employed at the verbal request and on account and at the expense of the plaintiffs, who were well aware of Gaselee & Son's terms of towage. It was admitted that Darling Brothers had notice of the above-mentioned terms of Gaselee & Son. No order was made under ord. 16, r. 53, as to the mode or extent in or to which Darling Brothers should be bound or made liable by the judgment in the action as against Gaselee & Son.

At the trial of the action Sir Francis Jeune held that the barge Millwall was not to blame for the collision, and that the cargo was damaged by the negligence of the tug. He accordingly held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the damage sustained by them from the tug-owners; and he dismissed the action against the owners of The Millwall, the plaintiffs to pay The Millwall's costs, and he held that the plaintiffs could recover from the tug-owners, with their damage and costs, the costs payable by them to the owners of The Millwall. The claim for indemnity by the tug-owners as against the owners of The Millwall was then argued; and Sir Francis Jeune held that the contract to employ the tug was not made by the owners of The Millwall as agents for the plaintiffs, but was made by them as an independent contract, and that, therefore, there was no privity of contract between the plaintiffs and the tug-owners so as to bind the plaintiffs by the tug-owners' conditions; and upon the construction of the clause set out above he held that a right of indemnity existed, and that the owners of The Millwall were liable to pay to the tug-owners, who had reasonably, though, as it turned out, wrongly, defended the action, all the damages and costs which the plaintiffs would recover from the tug-owners, and also the tug-owners' costs in the action.

The tug-owners appealed against the judgment holding them liable to the plaintiffs; and the owners of The Millwall appealed both against so much of the judgment as pronounced the tug-owners liable to the plaintiffs, and also against the judgment holding them liable to indemnify the tug-owners. The tug-owners subsequently withdrew their appeal. Neither the damages nor the costs in any of the proceedings were actually paid, execution having been stayed pending the appeals.

Upon the appeal by the owners of The Millwall against that part of the judgment holding the tug-owners liable to the plaintiffs coming on for hearing,

March 15.—Scrutton, K.C., and A. D. Bateson, for the plaintiffs, took the preliminary objection that, as the owners of The Millwall had succeeded against the plaintiffs in the court below, they had no right of appeal. They could not appeal against a judgment in their favour. The tug-owners, who were unsuccessful in the court below, alone could appeal against the judgment, and they had withdrawn their appeal. The doctrine of subrogation does not assist the owners of The Millwall. They can only be subrogated to such rights as the tug-owners have, and as the latter have withdrawn their appeal, that right has gone, and the owners of The Millwall cannot be subrogated to it. Further, there cannot in any court be any subrogation until payment, which has not occurred here. The appeal, therefore, is not competent: West of England Fire Insurance Co. v. Isaacs, [1897] 1 Q. B. 226, 45 W. R. Dig. 74.

Carver, K.C., and F. Laing, K.C. (R. H. Balloch with them), for the owners of The Millwall.—The tug-owners have served a third-party notice under ord. 16, rr. 48, 55, claiming indemnity from the owners of The Millwall, and the latter may perhaps be, though it is not admitted that they are, bound by the judgment against the tug-owners. They are entitled to appeal against that judgment, as their rights may be prejudicially affected by it. Section 19 of the Judicature Act, 1873, taken in conjunction with ord. 58, r. 1, gives a right of appeal. It is not contended that a right of appeal can be based upon the doctrine of subrogation.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is a preliminary objection taken by the plaintiffs to this appeal. The action arises in this way. The plaintiffs were the owners of cargo loaded in a barge called The Millwall for conveyance to a ship which was being loaded in a dock in the Thames. While The Millwall was being towed by a tug she came into collision with a barge at anchor, and the cargo on board The Millwall was damaged. The plaintiffs brought an action against both the owners of The Millwall and the owners of the tug to recover the damage to the cargo, and the learned President held that the tug was to blame and not The Millwall. He accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiffs as against the tug-owners, and for the owners of The Millwall as against the plaintiffs, and he ordered that the plaintiffs should pay costs to the owners of The Millwall, and that the plaintiffs should recover the costs so paid from the tug-owners. From that judgment the tug-owners gave notice of appeal; but that appeal was withdrawn. There is therefore no appeal by the tug-owners from the judgment in favour of the plaintiffs. After that matter had been disposed of, the claim by the tug-owners for indemnity from the owners of The Millwall came on for hearing, the plaintiffs not being present at, and not being concerned in, that inquiry; and the learned President held that the owners of The Millwall were bound to indemnify the tug-owners, and he accordingly ordered them to pay to the tug-owners all the damages and costs which the plaintiffs would recover from the tug-owners and also the tug-owners' own costs. The owners of The Millwall have given notice of appeal against so much of the judgment as pronounced in favour of the plaintiffs' claim against the tug-owners and also against the judgment holding them liable to indemnify the tug-owners. By that notice of appeal they therefore seek to question the judgment as between the plaintiffs and the tug-owners. It is objected on the part of the plaintiffs that that is not an appeal which the owners of The Millwall are entitled to bring, it being a judgment between other parties, and that the owners of The Millwall cannot appeal against that judgment unless they are subrogated to the rights of the tug-owners who are parties to the judgment. The owners of The Millwall are obviously not parties to the judgment in favour of the plaintiffs as against the tug-owners, and they are not subrogated to any rights of the tug-owners under which they can appeal from the judgment. They can only take the rights which the person to whom they are subrogated have; and inasmuch as the tug-owners have abandoned their right of appeal, it is impossible to subrogate the owners of The Millwall to a right of appeal which has been abandoned. Counsel for the appellants indeed admitted that; and they rested the right of appeal upon the rules as to third-party procedure. But when one comes to examine those rules it seems to me that no proceeding has been taken and no directions have been given by the court which have the effect of putting the owners of The Millwall in a position to question the judgment in favour of the plaintiffs as against the tug-owners. Ord. 16, r. 53, is the rule dealing with the matter, and that rule provides that "the court or a judge, upon the hearing of the application mentioned in rule 52"—that is a rule providing for directions as to the trial of the liability of the third party to make the contribution or indemnity claimed—"may, if it shall appear desirable to do so, give the third party liberty to defend the action upon such terms as may be just, or to appear at the trial and take such part therein as may be just, and generally may order such proceedings to be taken, documents to be delivered, or amendments to be made, and give such directions as to the court or judge shall appear proper for having the question most conveniently determined, and as to the mode and extent in or to which the third party shall be bound or made liable by the judgment in the action." Now no order has been asked for or made determining that the third parties—the owners of The Millwall—are to be bound by the judgment in the action as between the plaintiffs and the tug-owners. Therefore, so far as I know, it may be, though I desire to express no opinion upon the point, that there is nothing binding the owners of The Millwall by the judgment between the plaintiffs and the tug-owners, and it is clear that there is no provision made in that rule or in any other rule whereby the owners of The Millwall are substituted as defendants for the tug-owners so as to give them a right of appeal in their own name. Counsel could not point to any order giving them any special rights in the matter. The owners of The Millwall, therefore, have no right of appeal, either under the principle of subrogation or under the provisions of the rules, against the judgment between the plaintiffs and tug-owners. The appeal, so far as it affects the plaintiffs, must be dismissed with costs.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and have nothing to add.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me to be clear under the rules that the mere bringing in of a third party does not, apart from a subsequent order, make the judgment in the action binding upon him, because by ord. 16, r. 53, the court or a judge, upon the hearing of an application for directions, can make an order as to the mode and extent in or to which the third parties shall be bound or made liable by the judgment in the action. That conclusion is strengthened by ord. 16, r. 55, which is the particular rule under which the third-party notice was served in the present case, for under that rule one defendant may claim contribution or indemnity from any other defendant, and the same procedure is to be adopted as in other cases, "but nothing herein contained shall prejudice the rights of the plaintiff against any defendant in the action." One of the rights of the plaintiffs as against the tug-owners is contained in a judgment against the latter which is not appealed from, and the present appeal by the third parties is directly in the teeth of the words at the end of rule 55, to which I have referred. No order has been made enabling the owners of The Millwall to defend the action as between the plaintiffs and the tug-owners. There is a lis between the plaintiffs and the owners of The Millwall, in which the owners of The Millwall were successful. There is another lis between the plaintiffs and the tug-owners, in which the plaintiffs were successful. We are asked to say that the owners of The Millwall have some right of appeal against the judgment in the second lis. There is nothing in the Judicature Act or the rules giving such a right. I think that the limits to which the right of appeal extend in the exceptional cases dealt with in order 16 are shown by the judgment of Cotton, L.J., in In re Youngs, 30 Ch. D. 421, at p. 426, where he says that "there is no power to give to a person who could not be made a party to the action leave to appeal against the judgment." If the owners of The Millwall had obtained an order allowing them to defend the action as against the tug-owners, then very possibly they might have appealed against the judgment. They cannot do so now.

March 17.—Carver, K.C., and F. Laing, K.C. (R. H. Balloch with them), for the owners of The Millwall.—The tug-owners are not liable to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs directed the owners of The Millwall to employ a tug to tow the barge, and when the latter employed the tug they did so as agents for the plaintiffs. There was therefore privity of contract between the plaintiffs and the tug-owners, and the provisions of the contract made by the owners of The Millwall and the tugowners bound the plaintiffs. Even if there was no privity of contract, inasmuch as the plaintiffs directed the owners of The Millwall to employ a tug, they must be taken to have directed them to do so upon the usual terms. The usual terms, and, indeed, the only terms upon which a tug could have been employed, were the terms upon which Gaselee & Son agreed to tow. It is impossible to say that the tug-owners were liable to the plaintiffs for negligence when they only accepted the towage upon the terms that they were not to be liable for negligence. Delaurier v. Wyllie, 17 R. 167, is in point. Illustrations of the same principle are afforded by Hall v. North-Eastern Railway Co., 23 W. R. 860, L. R. 10, Q. B. 439; Singer Manufacturing Co. v. London and South-Western Railway Co., 42 W. R. 347, [1894] 1 Q. B. 833; and Keene v. Thomas, ante, p. 336, [1905] 1 K. B. 136. Secondly, if the tug-owners were liable to the plaintiffs, they have no right of indemnity over. Underwriters who agreed that if their assured became liable to pay and paid as damages for running down any other ship any sum not exceeding the value of the vessel insured, they would repay to the assured a certain proportion of that sum, were held in Xenos v. Fox, 16 W. R. 1053, L. R. 3 C. P. 630, 17 W. R. 893, L. R. 4 C. P. 665, not liable to pay any portion of the costs which the assured incurred in successfully defending an action of collision brought against him. The indemnity clause here only covers "such loss or damage"—that is, loss or damage to the cargo. There is no contract to indemnify the tug-owners against costs. The judgment is therefore wrong.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and Bailhache, for the tug-owners.—The clause in question does not affect the cargo-owners. It is only operative as between the tug-owners and the barge-owners. It is because the tug-owners have come under an obligation to third persons, whether cargo-owners or others, that the indemnity clause is required. The clause assumes such a liability and gave an indemnity in respect thereof. Therefore the tug-owners had no defence under the clause to the action by the plaintiffs. There being no privity of contract between the tug-owners and the cargo-owners, the latter had a good cause of action against the former. Secondly, the cause covers the costs of reasonably defending the action: Hammond v. Bussey, 20 Q. B. D. 79, 36 W. R. Dig. 65. The tug-owners, by giving the barge-owners a third-party notice, gave them an opportunity of protecting their interests, either by taking over the defence of the action, or by giving the tug-owners notice not to defend, and that if they did defend they would do so at their own risk. The barge-owners did not do this. The costs are therefore recoverable.

Carver, K.C., in reply.—The first part of the clause is quite general, and is independent of the second part, which gives the indemnity.

March 18.—COLLINS, M.R.—This is a dispute between the barge-owners and the tug-owners, and that dispute turns upon the contract of towage made between them. It is contended by the tug-owners that the effect of that contract is to shift all responsibility for the damage done to the cargo from them on to the barge-owners. The learned President, taking that view, held that the contract had the effect of shifting from the tug-owners to the barge-owners the entire liability for the damage to the cargo. That was a decision most unwelcome to the barge-owners, who had been acquitted of all blame in the matter, whereas the tug-owers had been held alone to blame, and they were naturally startled at the result. The question, however, arises upon the agreement which the barge-owners made with the tug-owners. It seems to me that that agreement presents no real difficulty. It seems to be clear that, upon the terms of that agreement, the liability for any loss or damage is taken from the tug-owners and placed on the barge-owners. Now comes this question. The barge-owners, being in that disagreeable predicament, sought to force the plaintiffs to discuss with them whether that part of the original judgment which held the tug-owners liable to pay to the plaintiffs the amount of the damage done to the cargo was right, and for that purpose they gave notice of appeal from that judgment. The tug-owners had given notice of appeal against that judgment, but they withdrew that notice. We held a few days ago that the barge-owners had not put themselves in the position of the tug-owners so as to entitle them to contest that decision. The barge-owners now contend that that judgment against the tug-owners is not binding upon them, and they seek to show that it is wrong upon the ground that the tug-owners, as between themselves and the plaintiffs, are exempt from liability for negligence. It may be that that judgment is not binding upon the barge-owners, and that they are entitled to show that it is wrong, and that the tug-owners ought not to have been held liable at all. I do not decide that it is open to the barge-owners to contest that judgment upon a collateral issue. I will assume that they are entitled to do so for the purposes of the present argument.

I now come to the terms of the contract upon which the tug-owners undertook to tow the barge. Mr. Carver first of all contends that, in the circumstances under which that document came into existence, it established privity of contract between the plaintiffs and the tug-owners, and that therefore the tug-owners were relieved of all liability to the plaintiffs. That is a question of fact, depending upon the circumstances in which the engagement of the tug was made. The learned President came to the conclusion that privity of contract had not been established between the plaintiffs and the tug-owners, and that the barge-owners made the contract directly with the tug-owners on their own behalf. It is not necessary to refer to the evidence upon that part of the case. I see no reason for differing from the conclusion arrived at by the learned President. I think that he arrived at the fair meaning of the arrangement between the parties. Therefore I start with this, that the document did not create privity of contract between the plaintiffs and the tug-owners. Upon the hypothesis that privity of contract is not established, Mr. Carver's next contention is that the true effect of the document is to relieve the tug-owners from all liability for loss or damage in respect of the carriage of the cargo—in other words, that the cargo was carried at owners' risk. In my opinion, upon the construction of this document, it does not amount to a contract to carry the cargo at owners' risk. It presupposes a liability to some one on the part of the tug-owners, and it secures an indemnity to them. It is a contract of indemnity against a liability which the tug-owners require to be indemnified against. Mr. Carver contended that the first part of the document stands alone, and is perfectly general in its terms, and amounts to a declaration that the goods are to be carried at owners' risk. The answer to that contention is that the document does not stop there. The whole document is a contract of indemnity to the tug-owners against "such loss or damage"—that is, the loss or damage previously mentioned. The barge-owners, therefore, undertake to indemnify the tug-owners against claims by anyone for damage to vessel or cargo occasioned by, as in the present case, a collision. Therefore the point that there is no liability upon the part of the tug-owners to the plaintiffs fails.

Now comes the further contention that, admitting liability to indemnify the tug-owners, that indemnity must be limited to the damage occasioned to the cargo, and does not include the costs which the tug-owners have been held liable to pay. That raises the question whether, having regard to all the circumstances, the tug-owners in defending the action acted otherwise than reasonably. The case falls within the principle which was laid down long ago, and is now well-established. It was laid down in 1859 in Broom v. Hall, 7 C. B. N. S. 503, 9 W. R. C. L. Dig. 32, the head-note in which case is as follows: "A., a broker, contracted with B. for the purchase (on behalf of C.) of certain goods. C. refusing to accept the goods, B. sued A. for the breach of contract. C. had notice of the proceedings, but repudiated his liability, and A. defended the action unsuccessfully. In an action by A. against C. for damages and costs paid and incurred by him in the first action, C. paid into court enough to cover the damages only, and it was left to the jury to say whether A., in defending the former action, had pursued the course which a prudent and reasonable man would have done in his own case. The jury having found for the plaintiff—held, that A. was entitled to recover the costs." No doubt after that decision one or two cases were decided which did not give full effect to it. One such case was Baxendale v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., 23 W. R. 167, L. R. 10 Ex. 35. But in the subsequent case of Hammond v. Bussey all the cases were considered and full effect was given to the decision in Broom v. Hall. In the present case there was no jury to decide whether the tug-owners acted reasonably in defending the action, but the learned President found that they acted reasonably in defending, and that they had a right of indemnity over for the costs to which they had been put. The evidence that they had acted reasonably is strong. They gave the barge-owners, who were ultimately liable, full notice of the claim, they served a third-party notice upon the barge-owners which gave them full opportunity of intervening and disputing the claim, or of ascertaining the extent of the loss and paying it, and in these circumstances it is not competent for them to throw upon the tug-owners the whole burden of the litigation. The learned President came to the conclusion that the tug-owners did all that they reasonably could in ascertaining whether they were liable to the plaintiffs, and in diminishing the amount of the loss, and that, therefore, they had a right of indemnity over against the barge-owners for the costs to which they were rendered liable in those proceedings. In these circumstances, the barge-owners are liable to repay those costs to the tug-owners. Mr. Carver says that the document does not in terms include the costs, but only the "loss or damage." No doubt that is so, but it is not conclusive of the matter. By reason of the existence of the contract of indemnity which renders the third parties liable in a certain event, there arises, upon the happening of that event, the question whether the tug-owners, in whose favour the indemnity is given, have acted reasonably in contesting the claim made against them. The contract of indemnity gives the third parties an interest in that question, and the third-party procedure gives them full opportunity of meeting or contesting that claim. The liability to pay the costs does not arise directly out of the contract of indemnity, but comes into existence afterwards, and arises out of the conduct of the parties after the contract of indemnity is come into operation and a claim has been made which gives rise to a right of indemnity under the contract. Sometimes a provision for the payment of the costs is introduced into the contract of indemnity itself, but it does not follow that where it is not so introduced the right to indemnity against those costs is excluded. For these reasons the judgment of the learned President was right and the appeal must be dismissed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with the Master of the Rolls that upon the facts no privity of contract has been established between the plaintiffs and the tug-owners, and that the conditions were applicable only as between the tug-owners and the barge-owners. The only point upon which I desire to add anything is upon the question whether, inasmuch as costs are not mentioned in the indemnity contract, the tug-owners can recover from the barge-owners the costs of defending the action brought against them by the plaintiffs. It is well settled in one large class of case that the costs of litigation are recoverable by the person entitled to the indemnity. The class of case to which I refer is that of two trustees being held liable for breach of trust, one of whom is primarily liable, in which case it is well established that the trustee primarily liable is bound not only to make good to his co-trustee the loss incurred, but also the costs to which the co-trustee has been put. That has been decided in Lockhart v. Reilly, 4 W. R. 438, 25 L. J. Ch. 697, and in a very recent case before Warrington, J., of In re Linsley, ante, p. 172, [1904] 2 Ch. 785. In this latter case Warrington, J., held that "a solicitor-trustee, to whom the management of the trust has been left as the acting trustee, is liable to indemnify his co-trustee against the costs of an action caused by his negligent conduct of the trust business, even where no actual loss has been thereby occasioned to the trust estate." That is the principle upon which the learned President proceeded in the present case, and it is no new principle, but one long established.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the plaintiffs, James Ballantyne.

Solicitors for the barge-owners, Keene, Marsland, Bryden, & Bennett.

Solicitors for the tug-owners, J. A. & H. E. Farnfield.

as to value. These experts are men who very often can tell with great accuracy and certainty what effect the taking away of a particular convenience in a house may have upon its letting or selling value. It is not suggested here that these witnesses were prejudiced, or that there was any ground for distrusting them. They say that the house has diminished in value to the extent of (I think) £20 or £25 a year; and even if it were taken at a less sum, I cannot doubt but that the house must have been made substantially less comfortable and convenient, according to the ordinary notions of mankind, by reason of the obstruction. In one sense I entirely agree with what was said by Kekewich, J., about the leaving of sufficient light not being a test. It seems to me that it is absolutely impossible to apply the test which has been defined by the House of Lords without taking into consideration, amongst other things, the amount of light which is left in a particular room at the time when the obstruction takes place. Under these circumstances, I do not see my way to differ from the judgment of Kekewich, J., that there is a cause of action here. Then one has to consider whether there ought to be damages or a mandatory injunction. With regard to that, I propose to apply the test laid down by Lord Macnaghten in Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores, or that laid down by Smith, L.J., in his judgment in Shelfer v. City of London Electric Lighting Co. It seems to me here impossible to say that there ought to be any injunction by reason of any act by the defendant which could be properly termed high-handed, or upon which anyone could impute to him the desire to steal a march upon the plaintiff, or to evade the jurisdiction of the court. I think—and I wish emphatically to state this—that both parties honestly acted in accordance with what they believed, and not unreasonably might believe, to be their legal rights. Some suggestion was made that the plaintiff might have lost her right to an injunction by reason of delay; but I think the delay has been accounted for. The only other matter which, according to Lord Macnaghten's judgment, remains to be considered, is whether the injury cannot be fairly compensated by money damages. I think it can be, and under those circumstances I think there ought to be no mandatory injunction. I will not refer in detail to the rules laid down for general application in the judgment of Smith, L.J., in Shelfer v. City of London Electric Lighting Co., but the observations I have made will make it plain that, according to my view, there is nothing in any one of those rules which makes it right that a mandatory injunction should be granted here. There remains the question of damages. With regard to that, I do not think that Kekewich, J., has definitely found any sum for damages, and I think the amount of damages ought to be the subject of an inquiry in chambers, unless, of course, the parties can agree them. Notwithstanding the evidence of the experts—evidence to which attention ought to be given by reason of their knowledge, and also by reason of, I think I may say, their impartiality in this matter—I have great difficulty in agreeing with them in putting the damage quite as high as £25 a year, or at the capital sum which is placed on this house by them. I think it is only right, therefore, that there should be an inquiry if the parties cannot agree upon the amount.

ROMER, L.J.—This case is a simple one in one respect. It is a case where the house which is alleged to be injured is occupied by ordinary persons for the common purposes of domestic life. It is not the case of a business being carried on, nor a case of extraordinary user of any kind. The case is further narrowed by this—that practically the only part of the plaintiff's premises that we need consider is that which is called the morning-room. As I understand it, it is in respect of that room alone that the learned judge has thought the plaintiff entitled to relief. That being so, I have to consider what is the law applicable to this case. That law has recently been expounded by the House of Lords in the case of Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores. I have carefully considered, as was my duty, the addresses of the noble lords who decided that case, and I think I am enabled to gather from those addresses on what principle I am to deal with the case now before us, and I think I may state that principle shortly. The case has to be approached undoubtedly now from the point of view that the plaintiff has to establish what might fairly be called a nuisance. That of course in itself is no sufficient guide; but I am enabled to gather from Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores how a jury should be directed, or how a judge should direct himself in trying to determine in each case what would constitute a nuisance. I think all the noble lords were agreed that, at any rate for the purposes of such a case as this, the law is laid down, though not quite in the same language, yet for all substantial purposes in the same way, and accurately, in the four cases of Back v. Stacey, Parker v. Smith, Kelk v. Pearson, and City of London Brewery Co. v. Tennant. I take the law to be now, as stated in City of London Brewery Co. v. Tennant, as follows, strictly limiting the statement to such a case as we have now before us: An owner of ancient lights is entitled to sufficient light, according to the ordinary notions of mankind, for the comfortable use and enjoyment of his house as a dwelling-house, if it is a dwelling-house. That I take to be in the present case a sufficient and proper direction of law, coupled only with this further statement, which I think is essential. I think that, in considering what, according to the ordinary notions of mankind, is sufficient light for the comfortable use and enjoyment of the house, one ought to bear in mind the locality, and, further, I think that in considering what is sufficient light one must bear in mind the statement made by Lord Lindley in Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores, and approved of, as I gather, by the other lords. "As regards light from other quarters, such light cannot be disregarded; for, as pointed out by James, V.C., in Dyers Company v. King, 18 W. R. 404, L. R. 9 Eq. 438, the light from other quarters and the light the obstruction of which is complained of may be so much in excess of what is protected by law as to render the interference complained of non-actionable"; and he goes on: "I apprehend, however, that light to which a right has not been acquired by grant or prescription, and of which the plaintiff may be deprived at any time, ought not to be taken into account." It appears to me that those are sufficient directions to me as to the law on the subject, and all I have to do is to see how the facts of the present case are to be dealt with in accordance with that law. I think it is impossible to say that the present case, on the facts, is free from difficulty. It appears to me to be one which may fairly be said to be on the border line. That it is difficult, I think, may fairly be said, owing to the fact that I, unfortunately for myself, have come to a different conclusion of fact in this case from that taken by my brothers. After considering the evidence in this case, and doing my best to arrive at a conclusion as to whether, according to the law, the defendant's building has caused a nuisance to the plaintiff, trying to come to the conclusion which an intelligent jury ought to come to in such as a case, I can only say that the conclusion I have come to is that the plaintiff has failed to prove that the defendant has committed a nuisance in respect of these lights. I will shortly state my reasons for coming to that conclusion, and I will first deal with the question irrespective of the judgment of Kekewich, J. I have no doubt whatever that the defendant's building, by its erection, caused less light than before to come to the west window of the morning-room in question, and that not to an immaterial extent; and I bear in mind in the conclusion I have come to what the locality is here, and how matters stood before the erection of the defendant's house. I will first deal with the evidence that arises from an inspection, as it were, of the premises themselves. We have not the advantage, of course, of being able to go and see the premises themselves, but we have very good models before us, and it is not suggested that those models do not accurately give a proper representation of the two houses, and enable the court to judge how the defendant's house interferes with the light of the plaintiff's premises; bearing in mind, as one ought to do, that the defendant's house is to the west of the plaintiff's. To my mind the evidence that a jury could get from an inspection, or that a judge could get if he saw the premises himself, or from seeing a fair and proper representation of the premises, is very important. And I say this, not only because it is my own opinion, but because in Back v. Stacey Best, C.J., told the jury, who had viewed the premises, that they were to judge rather from their own ocular observation than from the testimony of any witnesses, however respectable, of the degree of diminution which the plaintiff's ancient lights had undergone; and Best, C.J.'s, address to the jury has been approved by the House of Lords. When I look at these two premises, and consider the defendant's house with relation to the plaintiff's, and particularly with relation to the morning-room, I notice that the morning-room is a comparatively small room extremely well lighted by two windows—the north window and the west. The north window is wholly uninterfered with by the defendant's premises, and it is an ancient light; and therefore, bearing in mind what was said by Lord Lindley, I am entitled to consider for present purposes that that light remains. Then, with regard to the west light, I notice that to the north, even the west window of the plaintiff's morning-room has light coming from nearly the whole, if not the whole, of a quarter of a circle—that is to say, due north to nearly due west, wholly uninterfered with. Of course that would not be direct sunlight, but it is light coming from the north, and even the defendant's house does not interfere with the light from the west and south; there is a margin wholly uninterfered with from the south, and to a certain extent from the south-west. Therefore there is only a partial interference with the west window itself, between west and south-west. Moreover, the height of the defendant's house is not excessive, in my opinion. It is not a case where it takes away forty-five degrees of light. So far as even the highest point may be said to affect the west window of the morning room, it does not interfere to that extent. If, then, I had to answer the question before me by reason of a knowledge of these premises, when I saw how the north light was wholly uninterfered with, and the west light was only partially interfered with, I should myself have been disposed to come to the conclusion on the evidence that the room would still remain well lighted and would have sufficient light, according to the ordinary notions of mankind, for its comfortable use and enjoyment as a dwelling-house. At any rate, I could not come to the opposite conclusion, or say that I was satisfied from looking at these models that any nuisance had been committed. Then how does the evidence stand, apart from the most important evidence that arises with regard to the premises themselves? I must say that, so far as the experts are concerned, speaking for myself, they give evidence, no doubt, in accordance with their opinions, but they are of course influenced, naturally, by the side on which they are called. It is not possible that this should not be so, otherwise how could one explain what we have here, and what we have in every case—experts on one side giving one view, and experts on the other side giving another? I do not think that the expert evidence removes the impression on my mind caused by a knowledge of the two houses together. Now I come to the other evidence—the evidence of certain residents in this house. They gave certain evidence with regard to reading, which, if it could have been accepted, would have been most material. Personally, I must say that I should have had very great difficulty in accepting it, but I am fortunately excused, if I may say so, from arriving at that conclusion, because Kekewich, J., having heard the witnesses, has said, "The evidence about reading must be dismissed altogether." The rest of the evidence of the occupiers of the house is open, to my mind, to this observation: They are not considering, of course, a question of nuisance; they are comparing the morning-room as it now is with that room without any obstruction whatever to the west; and they would naturally think, if they got any interference with their light, that it interfered with their comfort. They would naturally not appreciate the point that there may be an interference with light which is not a nuisance at law; and, speaking for myself, having regard to their evidence, coupled with the evidence of the expert witnesses and with the evidence derived from looking at the models, I am not satisfied on the evidence as a whole that there has been what amounts to a nuisance in this case. If I had thought that the learned judge had come to an opposite conclusion of fact, I should have hesitated to give effect to my view; but, doing the best I can do with the judgment of the learned judge, I do not come to the conclusion that his findings of fact do show that a nuisance has been committed. In fact, I think, on a fair interpretation of his judgment, he has made certain findings which negative the idea of nuisance. The very first finding he has with regard to this morning-room is this: "It was an exceptionally well-lighted room, and even now is well lighted." It is not well lighted generally, or irrespective of what he means by well lighted, because he goes on. "So that if the test were whether there is sufficient light left to enable the room to be used for the purposes for which it was designed there would be no further question"; in other words, he holds as a fact that this is a well-lighted room still, and well lighted for the purposes for which the room was built; and the purpose for which that room was built we know was that of occupation as a morning-room for ordinary family domestic purposes. Therefore this is, to my mind, a clear finding that, notwithstanding anything the defendant has done, the plaintiff still has, following the words used in City of London Brewery Co. v. Tennant, sufficient light, according to the ordinary notions of mankind, for the comfortable use and enjoyment of his house as a dwelling-house, and of this morning-room in particular. That is, I think, the conclusion at which he has arrived on that finding, and I think there is nothing in the rest of his judgment to negative that. He certainly finds that there has been a large obstruction of light. As regards that, I am as well able to judge as the learned judge himself to what extent there has been an obstruction. I do not think it can be said that there is a large obstruction. That there has been an obstruction I agree, and the amount of it

I am aware of; but, even taking it that there has been a large obstruction of light to the west window, that does not decide the question. Then he says that the cheerfulness of the morning-room is essential. I do not know what he means by that; but what I think he means is that, like every morning-room, the lighter it is the more cheerful it is. Then he says that there has been a large interference with the cheerfulness of the room—not with its comfortable use and enjoyment as part of the dwelling-house, but with its cheerfulness. He makes it clear later on what he means, because he says, "I am convinced that the character of the room is altered"—that means in respect of the cheerfulness—"and that though still a well-lighted room it has lost in the obstruction of light one of its chief charms and advantages." In other words, when the plaintiff had used the morning-room with a look-out to the west wholly unobstructed it had a charm and advantage in its special cheerfulness, and by reason of the deprivation of that the character of the room to that extent has suffered; but the judge does not find that which amounts to a nuisance. On the contrary, as I have pointed out, he finds as a fact that which in my own opinion shows that there was no nuisance. That being so, it appears to me that the judgment of the learned judge, far from enabling me to depart from the opinion that I should otherwise have formed on this case, confirms it; and I come to the conclusion on the whole of this case that the plaintiff's case fails, and that the action ought to have been dismissed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—This is a very important and extremely difficult case, and, as there is a difference of opinion, it is necessary that I should shortly state why I agree with the judgment given by my lord. It is needless to say that I approach this case with an anxious desire to follow loyally the decision of the House of Lords in Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores, so far as I can gather the principles which ought to govern it. I am not sure that I entirely agree with my lord when he says that there was in substance only one principle laid down by the law lords in that case. I think I can trace several points of difference, though they are not, perhaps, material for the purposes of the present case. It may be that in the very lengthy and interesting and elaborate discussion which we have had over that case we have somewhat forgotten that all the law lords based their judgments upon the findings of fact by Joyce, J. There was there a clear finding that the proposed building would not affect the selling or letting value of the respondent's premises; and there was also a finding that the diminution of light would not materially affect the respondents' comfort or convenience. The decision in Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores, therefore, does not seem to me to amount to more than this—that an obstruction which neither lessens the letting or selling value of the house nor materially affects the comfort or convenience of the occupier does not in law justify an action, even though a large proportion of light previously enjoyed has been lost. In the present case I think it is clear that the learned judge has held that the letting or selling value of the house has been affected by the defendant's building, and he has also certainly found that the comfort or convenience of the occupier has been affected by it. That being so, there is nothing, I think, in the decision in Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores which in any way prevents me from arriving at the conclusion which I propose to adopt. It has been strenuously argued on behalf the appellant that all we have to consider is the amount of light which has been left. I cannot accept that view of the law. It seems to me that the law as approved by the House of Lords, particularly by Lord Macnaghten, cannot be better stated than it was by Parke, B., in Wells v. Ody: "The question, therefore, which I shall leave to you is, whether the effect of the defendant's building is to diminish the light and air so as sensibly to affect the occupation of the plaintiff's premises, and make them less fit for occupation." Is it any answer to say that the room is still a well-lighted room? I think not, if the building makes the room less fit for occupation; and I do not think that we can bring in the phrase "according to the ordinary notions of mankind" to cut down the effect which would otherwise result from a building of this nature. I for my part accept the findings of fact of Kekewich, J. He has found, as I read his judgment, that the letting and selling value has diminished, and that the plaintiff's morning-room is materially affected so far as the comfort and convenience of the occupiers are concerned. That being so, I agree with my lord that there is a good cause of action. I pass from the judgment with this sole remark, that it seems to me that the learned judge applied the law quite correctly, or, to use a common phrase, he directed himself properly as to the law. When I come to the relief which he gave I am bound to say that I think this is not a case for a mandatory injunction. There is no case of sharp practice or unfair conduct on the part of the defendant. It is not a case of irrecoverable damage, or of the house being rendered uninhabitable, nor is it a case in which damages cannot be regarded as reasonable and adequate compensation. I think it is impossible to doubt that the tendency of the judgments of the House of Lords in Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores is to go a little further than was done in Shelfer v. City of London Electric Lighting Co. and to indicate that as a general rule the court ought to be less free in granting mandatory injunctions than it was in years gone by. Then, assuming that there is no mandatory injunction, are we in a position to assess the amount of damages? I think not. Although Kekewich, J., held that the plaintiff had suffered damages, he did not specify them. That being so, it seems to me that we are driven even at this late stage to say that there must be a reference to the master in chambers in the usual way, or to the official referee to ascertain the amount of damages.

Solicitors, Graham Gordon; Redfern & Hunt.

From Railway Commission. (Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — March 29.

PICKFORD'S (LIMITED) v. LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Railway—Traffic—Rates—Dissection of rate—Particulars of services—Particulars of charges—Regulation of Railways Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 48), s. 14.

Under section 14 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, the Railway Commissioners have jurisdiction, on the application of an interested person, to order a railway company to state not only the items of the services in respect of which a rate is charged, but also the particular sums charged for each particular service.

Colman v. Great Eastern Railway Co., 4 Ry. & Ca. Tr. Cas. 108, and Birchgrove Steel Co. v. Midland Railway Co., 5 Ry. & Ca. Tr. Cas. 229, approved.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from a decision of the Railway and Canal Commission Court (Bigham, J., Sir Frederick Peel, and Viscount Cobham).

On the application of Pickford's (Limited), who carried on business as general carriers, the Railway and Canal Commission Court made an order on the London and North-Western Railway Co. for the dissection of certain rates charged by the company for goods traffic, under section 14 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873.

The railway company having supplied the applicants with certain particulars in pursuance of the order, the applicants applied to the commissioners for the infliction of a penalty for disobedience to the order, alleging that the particulars supplied by the company did not constitute a sufficient compliance. The following is an instance of the information given by the particulars. The rate for soap from Bradford to Dewsbury was 7s. 10d. Of this the company in their particulars attributed 2s. 10d. as applicable to conveyance (this being the maximum chargeable under their special Act), and 5s. as applicable to "other expenses." The "nature and detail" of the other expenses were stated to be "provision of station at each end, covering and uncovering, loading and unloading, collection and delivery." The applicants contended that in default of a specific sum being allotted to each one of these items the order made had not been complied with.

Section 14 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, provides as follows: "The commissioners may from time to time, on the application of any person interested, make orders with respect to any particular description of traffic, requiring a railway company or canal company to distinguish in such book how much of each rate is for the conveyance of the traffic on the railway or canal, including therein tolls for the use of the railway or canal, for the use of carriages or vessels, or for locomotive power, and how much is for other expenses, specifying the nature and detail of such other expenses."

The judgment of the commissioners was delivered by Bigham, J., and was to the effect that the order had not been sufficiently complied with. The learned judge expressed his own personal opinion that the railway company had done everything which the Act and the order contemplated. But he felt himself bound to follow a decision of the commissioners given in the year 1882 in the case of Colman v. Great Eastern Railway Co., 4 Ry. & Ca. Tr. Cas. 108, before the court was presided over by a judge, in accordance with the principles laid down by Collins, J., in Didcot, Newbury, and Southampton Railway Co. v. Great Western Railway Co., 9 Ry. & Ca. Tr. Cas. 210, at p. 229, that the decisions given by the Commission Court since its commencement are binding on the Commission Court.

The railway company appealed.

Cripps, K.C. and W. J. Noble (Moon, K.C., with them), for the railway company.

Foote, K.C., and Rowland Whitehead (Balfour Browne, K.C., with them), for the applicants.

The following cases were cited: London and North Western Railway Co. v. Lee, 7 Times L. R. 603; Pidcock & Co. v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co., 9 Ry. & Ca. Tr. Cas. 45; New Union Mills Co. v. Great Western Railway Co., [1896] 2 Q. B. 290, 44 W. R. Dig. 140; Colman v. Great Eastern Railway Co., 4 Ry. & Ca. Tr. Cas. 108; Birchgrove Steel Co. v. Midland Railway Co., 5 Ry. & Ca. Tr. Cas. 229; Tomlinson v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 7 Ry. & Ca. Tr. Cas. 22; Coxon v. North-Eastern Railway Co., 4 Ry. & Ca. Tr. Cas. 284; and Liverpool Corn Traders' Association v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 7 Ry. Ca. Tr. Cas. 125.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of the Railway Commission. An application was made by a trader against a railway company under section 14 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, asking for an order on the railway company to disintegrate certain rates, and to state not only the nature of the particular rates of which the rates appearing in the rate-book consisted, but also the particular sums charged in respect of the particular rates. Section 14 provides as follows: "Every railway company and canal company shall keep at each of their stations and wharves a book or books showing every rate for the time being charged for the traffic, other than passengers and their luggage, from that station or wharf to any place to which they book, including any rates charged under any special contract, and stating the distance from that station or wharf of every station, wharf, siding, or place to which any such rate is charged." That is a provision for a station to station rate. Up to that point in the section that is the extent of the obligation on the company with regard to the condition of their rate-book. No larger obligation is imposed on the company till later in the section. All that is provided for so far is a station to station rate. The section then proceeds: "Every such book shall during all reasonable hours be open to the inspection of any person, without the payment of any fee." Then follows the part of the section with which we have especially to deal in this case: "The commissioners may from time to time, on the application of any person interested, make orders with respect to any particular description of traffic requiring a railway company or canal company to distinguish in such book how much of each rate"—that is to say, each rate appearing in the rate-book under the earlier part of the section—"is for the conveyance of the traffic on the railway or canal, including therein tolls for the use of the railway or canal, for the use of carriages or vessels, or for locomotive power, and how much is for other expenses, specifying the nature and detail of such other expenses."

In this case the applicants are rival traders—viz., Pickford's (Limited)—and they are interested in the charges made for cartage. Unlike other customers who deal with the railway, they do their own cartage, and, when the time came for them to pay the charges due from them to the railway company, they desired to know how much was charged for cartage. They claimed to be interested persons within the meaning of the section, and they asked for an order under the section, the ground of their application being that otherwise they would be liable to the risk of being prejudiced by undue preferences. The commissioners made an order; and, on the matter coming before them again, the point was taken on behalf of the railway company that, on the true construction of the section, they were not under any obligation to disintegrate their rates any further than they had already done in particulars given by them in answer to the application, with which particulars, however, the applicants were not satisfied. To take an example of the particulars, the company stated, with regard to the rate for soap from Bradford to Dewsbury, that the inclusive rate was 7s. 10d., and they attributed 2s. 10d. to conveyance and 5s. to other expenses. They also stated the nature and detail of the other expenses by enumerating the well-known incidents which constitute station terminal services and the services of collection and delivery, but they did not state the charges in respect of each of those services. They contended before the commissioners, and they have contended before us, that they are not bound to do more than they have done.

It seems to me that in this case we are not exclusively concerned with section 14, and that we must also look at section 15. That section is as follows: "The commissioners shall have power to hear and determine any question or dispute which may arise with respect to the terminal charges of any railway company where such charges have not been fixed by any Act of Parliament, and to decide what is a reasonable sum to be paid to any company for loading and unloading, covering, collection, delivery, and other services of a like nature; any decision of the commissioners under this section shall be binding on all courts and in all legal proceedings whatsoever." That seems to involve this—that Parliament thought it was possible to ascertain of what sums charges made for such services was made up.

I now come to that part of section 14 on which we have to put a construction. Having regard to the words of the section, I am of opinion that the particulars to which Parliament meant that the trader should be entitled are not only particulars of the services, but particulars of the charges. The section speaks of "the nature and detail of such other expenses." That seems primâ facie to involve the amount of the expenses.

Counsel for the company rely on the fact that the section uses the word "expenses" and not the word "charges," and they suggest that "expenses" is merely equivalent to services. But the expenses are the charges for the services, and, in my opinion, the meaning of the section is that the trader is entitled to know how much he is charged for each particular service.

The section was the subject-matter of a decision in the year 1882 in the case Colman v. Great Eastern Railway Co., when Sir Frederick Peel presided over the Commission Court. The commissioners there held that the words "specifying the nature and detail of such other expenses" required a railway company, on whom an order under the section had been made, to state in their rate-book what terminal services they undertook to perform with regard to the particular traffic, and how much they charged for each of such terminal services, and that the company did not sufficiently comply with the section by giving a list of the various terminal services which they performed and stating what their total charge was for the whole of those services. That is a decision precisely in point on the question now before the court in favour of the applicants. It was followed in the case of Birchgrove Steel Co. v. Midland Railway Co. The judgment of Sir Frederick Peel in the latter case seems to me to be good sense and in consonance with the intention of the Legislature.

I have referred to sections 14 and 15 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873. I think it right also to refer to an earlier piece of legislation on the subject —viz., section 17 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1868. That was a step in the direction of giving traders the kind of relief which is sought in this case. It enabled them to obtain from a company particulars of charges made for goods, but without particularizing the several items of which the charge for loading, unloading, covering, collection, and delivery might consist. Parliament was intending to confer a privilege on traders as against railway companies, and that privilege Parliament gradually enlarged. The first provision contained the limitation I have mentioned. If that provision is contrasted with the section now under discussion, it is clear that the object of section 14 of the Act of 1873 is to extend the privilege by removing that limitation. Still later Parliament has extended the privilege even further—viz., by the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888, s. 33, sub-section 3, which gives traders fresh facilities for obtaining information as to charges.

The last-mentioned sub-section seemed to me at first to afford an agument in favour of the railway company, as implying that the same information could not have been obtained under the Act of 1873. But it now appears to me to be clear that the object of sub-section 3 of section 33 of the Act of 1888 is to give traders a more summary remedy—viz., that of applying by letter to the company, who are liable under sub-section 7 to a penalty if they fail to comply with the application, and to relieve them from the necessity of going to the Commission Court.

It is suggested that it is an unreasonable hardship on a company to be bound to give in their rate-book a detailed statement of every possible rate. I think the answer to that is that the first part of section 14 of the Act of 1873 is general, and that the obligation to give details is only introduced when an application has been made by some person interested. It is only for the benefit of a particular person that this detailed information has to be given. For him the company must distinguish the items of the various charges. If he is satisfied, it does not seem that the commissioners need call on the company to make the information public. At any rate there seems to be clear jurisdiction under the section to order the discovery which is asked for, and, therefore, in my opinion the appeal fails.

MATHEW and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the applicants, Neish, Howell, & Haldane.

Solicitor for the railway company, C. de J. Andrewes.

From K. B. Div.
(Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L JJ.) March 21.

LEADBITTER v. MAYOR, &c., OF ST. MARYLEBONE (No. 2). (a.)

Metropolis — Building — Party structure — Building owner's notice—Limitation of time for exercise of rights under notice—London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. cxiii.), s. 90, sub-section 4.

The limitation of six months mentioned in section 90, sub-section 4, of the London Building Act, 1894, applies to cases in which, a building owner having served a party-wall or structure notice, the adjoining owner consents thereto. It does not apply where differences arise between the building owner and the adjoining owner with regard to the notice, and arbitrators are appointed to settle the differences.

Appeal from the refusal of Bucknill, J., to make an order under ord. 42, r. 30, for the purpose of giving effect to an injunction obtained by the plaintiffs against the defendants.

The plaintiffs were the freeholders of a house known as No. 33, John-street, Marylebone; the defendants were the freeholders of the adjoining house, which was known as No. 34, John-street.

In 1902 a dispute arose between the plaintiffs' tenant and the defendants with regard to the party-wall between the two houses, the tenant having served on the defendants a building owner's party-wall notice under section 90 of the London Building Act, 1894, and the defendants having served on the tenant a counter-notice under section 89, and the matter was referred for settlement to surveyors in pursuance of section 91. The award of the surveyors, after dealing with the differences between the parties to which the notices related, provided further that the defendants should be entitled to raise the party-wall at any time as they thought fit.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In 1904 the defendants proposed to raise the party-wall and commenced building thereon.

The plaintiffs, who had in the meantime accepted a surrender of their tenant's lease, brought an action of trespass against the defendants, claiming an injunction to restrain the defendants from raising or building on the party-wall without first serving a building-owner's notice on the plaintiffs.

On the 6th of August, 1904, the Court of Appeal gave judgment, granting the plaintiffs the injunction which they claimed: see ante, p. 118.

On the 11th of August the defendants served a building owner's party-wall notice on the plaintiffs as adjoining owners. A difference arose between the parties as to the execution of the works mentioned in the notice, and surveyors were appointed under section 91 for the settlement of the matters in dispute.

At the expiration of six months from the service of the notice—i.e., on the 11th of February, the surveyors had not made their award, and no further building had been done by the defendants.

Thereupon the plaintiffs, contending that by reason of section 90, sub-section 4, of the London Building Act, 1894, the powers of the surveyors had lapsed, applied for and obtained an order for a reference to an official referee to assess the amount due to them for damages in the action. They also applied to Bucknill, J., at chambers, for an order, under ord. 42, r. 30, directing that the defendants should remove the building erected by them upon the party-wall, and that, if they failed to do so, the plaintiffs should be at liberty to remove the same at the expense of the defendants.

Bucknill, J., dismissed the application.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Sub-section 4 of section 90 is as follows: "A party-wall or structure notice shall not be available for the exercise of any right unless the work to which the notice relates is begun within six months after the service thereof, and is prosecuted with due diligence."

J. Eldon Bankes, K.C., and Poyser, for the plaintiffs.

Macmorran, K.C., and G. A. Scott, for the defendants.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed. It is admitted that the plaintiffs are not in a position to insist upon the order which they asked for at chambers, and it is agreed that the application shall be treated as one for a sequestration against the defendants for having disobeyed the former order of this court. That order restrained the defendants from interfering with the party-wall without first putting themselves in order by giving a building-owner's notice. The defendants forthwith gave the requisite notice, and a difference having arisen, it became necessary to make arrangements for arbitration. But, in consequence of difficulties which occurred, the period of six months from the giving of the notice elapsed before any award was made. It is said that the result of this is that the defendants are bound to begin the necessary proceedings under the Act all over again. It would be very hard if all the expense incurred by the defendants in the previous proceedings had to be thrown away, and we must look at section 90, sub-section 4, of the London Building Act, 1894, to see whether the law requires that this should be so. The sub-section provides that "A party-wall or structure notice shall not be available for the exercise of any right unless the work to which the notice relates is begun within six months after the service thereof and is prosecuted with due diligence." In my opinion that applies to cases where no difference arises between the building owner and the adjoining owner with regard to the notice, and where the adjoining owner consents to the notice. There is another section, viz., section 91, which applies to cases where differences do arise, and it provides for the appointment of arbitrators to settle the differences. This is a case under section 91, and, in my opinion, the limitation of time mentioned in section 90 does not apply.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor to the plaintiff, W. Stubbs.

Solicitors to the defendants, Mackrell, Maton, Godlee, & Quincey.

From P. D. & Ad. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — March 15, 18.

"THE MILLWALL." (a.)

Practice—Appeal—Co-defendant made third party—Right to appeal from judgment for plaintiff against co-defendant—Contract—Damages—Indemnity—Costs—Reasonably defending action.

The plaintiffs loaded goods on board a barge belonging to one of the defendants for conveyance to a steamer. The barge-owners employed a tug belonging to the other defendants on their own account, and not on behalf of the plaintiffs, upon the following terms: "Gaselee & Son" (the tug-owners) "hereby give notice that they will not be answerable for any loss or damage which may happen to, or be occasioned by, any barge or vessel, or its cargo, while in tow, however such loss or damage may arise, and from whosesoever fault or default such loss or damage may arise; and the services of their tugs must be understood and agreed to be engaged or accepted upon the terms that they are to be held harmless and indemnified from any such loss or damage, and against the faults or defaults of their servants or any claim therefor by whomsoever made. And the customers of the said Gaselee & Son undertake and agree to bear, satisfy, and indemnify them accordingly." While being towed the barge collided with a vessel at anchor, and her cargo was damaged. The plaintiffs sued both the defendants to recover the damage, and the tug-owners served a third-party notice upon the barge-owners claiming indemnity in respect of any damages and costs which they might have to pay. No order was made under ord. 16, r. 53, as to the mode and extent in or to which the barge-owners should be bound or made liable by the judgment in the action as against the tug-owners. At the trial the tug was held alone to blame for the collision, and judgment was given for the plaintiffs against the tug-owners, and for the barge-owners against the plaintiffs, the plaintiffs to recover from the tug-owners with their damages and costs the costs payable by them to the barge-owners. It was further held that the barge-owners were liable to indemnify the tug-owners against the damages and costs, and also against the tug-owners' costs of the action. The barge-owners appealed (1) against so much of the judgment as held the tug-owners liable to the plaintiffs; and (2) against the judgment holding them liable to indemnify the tug-owners.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, as to the first appeal, that the barge-owners had no right of appeal from the judgment against the tug-owners; and as to the second appeal, (1) that the contract of towage did not relieve the tug-owners from liability for loss or damage to third persons, but only gave them an indemnity from the person employing them in respect of such liability; and (2) that the tug-owners, having reasonably defended the action, were entitled to recover from the barge-owners the costs as well as the damages.

Appeal by the defendants, the owners of The Millwall, from the judgment of Sir Francis Jeune.

The action was brought by Page & Co., the owners of the cargo in the barge Millwall, against Darling Brothers, the owners of the barge Millwall, and Gaselee & Son, the owners of the tug Bee, to recover the damage sustained by their cargo through the negligence of the defendants.

The plaintiffs loaded 572 bags of sulphate of ammonia on board The Millwall for conveyance to a steamer loading in a dock in the Thames, and instructed Darling Brothers to employ a tug to tow the barge, as time pressed, and to debit their account. Darling Brothers accordingly ordered a tug from Gaselee & Son; and on the 21st of January The Millwall, while in tow of the tug Bee, came into collision with a barge at anchor and made so much water that the cargo was seriously damaged. The charge for the carriage of the cargo, apart from the charge for the tug, was 1s. 6d. a ton. The plaintiffs, besides claiming on the ground of negligence, also sought to recover their damage against Darling Brothers under a contract by which Darling Brothers undertook to carry the cargo safely.

The defendants, the owners of The Millwall, denied that they had been negligent, or that they had failed to carry the cargo safely. In the alternative they alleged that the cargo was carried on the terms established by the course of business and dealing between the parties—viz., that Darling Brothers should not be liable for any loss of or damage to the cargo, which could be, or in fact was, covered by insurance, whether such loss or damage did or did not arise from the negligence of Darling Brothers, or their servants, or agents, and on the terms that the plaintiffs should insure against loss of or damage to the goods, and that the underwriters should in no case have recourse against Darling Brothers, and that in pursuance of the arrangement the plaintiffs did insure the cargo, and had been paid by the underwriters. The owners of the tug put in a defence denying negligence. The owners of the tug delivered their defence on the 14th of June, 1904; and on the following day they served the defendants Darling Brothers with a third-party notice, claiming that they were entitled to be indemnified by Darling Brothers against any sum which the plaintiffs might recover from the tug-owners for damages and costs, and against the costs of defending the action and of the third-party proceedings, upon the ground that the towage of The Millwall was upon their usual terms (as stated on their billheads and notepaper)—viz.: "Gaselee & Son hereby give notice that they will not be answerable for any loss or damage which may happen to, or be occasioned by, any barge or vessel, or its cargo, while in tow, however such loss or damage may arise and from whosesoever fault or default such loss or damage may arise; and the services of their tugs must be understood and agreed to be engaged or accepted upon the terms that they are to be held harmless and indemnified from any such loss or damage, and against the faults or defaults of their servants or any claim therefor by whomsoever made. And the customers of the said Gaselee & Son undertake and agree to bear, satisfy, and indemnify them accordingly." Darling Brothers, in their defence to the claim by Gaselee & Son for indemnity, pleaded, so far as material, that if the tug was employed upon the terms alleged, she was employed at the verbal request and on account and at the expense of the plaintiffs, who were well aware of Gaselee & Son's terms of towage. It was admitted that Darling Brothers had notice of the above-mentioned terms of Gaselee & Son. No order was made under ord. 16, r. 53, as to the mode or extent in or to which Darling Brothers should be bound or made liable by the judgment in the action as against Gaselee & Son.

At the trial of the action Sir Francis Jeune held that the barge Millwall was not to blame for the collision, and that the cargo was damaged by the negligence of the tug. He accordingly held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the damage sustained by them from the tug-owners; and he dismissed the action against the owners of The Millwall, the plaintiffs to pay The Millwall's costs, and he held that the plaintiffs could recover from the tug-owners, with their damage and costs, the costs payable by them to the owners of The Millwall. The claim for indemnity by the tug-owners as against the owners of The Millwall was then argued; and Sir Francis Jeune held that the contract to employ the tug was not made by the owners of The Millwall as agents for the plaintiffs, but was made by them as an independent contract, and that, therefore, there was no privity of contract between the plaintiffs and the tug-owners so as to bind the plaintiffs by the tug-owners' conditions; and upon the construction of the clause set out above he held that a right of indemnity existed, and that the owners of The Millwall were liable to pay to the tug-owners, who had reasonably, though, as it turned out, wrongly, defended the action, all the damages and costs which the plaintiffs would recover from the tug-owners, and also the tug-owners' costs in the action.

The tug-owners appealed against the judgment holding them liable to the plaintiffs; and the owners of The Millwall appealed both against so much of the judgment as pronounced the tug-owners liable to the plaintiffs, and also against the judgment holding them liable to indemnify the tug-owners. The tug-owners subsequently withdrew their appeal. Neither the damages nor the costs in any of the proceedings were actually paid, execution having been stayed pending the appeals.

Upon the appeal by the owners of The Millwall against that part of the judgment holding the tug-owners liable to the plaintiffs coming on for hearing,

March 15.—Scrutton, K.C., and A. D. Bateson, for the plaintiffs, took the preliminary objection that, as the owners of The Millwall had succeeded against the plaintiffs in the court below, they had no right of appeal. They could not appeal against a judgment in their favour. The tug-owners, who were unsuccessful in the court below, alone could appeal against the judgment, and they had withdrawn their appeal. The doctrine of subrogation does not assist the owners of The Millwall. They can only be subrogated to such rights as the tug-owners have, and as the latter have withdrawn their appeal, that right has gone, and the owners of The Millwall cannot be subrogated to it. Further, there cannot in any court be any subrogation until payment, which has not occurred here. The appeal, therefore, is not competent: West of England Fire Insurance Co. v. Isaacs, [1897] 1 Q. B. 226, 45 W. R. Dig. 74.

Carver, K.C., and F. Laing, K.C. (R. H. Ballock with them), for the owners of The Millwall.—The tug-owners have served a third-party notice under ord. 16, rr. 48, 55, claiming indemnity from the owners of The Millwall, and the latter may perhaps be, though it is not admitted that they are, bound by the judgment against the tug-owners. They are entitled to appeal against that judgment, as their rights may be prejudicially affected by it. Section 19 of the Judicature Act, 1873, taken in conjunction with ord. 58, r. 1, gives a right of appeal. It is not contended that a right of appeal can be based upon the doctrine of subrogation.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is a preliminary objection taken by the plaintiffs to this appeal. The action arises in this way. The plaintiffs were the owners of cargo loaded in a barge called The Millwall for conveyance to a ship which was being loaded in a dock in the Thames. While The Millwall was being towed by a tug she came into collision with a barge at anchor, and the cargo on board The Millwall was damaged. The plaintiffs brought an action against both the owners of The Millwall and the owners of the tug to recover the damage to the cargo, and the learned President held that the tug was to blame and not The Millwall. He accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiffs as against the tug-owners, and for the owners of The Millwall as against the plaintiffs, and he ordered that the plaintiffs should pay costs to the owners of The Millwall, and that the plaintiffs should recover the costs so paid from the tug-owners. From that judgment the tug-owners gave notice of appeal; but that appeal was withdrawn. There is therefore no appeal by the tug-owners from the judgment in favour of the plaintiffs. After that matter had been disposed of, the claim by the tug-owners for indemnity from the owners of The Millwall came on for hearing, the plaintiffs not being present at, and not being concerned in, that inquiry; and the learned President held that the owners of The Millwall were bound to indemnify the tug-owners, and he accordingly ordered them to pay to the tug-owners all the damages and costs which the plaintiffs would recover from the tug-owners and also the tug-owners' own costs. The owners of The Millwall have given notice of appeal against so much of the judgment as pronounced in favour of the plaintiffs' claim against the tug-owners and also against the judgment holding them liable to indemnify the tug-owners. By that notice of appeal they therefore seek to question the judgment as between the plaintiffs and the tug-owners. It is objected on the part of the plaintiffs that that is not an appeal which the owners of The Millwall are entitled to bring, it being a judgment between other parties, and that the owners of The Millwall cannot appeal against that judgment unless they are subrogated to the rights of the tug-owners who are parties to the judgment. The owners of The Millwall are obviously not parties to the judgment in favour of the plaintiffs as against the tug-owners, and they are not subrogated to any rights of the tug-owners under which they can appeal from the judgment. They can only take the rights which the person to whom they are subrogated have; and inasmuch as the tug-owners have abandoned their right of appeal, it is impossible to subrogate the owners of The Millwall to a right of appeal which has been abandoned. Counsel for the appellants indeed admitted that; and they rested the right of appeal upon the rules as to third-party procedure. But when one comes to examine those rules it seems to me that no proceeding has been taken and no directions have been given by the court which have the effect of putting the owners of The Millwall in a position to question the judgment in favour of the plaintiffs as against the tug-owners. Ord. 16, r. 53, is the rule dealing with the matter, and that rule provides that "the court or a judge, upon the hearing of the application mentioned in rule 52"—that is a rule providing for directions as to the trial of the liability of the third party to make the contribution or indemnity claimed—"may, if it shall appear desirable to do so, give the third party liberty to defend the action upon such terms as may be just, or to appear at the trial and take such part therein as may be just, and generally may order such proceedings to be taken, documents to be delivered, or amendments to be made, and give such directions as to the court or judge shall appear proper for having the question most conveniently determined, and as to the mode and extent in or to which the third party shall be bound or made liable by the judgment in the action." Now no order has been asked for or made determining that the third parties—the owners of The Millwall—are to be bound by the judgment in the action as between the plaintiffs and the tug-owners. Therefore, so far as I know, it may be, though I desire to express no opinion upon the point, that there is nothing binding the owners of The Millwall by the judgment between the plaintiffs and the tug-owners, and it is clear that there is no provision made in that rule or in any other rule whereby the owners of The Millwall are substituted as defendants for the tug-owners so as to give them a right of appeal in their own name. Counsel could not point to any order giving them any special rights in the matter. The owners of The Millwall, therefore, have no right of appeal, either under the principle of subrogation or under the provisions of the rules, against the judgment between the plaintiffs and tug-owners. The appeal, so far as it affects the plaintiffs, must be dismissed with costs.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and have nothing to add.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me to be clear under the rules that the mere bringing in of a third party does not, apart from a subsequent order, make the judgment in the action binding upon him, because by ord. 16, r. 53, the court or a judge, upon the hearing of an application for directions, can make an order as to the mode and extent in or to which the third parties shall be bound or made liable by the judgment in the action. That conclusion is strengthened by ord. 16, r. 55, which is the particular rule under which the third-party notice was served in the present case, for under that rule one defendant may claim contribution or indemnity from any other defendant, and the same procedure is to be adopted as in other cases, "but nothing herein contained shall prejudice the rights of the plaintiff against any defendant in the action." One of the rights of the plaintiffs as against the tug-owners is contained in a judgment against the latter which is not appealed from, and the present appeal by the third parties is directly in the teeth of the words at the end of rule 55, to which I have referred. No order has been made enabling the owners of The Millwall to defend the action as between the plaintiffs and the tug-owners. There is a lis between the plaintiffs and the owners of The Millwall, in which the owners of The Millwall were successful. There is another lis between the plaintiffs and the tug-owners, in which the plaintiffs were successful. We are asked to say that the owners of The Millwall have some right of appeal against the judgment in the second lis. There is nothing in the Judicature Act or the rules giving such a right. I think that the limits to which the right of appeal extend in the exceptional cases dealt with in order 16 are shown by the judgment of Cotton, L.J., in In re Youngs, 30 Ch. D. 421, at p. 426, where he says that "there is no power to give to a person who could not be made a party to the action leave to appeal against the judgment." If the owners of The Millwall had obtained an order allowing them to defend the action as against the tug-owners, then very possibly they might have appealed against the judgment. They cannot do so now.

March 17.—Carver, K.C., and F. Laing, K.C. (R. H. Balloch with them), for the owners of The Millwall.—The tug-owners are not liable to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs directed the owners of The Millwall to employ a tug to tow the barge, and when the latter employed the tug they did so as agents for the plaintiffs. There was therefore privity of contract between the plaintiffs and the tug-owners, and the provisions of the contract made by the owners of The Millwall and the tugowners bound the plaintiffs. Even if there was no privity of contract, inasmuch as the plaintiffs directed the owners of The Millwall to employ a tug, they must be taken to have directed them to do so upon the usual terms. The usual terms, and, indeed, the only terms upon which a tug could have been employed, were the terms upon which Gaselee & Son agreed to tow. It is impossible to say that the tug-owners were liable to the plaintiffs for negligence when they only accepted the towage upon the terms that they were not to be liable for negligence. Delaurier v. Wyllie, 17 R. 167, is in point. Illustrations of the same principle are afforded by Hall v. North-Eastern Railway Co., 23 W. R. 860, L. R. 10, Q. B. 439; Singer Manufacturing Co. v. London and South-Western Railway Co., 42 W. R. 347, [1894] 1 Q. B. 833; and Keene v. Thomas, ante, p. 336, [1905] 1 K. B. 136. Secondly, if the tug-owners were liable to the plaintiffs, they have no right of indemnity over. Underwriters who agreed that if their assured became liable to pay and paid as damages for running down any other ship any sum not exceeding the value of the vessel insured, they would repay to the assured a certain proportion of that sum, were held in Xenos v. Fox, 16 W. R. 1053, L. R. 3 C. P. 630, 17 W. R. 893, L. R. 4 C. P. 665, not liable to pay any portion of the costs which the assured incurred in successfully defending an action of collision brought against him. The indemnity clause here only covers "such loss or damage"—that is, loss or damage to the cargo. There is no contract to indemnify the tug-owners against costs. The judgment is therefore wrong.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and Bailhache, for the tug-owners.—The clause in question does not affect the cargo-owners. It is only operative as between the tug-owners and the barge-owners. It is because the tug-owners have come under an obligation to third persons, whether cargo-owners or others, that the indemnity clause is required. The clause assumes such a liability and gave an indemnity in respect thereof. Therefore the tug-owners had no defence under the clause to the action by the plaintiffs. There being no privity of contract between the tug-owners and the cargo-owners, the latter had a good cause of action against the former. Secondly, the cause covers the costs of reasonably defending the action: Hammond v. Bussey, 20 Q. B. D. 79, 36 W. R. Dig. 65. The tug-owners, by giving the barge-owners a third-party notice, gave them an opportunity of protecting their interests, either by taking over the defence of the action, or by giving the tug-owners notice not to defend, and that if they did defend they would do so at their own risk. The barge-owners did not do this. The costs are therefore recoverable.

Carver, K.C., in reply.—The first part of the clause is quite general, and is independent of the second part, which gives the indemnity.

March 18.—COLLINS, M.R.—This is a dispute between the barge-owners and the tug-owners, and that dispute turns upon the contract of towage made between them. It is contended by the tug-owners that the effect of that contract is to shift all responsibility for the damage done to the cargo from them on to the barge-owners. The learned President, taking that view, held that the contract had the effect of shifting from the tug-owners to the barge-owners the entire liability for the damage to the cargo. That was a decision most unwelcome to the barge-owners, who had been acquitted of all blame in the matter, whereas the tug-owers had been held alone to blame, and they were naturally startled at the result. The question, however, arises upon the agreement which the barge-owners made with the tug-owners. It seems to me that that agreement presents no real difficulty. It seems to be clear that, upon the terms of that agreement, the liability for any loss or damage is taken from the tug-owners and placed on the barge-owners. Now comes this question. The barge-owners, being in that disagreeable predicament, sought to force the plaintiffs to discuss with them whether that part of the original judgment which held the tug-owners liable to pay to the plaintiffs the amount of the damage done to the cargo was right, and for that purpose they gave notice of appeal from that judgment. The tug-owners had given notice of appeal against that judgment, but they withdrew that notice. We held a few days ago that the barge-owners had not put themselves in the position of the tug-owners so as to entitle them to contest that decision. The barge-owners now contend that that judgment against the tug-owners is not binding upon them, and they seek to show that it is wrong upon the ground that the tug-owners, as between themselves and the plaintiffs, are exempt from liability for negligence. It may be that that judgment is not binding upon the barge-owners, and that they are entitled to show that it is wrong, and that the tug-owners ought not to have been held liable at all. I do not decide that it is open to the barge-owners to contest that judgment upon a collateral issue. I will assume that they are entitled to do so for the purposes of the present argument.

I now come to the terms of the contract upon which the tug-owners undertook to tow the barge. Mr. Carver first of all contends that, in the circumstances under which that document came into existence, it established privity of contract between the plaintiffs and the tug-owners, and that therefore the tug-owners were relieved of all liability to the plaintiffs. That is a question of fact, depending upon the circumstances in which the engagement of the tug was made. The learned President came to the conclusion that privity of contract had not been established between the plaintiffs and the tug-owners, and that the barge-owners made the contract directly with the tug-owners on their own behalf. It is not necessary to refer to the evidence upon that part of the case. I see no reason for differing from the conclusion arrived at by the learned President. I think that he arrived at the fair meaning of the arrangement between the parties. Therefore I start with this, that the document did not create privity of contract between the plaintiffs and the tug-owners. Upon the hypothesis that privity of contract is not established, Mr. Carver's next contention is that the true effect of the document is to relieve the tug-owners from all liability for loss or damage in respect of the carriage of the cargo—in other words, that the cargo was carried at owners' risk. In my opinion, upon the construction of this document, it does not amount to a contract to carry the cargo at owners' risk. It presupposes a liability to some one on the part of the tug-owners, and it secures an indemnity to them. It is a contract of indemnity against a liability which the tug-owners require to be indemnified against. Mr. Carver contended that the first part of the document stands alone, and is perfectly general in its terms, and amounts to a declaration that the goods are to be carried at owners' risk. The answer to that contention is that the document does not stop there. The whole document is a contract of indemnity to the tug-owners against "such loss or damage"—that is, the loss or damage previously mentioned. The barge-owners, therefore, undertake to indemnify the tug-owners against claims by anyone for damage to vessel or cargo occasioned by, as in the present case, a collision. Therefore the point that there is no liability upon the part of the tug-owners to the plaintiffs fails.

Now comes the further contention that, admitting liability to indemnify the tug-owners, that indemnity must be limited to the damage occasioned to the cargo, and does not include the costs which the tug-owners have been held liable to pay. That raises the question whether, having regard to all the circumstances, the tug-owners in defending the action acted otherwise than reasonably. The case falls within the principle which was laid down long ago, and is now well-established. It was laid down in 1859 in Broom v. Hall, 7 C. B. N. S. 503, 9 W. R. C. L. Dig. 32, the head-note in which case is as follows: "A., a broker, contracted with B. for the purchase (on behalf of C.) of certain goods. C. refusing to accept the goods, B. sued A. for the breach of contract. C. had notice of the proceedings, but repudiated his liability, and A. defended the action unsuccessfully. In an action by A. against C. for damages and costs paid and incurred by him in the first action, C. paid into court enough to cover the damages only, and it was left to the jury to say whether A., in defending the former action, had pursued the course which a prudent and reasonable man would have done in his own case. The jury having found for the plaintiff—held, that A. was entitled to recover the costs." No doubt after that decision one or two cases were decided which did not give full effect to it. One such case was Baxendale v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., 23 W. R. 167, L. R. 10 Ex. 35. But in the subsequent case of Hammond v. Bussey all the cases were considered and full effect was given to the decision in Broom v. Hall. In the present case there was no jury to decide whether the tug-owners acted reasonably in defending the action, but the learned President found that they acted reasonably in defending, and that they had a right of indemnity over for the costs to which they had been put. The evidence that they had acted reasonably is strong. They gave the barge-owners, who were ultimately liable, full notice of the claim, they served a third-party notice upon the barge-owners which gave them full opportunity of intervening and disputing the claim, or of ascertaining the extent of the loss and paying it, and in these circumstances it is not competent for them to throw upon the tug-owners the whole burden of the litigation. The learned President came to the conclusion that the tug-owners did all that they reasonably could in ascertaining whether they were liable to the plaintiffs, and in diminishing the amount of the loss, and that, therefore, they had a right of indemnity over against the barge-owners for the costs to which they were rendered liable in those proceedings. In these circumstances, the barge-owners are liable to repay those costs to the tug-owners. Mr. Carver says that the document does not in terms include the costs, but only the "loss or damage." No doubt that is so, but it is not conclusive of the matter. By reason of the existence of the contract of indemnity which renders the third parties liable in a certain event, there arises, upon the happening of that event, the question whether the tug-owners, in whose favour the indemnity is given, have acted reasonably in contesting the claim made against them. The contract of indemnity gives the third parties an interest in that question, and the third-party procedure gives them full opportunity of meeting or contesting that claim. The liability to pay the costs does not arise directly out of the contract of indemnity, but comes into existence afterwards, and arises out of the conduct of the parties after the contract of indemnity is come into operation and a claim has been made which gives rise to a right of indemnity under the contract. Sometimes a provision for the payment of the costs is introduced into the contract of indemnity itself, but it does not follow that where it is not so introduced the right to indemnity against those costs is excluded. For these reasons the judgment of the learned President was right and the appeal must be dismissed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with the Master of the Rolls that upon the facts no privity of contract has been established between the plaintiffs and the tug-owners, and that the conditions were applicable only as between the tug-owners and the barge-owners. The only point upon which I desire to add anything is upon the question whether, inasmuch as costs are not mentioned in the indemnity contract, the tug-owners can recover from the barge-owners the costs of defending the action brought against them by the plaintiffs. It is well settled in one large class of case that the costs of litigation are recoverable by the person entitled to the indemnity. The class of case to which I refer is that of two trustees being held liable for breach of trust, one of whom is primarily liable, in which case it is well established that the trustee primarily liable is bound not only to make good to his co-trustee the loss incurred, but also the costs to which the co-trustee has been put. That has been decided in Lockhart v. Reilly, 4 W. R. 438, 25 L. J. Ch. 697, and in a very recent case before Warrington, J., of In re Linsley, ante, p. 172, [1904] 2 Ch. 785. In this latter case Warrington, J., held that "a solicitor-trustee, to whom the management of the trust has been left as the acting trustee, is liable to indemnify his co-trustee against the costs of an action caused by his negligent conduct of the trust business, even where no actual loss has been thereby occasioned to the trust estate." That is the principle upon which the learned President proceeded in the present case, and it is no new principle, but one long established.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the plaintiffs, James Ballantyne.

Solicitors for the barge-owners, Keene, Marsland, Bryden, & Bennett.

Solicitors for the tug-owners, J. A. & H. E. Farnfield.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } April 14, 15.
Farwell, J. }

In re GOOD.
HARINGTON v. WATTS. (a.)

Will—Charity—Perpetuity—Gift to officers' mess for upkeep of library.

Gift of residuary estate for upkeep of a mess library held to be a charitable gift within the Statute of Elizabeth (43 Eliz. c. 4). Gift of leasehold houses for old officers of a regiment at a small rent during their life held void for perpetuity.

Income Tax Commissioners v. Pemsel, [1891] A. C. 583, 39 W. R. Dig. 217, discussed and explained.

In re Stratheden, 42 W. R. 647, [1894] 3 Ch. 265, approved.

Originating summons.

Thomas Good, formerly a sergeant in the 14th Regiment (now the 2nd Battalion Prince of Wales' Own West Yorkshires), who died on the 12th of September, 1904, disposed of his property by his will as follows: "I give to the officers' mess of the 2nd Battalion 14th Regiment, my old happy home, all my books and bookcases whatsoever and wheresoever for the use of the officers of the aforesaid mess only and, subject as aforesaid, the whole of my residuary estate and the investments and income thereof in trust for the aforesaid officers' mess absolutely, and I give them the same accordingly to be invested, and the dividend and annual income only, arising therefrom to be paid to the aforesaid officers' mess to maintain the said library and for the renewal of books for ever." It was also provided in the will that, when there was any balance over in any year after providing for the upkeep of the library, such balance should be spent in the purchase of plate for the mess. There was a further devise of "my two houses at Ryde for the use of old officers of the regiment at a small rent during their life." The gross value of the estate was sworn at £7,000 or thereabouts.

By this summons the following questions were asked among others: (1) Whether the bequest of the testator's residuary estate to the officers' mess of the 2nd Battalion West Yorkshire Regiment "the income only therefrom to be paid to maintain a library and renewal of books for ever" was a good charitable trust or otherwise a valid gift, or whether it was void for remoteness. (2) Whether the devise of the two houses at Ryde for the use of old officers of the regiment was a good and valid gift or was void for remoteness.

Crossman, for the defendant Colonel Watts, argued that the bequest of residuary estate was an absolute gift to the individual members of the regimental mess. Being a valid gift it was not affected by the attempt to engraft an invalid trust: Hancock v. Watson, 50 W. R. 321, [1902] A. C. 14.

Upjohn, K.C., and Manning, for the plaintiff, Colonel Harington, argued that a mess was neither a charity nor a perpetuity, but was an organization of the same nature as a club, and could by mutual agreement dispose absolutely of all its property.

R. J. Parker, for the Treasury Solicitor, referred to the Statute of Elizabeth (43 Eliz. c. 4), and argued that any fund for the equipment of the army was within the preamble of that statute, and so was charitable. Further, in the case of Commissioners of Income Tax v. Pemsel, [1891] A. C. 583, 39 W. R. Dig. 217, Lord Macnaghten lays down four heads of charitable gift, one of which is gifts in relief of the national purse. Anything towards the efficiency of the army was pro tanto of national benefit. From the army regulations it was shown that a mess is an integral part of a regiment whose property is dealt with quite independently of its individual volition, and that the government contributes to its equipment. Evidence was given that libraries formed part of the equipment of depots, and that it had been considered whether they should be provided in regimental messes also. A saving of public expense was not necessary to make charitable any gift which was for the benefit of the public. In In re Stratheden, 42 W. R. 647, [1894] 3 Ch. 265, a gift to a volunteer corps was held to be charitable, while in In re Stephens, W. N. 1892, p. 140, a fund to provide a shooting prize in perpetuity was similarly upheld.

Jenkins, K.C. (Method with him), for the Official Solicitor on behalf of the next-of-kin, argued that the gift was void. If the nation as a whole did not benefit by this, then the case fell within Carne v. Lang, 2 De G. & J. 75, where a gift to a library not benefiting the whole public was held not charitable. A mess library was only a private benefit to the officers concerned, whose pockets it relieved, and though it might increase the efficiency of the officers, was no more a charity than a gift to maintain a polo stable: Newland v. Attorney-General, 3 Mer. 684; Nightingale v. Goulbourn, 5 Ha. 484; In re Macduff, 45 W. R. 154, [1896] 2 Ch. 466, where Lord Lindley said that everything that came within the four heads enumerated by Lord Macnaghten in Pemsel's case was not necessarily charitable.

FARWELL, J., gave judgment as follows: I think it is plain from the affidavit of the Assistant Adjutant-General that the mess is an integral portion of the regiment, and not a mere club as has been suggested, and in my opinion this gift is not a gift to officers individually, but is a gift to the mess for the time being.

The real question is whether a gift to the mess, of a fund, the income of which is a perpetuity to keep up a library for the officers' mess of the regiment, is a charitable gift within the Statute of Elizabeth. I think that probably everyone would agree with Lord Lindley's criticism of Lord Macnaghten's judgment, that he did not intend to say that every object of public utility is necessarily a good charity, but there is no doubt that many objects are charitable because they are of public utility. Some objects of public utility are charitable, though not all, and the question is whether, within the purview of the Statute of Elizabeth, a particular object is or is not a charity.

Now Mr. Parker has put his argument on two grounds: (1) that anything that assists the efficiency of the army is charitable within the meaning of the Act because it is for a public purpose—a purpose in which the public are interested; (2) he says that it would also come within the last clause of the preamble of the Statute of Elizabeth: "The aid and ease of any poor inhabitants concerning payment of fifteenths, the settinge out of souldiers, and other taxes," because it would relieve the taxation in so far as it is applied to the maintenance of the officers' mess. The difficulty of applying the second portion of that is that, at present, at any rate, looking at the regulations I have before me, there is no provision made for payment by the Government in aid of the library of the mess, although the Government does make allowances in aid of the supply of other things to the mess, such as hardware and furniture.

I have come to the conclusion, after some doubt, as one always must have in these cases which are very near the line, that this is a charitable gift on the first ground, namely, that it is directly a public benefit by increasing the efficiency of the army in which the public is interested, not only financially, but also for the safety and protection of the country.

(a.) Reported by C. H. CARDEN NOAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

I am disposed to think that it might be supported on the second ground on the Assistant Adjutant-General's affidavit, which states that part of the mess equipment in divers regiments already consists of a library and that it has been already considered by the military authorities whether a library should not be made part of the necessary equipment of every officers' mess on the ground that it is conducive to military efficiency. But I prefer to put it on the first ground argued by Mr. Parker, because that appears to me to come within the principle on which the court has acted in applying this very difficult question of the Statute of Elizabeth. I am not, of course, suggesting that the officers are objects of charity. It is the public, not the officers, who get the benefit, by the better means placed at their disposal to make themselves efficient servants of the king for the defence of their country. On that ground I think it may be upheld.

I may say that Kekewich, J., has held that a prize for shooting is a good charitable gift, and Romer, J., also considered that a gift to a volunteer corps was a good charity. I think it would be difficult to say that money to be expended in terms in some specific way in order to increase the efficiency of the regiment in a particular mode would not be a good charity. This, to my mind, does increase the efficiency of the army by giving the officers greater opportunities of providing themselves with literature. I must assume that the books bought will be books of merit, and, after all, so long as they are books of merit, they need not necessarily be confined to military literature. I should be sorry to hold that any gift which tends to increase educational equipment is not a charitable gift. I declare that the gift of the residuary estate is a good charitable gift.

As to the two houses at Ryde, it seems to me that this gift fails altogether. After giving the whole of his residuary estate the testator goes on to say, "As to my two houses at Ryde, to the use of old officers of the regiment at a small rent during their life." Is it part of residue falling in that way? If so the trust fails. If it is not a part then the houses are not disposed of except by this trust. I think he meant this to be a separate trust, and as this fails for perpetuity there is an intestacy as to these houses.

Solicitors, C. E. Beal, for T. Robinson; The Official Solicitor; The Treasury Solicitor.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy and Ridley, JJ.) April 12.

SMITH v. SAVAGE. (a.)

Adulteration—Food and drugs—Sample purchased for analysis—Purchase of four packets of an article—Contents of packets mixed together and then divided—Compliance with requirement of Act—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), ss. 6, 14.

The appellant, an inspector under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, purchased four penny packets from the respondent, a grocer, labelled "Finest cream of tartar; 98 per cent. bi-carbonate of potassium. B.P. 1898." The packets, which were all similar in size, appearance, and label, were taken by the respondent from the same box. The appellant having emptied out the contents of the four packets and mixed them together, divided them into three parts, sealed them up, and sent one of the sealed packets to the county analyst, who certified that the sample contained lead. At the hearing of an information preferred by the appellant against the respondent, laid under section 14 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, the respondent raised the objection that the appellant had made four separate purchases, as each packet was an article, and that by mixing together the contents of the four packets and then dividing the substance so mixed into three parts the requirements of section 14 had not been complied with. The justices dismissed the information. The inspector appealed.

Held, allowing the appeal, that the objection taken by the respondent was not a good objection.

Mason v. Cowdray, 49 W. R. 28, [1900] 2 Q. B. 419, distinguished.

Case stated by the justices of Wilts.

At a court of summary jurisdiction at Hungerford the respondent, a grocer, was charged by the appellant, an inspector under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, that he did unlawfully sell to the appellant to his prejudice as the purchaser, a certain drug, to wit, four penny packets of cream of tartar, not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded, such cream of tartar containing lead in the proportion of three-fourths of a grain per pound contrary to section 6 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1875

The case stated that on the 9th of August, 1904, the appellant visited the respondent's shop and saw the respondent, who, in reply to a question, said he sold cream of tartar and produced a box of packets labelled "Finest cream of tartar; 98 per cent. bi-carbonate of potassium. B.P. 1898." The appellant asked for four packets, and was supplied with four, which were all similar in size, appearance, and label, and were taken from the same box. He paid fourpence for them, and told the respondent that the purchase was for analysis. The appellant emptied the contents of the packets into one place, and then divided the whole of the contents into three parts for analysis and sealed them up and sent one of the three to the county analyst, who certified that the sample contained lead in the proportions mentioned.

At the hearing before the justices the respondent raised the following points: That the appellant made four separate purchases, each packet being an "article," and that the appellant did not, by mixing together the contents of the four packets and then dividing the substance so mixed into three parts, comply with section 14 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, and in support of this contention he cited Mason v. Cowdray, 49 W. R. 28, [1900] 2 Q. B. 419.

The appellant submitted that as one packet was too small to be dealt with by the analyst, and in order to get a sufficient quantity to analyze he had to buy four packets, and that in the circumstances the requirements of section 14 had been properly complied with, as the entire purchase had been duly divided into three parts as directed, and that Mason v. Cowdary was distinguishable, as in that case there was no mixing, and therefore not a proper division of the entire purchase.

The justices upheld the objection, and dismissed the information.

The inspector appealed.

Holman Gregory, for the appellant.

H. D. Bonsey, for the respondent.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In my opinion this appeal must be allowed. It was contended by the respondent, and the justices upheld that contention, that the requirements of section 14 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, had not in this case been complied with, because each packet was an "article," and the section directs that the "article" purchased shall be divided into three parts. It seems to me that there was only one purchase here, as the appellant asked for four packets of cream of tartar, and the fact that the article asked for was kept by the seller done up in penny packets for the convenience of measurement does not alter the case. In Mason v. Cowdary six bottles of camphorated oil were bought for analysis. There was no mixing of the contents of the different bottles, but two bottles were sent to the analyst, two given back to the seller, and two retained by the inspector. Darling, J., who tried the case, held that as the oil might be of quite different quality in the different bottles there was not such a division of the article purchased as complied with the statute. Here the contents of the packets, however, were all mixed together and then divided. The case must go back to the justices to proceed in the matter, as the objection taken, in my opinion, is not a good objection.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

KENNEDY and RIDLEY, JJ., concurred.

Case remitted accordingly.

Solicitor for the appellant, H. Bevir, Wootton Bassett.

Solicitors for the respondent, Neve, Beck, & Kirby.

K. B. Div. (Phillimore, J.) Jan. 18.

MYLAM v. MARKET HARBOROUGH ADVERTISER CO. (a.)

Inland revenue—Income tax—Exemption—Company—Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 163 —Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 34.

A company incorporated under the Companies Act is not entitled to claim exemption from income tax under section 163 of the Income Tax Act, 1842, and section 34 of the Finance Act, 1894, on the ground that its aggregate annual income does not exceed £160.

Case stated by the Commissioners of Income Tax.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether a limited company was entitled to exemption from income tax under section 163 of the Income Tax Act, 1842, as amended by section 34 of the Finance Act, 1894, on the ground that its annual profits did not exceed £160. It appeared from the case that the Market Harborough company was a limited company with a capital of £2,000, in 2,000 shares of £1 each, which had been fully subscribed and paid up. The articles of association provided that Table A of the Companies Act, 1862, should apply to the company except as thereinafter provided by clause 4 of the articles, that at the discretion of the directors part of the profits might be set aside for reserve fund. Such reserve fund was to be applicable towards meeting bad debts, providing for extraordinary expenditure, equalization of dividends, and other purposes to which the company's funds were properly applicable.

The following regulations (inter alia) of Table A applied:

72. "The directors may, with the sanction of the shareholders in public meeting, declare that a dividend out of the profits of the company be paid to members in proportion to their share."

73. "No dividend shall be payable except out of the profits arising from the business of the company."

The company's gross profit for the year ending the 31st of March, 1903, was £280 17s. 2½d., which being added to the balance in hand of £8 14s. 2½d. made a total of £289 11s. 5d. From this amount £50 was deducted for depreciation; £25 was placed to reserve fund; £100 was expended in paying a dividend to the shareholders of 5 per cent.; £15 was paid to the directors for their services during the year; and a balance of £99 11s. 5d. was carried forward.

It was admitted on behalf of the company that it was proposed to deal with the profits for the year ending the 31st of March, 1904, as in former years, by writing off a sum for depreciation, placing a sum to reserve, paying a dividend to the shareholders, making a payment to the directors for their services, and carrying forward a balance to the next account.

On behalf of the company it was contended: (a) That on the proper construction of the interpretation clause, section 192, of the Income Tax Act, 1842, the company being a body politic, was by the operation of that clause deemed to be a person, and consequently was entitled to the exemption conferred by section 163 of the Act, it being immaterial to the point whether the company paid dividends or not, as those shareholders who were individually liable to the tax would have to include any dividends received by them free of tax, in their own returns; (b) that taxing Acts being in the nature of penal ones must be strictly construed, and persons coming within the exemption clauses were entitled to take advantage thereof whether the result was contemplated at the time the Act came into operation or not.

The commissioners decided in favour of the company, but stated this case. The question for the opinion of the court was whether the commissioners were right in deciding that the company were entitled to exemption.

By section 163 of the Income Tax Act, 1842: "Any person chargeable to the duties granted by this Act either by assessment or by way of deduction from any rent, annuity, interest, or other annual payment to which he may be entitled who shall prove before the commissioners for general purposes, in the manner hereinafter mentioned, that the aggregate annual amount of his income, estimated according to the several rules and directions of this Act,"—does not exceed £160, see Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 34—"shall be exempted from the said duties, and shall be entitled to be repaid the amount of all deductions or payments on account thereof in the manner hereinafter directed except so much of such duties as the person claiming such exemption shall or may be entitled to charge against any other person or to deduct or retain from or out of any payment to which any such claimant may be or become liable."

Sir E. Carson, S.G. (Rowlatt with him), for the Inland Revenue.—The company is not entitled to exemption, first, because it is not a person within the meaning of the Act, and second, because the company is not taxed here at all, but the individual shareholders. The case of Inland Revenue v. Old Monkland Conservative Association, 42 Sc. L. R. 12, is not in point.

The company was not represented.

PHILLIMORE, J.—In this case I have to decide whether the commissioners were right in exempting this company from income tax in respect of its revenue on the ground that the annual amount of its aggregate income does not exceed £160. I think that the commissioners were wrong, and that this appeal must be allowed. I do not, however, decide this case on the ground that the word "person" in section 163 of the Income Tax Act excludes a corporation. That question may have to be decided some day; for the present purpose I shall assume that it does not exclude a corporation. But the exemption in section 163 is carefully conditioned, and there is excepted from its operation so much of the duties as the person claiming exemption from duties shall be entitled to deduct or retain from or out of any payment to which the claimant for exemption may be liable. Now, under section 54 a corporate body must estimate the profits and gains to be charged upon it; and that estimate is to be made upon the amount of its annual profits and gains before any dividends shall have been paid thereout to any other persons having any share in such profits and gains, and all such persons shall allow out of such dividends a proportionate deduction in respect of the duty so charged. Thus the corporation is bound to make a return showing an estimate of what will be the amount of its profits, and then in paying the dividends to its shareholders it may deduct from each recipient his quota of the amount estimated as payable in respect of the tax. It follows that there is no ground for exemption. The corporation itself is not taxed; it loses nothing because it deducts from its shareholders the amount it pays for the tax. Thus the exception to the exemption applies in terms to the corporation itself. If the individual shareholders are exempt, they can recover by the ordinary and well-known process. I have considered the case of Inland Revenue v. Old Monkland Association, but that case is not in point. The claimants there were an unincorporated body, and, moreover, the assessment was not made upon profits divisible among the members, but upon house property not let upon lease, and was made under Schedule A. I express no opinion as to what may be the result in case an unincorporated body claims exemption under section 163.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor, Solicitor to Inland Revenue.

K. B. Div. (Phillimore, J.) Dec. 20.

KEMP v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE. (a.)

Inland Revenue—Stamp duty—Conveyance of property—Land Transfer Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 65), s. 3—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 62.

An assent in writing made under the hand but not under the seal of an executor to a devise of real estate by his testator, pursuant to section 3, sub-section 1, of the Land Transfer Act, 1897, is not liable to duty as a conveyance or transfer, as being within the meaning of section 62 of the Stamp Act, 1891, "an instrument whereby any property on any occasion, except a sale or mortgage, is transferred to or vested in any person."

Case stated.

This was a case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue as to the stamp duty chargeable upon an assent in writing by an executor to a devise of real estate. The instrument in question was in the following terms:

"Whereas, by an indenture dated the 15th of September, 1888, and made between Elizabeth Kemp, of . . . , spinster, of the one part, and Arthur Joslen, of . . . , of the other part, the hereditaments and premises hereinafter described were (inter alia) conveyed by the said Elizabeth Kemp to the said Arthur Joslen by way of mortgage to secure the sum of £100 and interest. And whereas the said Elizabeth Kemp, by her will, dated the 10th day of November, 1903, devised the said hereditaments unto her nephew Alfred Kemp, his heirs and assigns, and appointed William Henry Simons, of . . ., executor thereof. And whereas the said Elizabeth Kemp died on the 13th day of November, 1903, without having altered or revoked her said will, possessed of the said hereditaments hereinafter described, for an inheritance thereof in fee simple, subject to the hereinbefore recited indenture of mortgage, which will was duly proved by the said executor on the 30th of November, 1903, in the Principal Registry of the Probate Division of the High Court of Justice. And whereas the said William Henry Simons has paid the funeral and testamentary expenses of the said Elizabeth Kemp, and all her debts of which he has had notice, now he, the said William Henry Simons, as personal representative of the said Elizabeth Kemp, deceased, hereby signifies his assent to the devise by the said testatrix to the said Alfred Kemp of all that messuage, house, and premises known as . . . now in the occupation of . . . subject to the said indenture of mortgage of the 15th day of September, 1888, and to the principal money and interest thereby secured, so far as the same relates to the said hereditaments and premises above described, and also subject to a charge thereon for all moneys (if any) which the personal representative of the said Elizabeth Kemp is liable to pay. As witness the hand of the said William Henry Simons this 14th day of April, 1904."

The object of the signature to the instrument by Simons was to give a good title to the hereditaments and premises mentioned in favour of Alfred Kemp, subject to the mortgage thereof, and the instrument was for that purpose handed to the mortgagee, in whose custody the title-deeds were.

Simons, in signing and handing over the document, purported to be acting under the provisions of section 3 of the Land Transfer Act, 1897.

The commissioners being of opinion that the instrument was an instrument whereby property on an occasion other than a sale or a mortgage was transferred to or vested in Alfred Kemp within the meaning of section 62 of the Stamp Act, 1891, assessed it as liable to the fixed duty of 10s. as upon a "conveyance or transfer not thereinbefore described" within the meaning of that heading in the first schedule to the Act. The questions for the opinion of the court were (1) whether the instrument was liable to duty as assessed; (2) if not, to what duty (if any) it was liable.

By the Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 62: "Every instrument and every decree or order of any court or any commissioners whereby any property on any occasion except a sale or mortgage is transferred to or vested in any person, is to be charged with duty as a conveyance or transfer of property. . . ." By the first schedule a duty of 10s. is imposed upon "every conveyance or transfer of any kind not hereinbefore described."

By the Land Transfer Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 65), s. 3, sub-section 1: "At any time after the death of the owner of any land his personal representatives may assent to any devise contained in his will, or may convey the land to any person entitled thereto as heir, devisee, or otherwise, and may make the assent or conveyance either subject to a charge for the payment of any money which the personal representatives are liable to pay, or without any such charge; and on such assent or conveyance, subject to a charge for all moneys (if any) which the personal representatives are liable to pay, all liabilities of the personal representative in respect of the land shall cease except as to any acts done or contracts entered into by them before such assent or conveyance.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Cozens-Hardy, for the appellant.—This is not a conveyance within the meaning of section 62 of the Stamp Act, 1891. The assent need not be in writing, though it naturally enough usually is. It merely completes the title of the devisee, and does not transfer the property.

He referred to Bythewood's Conveyancing (1829), ii., 641; Hughes' Concise Precedents (1855), vol. 1, 400; and cited the following cases: Paramour v. Yardley, Plowd. 539, (1718) 1 Str. 70; Doe v. Mabberly, 6 C. & P. 126.

Sir R. Finlay, A.G., for the Crown.—The rule of law is that the legal interest in a chattel real is vested in the executor under the will: Williams on Executors, p. 1103. His assent is therefore necessary to the vesting of the legal interest in the devisee, and the assent therefore requires to be stamped as a conveyance under section 62 of the Stamp Act, 1891.

PHILLIMORE, J.—This case has taken some time in argument because I required to be satisfied that the legal estate in a chattel real, which has become vested in an executor by reason of the will of his testator coupled with probate of the will, would pass to the specific legatee or devisee of the chattel real without a formal assignment by deed. The decisions which have been cited by counsel show that the estate can so pass, and that in fact the legatee of a specific term gets the legal estate in the term just as the legatee of a specific chattel gets the ownership of that chattel by the will of the testator. That being the law, it has been the custom of conveyancers sometimes to take an assignment by deed from the executor, sometimes to have a document in writing called an assent signed by the executor, and sometimes to allow the legatee to take possession and rely upon possession and the receipt of the rents and profits, or some other act of the executor in pais as showing assent. In cases where the document of assent is in writing two works of authority—Jarman's edition of Bythewood's Conveyancing and Hughes' Concise Precedents—state that no stamp duty is payable on the instrument, and I understand the Attorney-General to admit that it cannot be shown that the Crown has ever required such assents to be stamped. In that state of the law the Land Transfer Act, 1897, has in section 1 established a real representative, and has provided that upon death the real estate of the deceased shall vest in his personal representative, executor, or administrator, as the case may be, as if it were a chattel real; and by section 3 has provided that at the proper time the personal representative may assent to a devise or may convey to the person entitled. The present case raises the question whether an assent, not being under seal, is liable to stamp duty as a conveyance, as being an instrument whereby property on any occasion except a sale or mortgage is transferred to or vested in any person, and therefore chargeable with a fixed duty of 10s. under section 62 of the Stamp Act, 1891, and the first schedule thereto. It seems clear that the same liability as regards stamp duty must apply to such an assent to a devise of freehold estate as to a devise of chattels real, and that if the assent in the one case is subject to stamp duty it must equally be in the other. I should be loth by my judgment in this case to sanction the view that in every case where assents have been allowed to be executed without a claim for stamp duty a mistake has been made by the authorities; but I think that the burden is upon the Crown to show that the practice which has been adopted by conveyancers of repute, and which has not hitherto been challenged by the Crown, is not correct. I am therefore unwilling to hold that assents in writing to bequests of terms of years require a stamp, and if they do not, neither do assents in writing to devises of real estate. Counsel for the Crown relies on section 62 of the Stamp Act, 1891, and contends that the assent in writing of the executor operates to vest the property in the devisee, but in my view the assent is merely evidence that the executor has no longer any claim upon the property, which really vests under the will of the testator. But even if this be otherwise I think that the true view of section 62 is to read it reddendo singula singulis, and that the verb "transferred" relates to the noun "instrument," and the verb "vested" relates to the "decree or order of any court or of any commissioners."

For these reasons I think this instrument is not liable to stamp duty, and the appellant is entitled to judgment.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for appellant, E. W. Williamson.

Solicitor for the Crown, Solicitor for Inland Revenue.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) — March 27, 28.

LONGMAN v. BATH ELECTRIC TRAMWAYS (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Shares—Certificate—Negligence—Estoppel—Proximate cause of loss—Duty of company.

A certificate is merely primâ facie evidence of the title of the holder to the shares mentioned therein, and the fact that by the negligence of the company a certificate has got into the hands of the wrong person does not create any estoppel against the company so as to preclude their disputing the title of persons who have purchased from such wrongful holder on the faith of the certificate, there being no duty in the company either towards the public at large or towards persons desirous of becoming shareholders to retain the certificate, and the proximate cause of the loss not being the negligence of the company but the wrongful dealing with the certificate by the holder.

This was an appeal from a decision of Farwell, J.

On the 19th of April, 1904, one Bennett became the registered owner of 1,500 shares in the defendant company, and a certificate of his ownership was made out but was not sent to him. On that same day there was presented to the secretary of the company a transfer by Bennett to two persons named Houselander and Madders, who had not executed the transfer at that time. It was presented for the purpose of obtaining a certification, which was given in this form, "Certificate forwarded to the company's office," and was signed by the secretary on behalf of the defendant company.

On the 22nd of April the secretary, under some mistake, sent the certificate to Bennett.

On the 28th of April Houselander and Madders returned the transfer executed by them for registration, and then at a subsequent date in May the plaintiffs made an advance of money to Bennett on the faith of the deposit of the certificate and a blank transfer of the shares. The plaintiffs sent in the transfer to the company for registration. That was not registered, and the shares had gone into the names of Houselander and Madders.

The plaintiffs, who had contracted to sell 250 of the shares, then brought the present action, in which they sought registration of the transfers for 1,500 shares and delivery of the certificates and damages for the company's default; and if the company were unable to register the transfers and deliver the certificates, then further damages to the amount of the value of the shares.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Farwell, J., held that the plaintiffs had no cause of action, and dismissed the action.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Bramwell Davis, K.C., and Ashton Cross, for the plaintiffs.

Upjohn, K.C., and Sargant, for the defendants.

Bramwell Davis, K.C., replied.

The following cases were referred to: The Bank of Ireland v. Trustees of Evans' Charities, 3 W. R. 573, 5 H. L. C. 389; Staple Merchants' Corporation v. Bank of England, 21 Q. B. D. 160, 36 W. R. Dig. 78; Scholfield v. Earl of Londesborough, 45 W. R. 124, [1896] A. C. 514; Coventry v. Great Eastern Railway Co., 11 Q. B. D. 776, 32 W. R. Dig. 75; Bishop v. Balkis Consolidated Co., 39 W. R. 99, 25 Q B. D. 712; Balkis Consolidated Co. v. Tomkinson, 42 W. R. 204, [1893] A. C. 396; Swan v. North British Australasian Co., 11 W. R. 862, 2 H. & C. 175; Johnson v. The Crédit Lyonnais, 26 W. R. 195, 3 C. P. D. 32; In re Ottos Kopje Diamond Mines (Limited), 41 W. R. 258, [1893] 1 Ch. 618; Shropshire Union Railway and Canal Co. v. Reg., 23 W. R. 709. L. R. 7 H. L. 496; Northern Counties of England Fire Insurance Co. v. Whipp, 32 W. R. 626, 26 Ch. D. 482.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In this case Farwell, J., dismissed the plaintiffs' action, and this is an appeal against his judgment. Now in the main the plaintiffs' action is an action claiming registration by the company of transfers for 1,500 shares and delivery of certificates for those shares, and damages for the default of the company in registering the said transfers and delivering the said certificates; they ask "if from any cause the company shall be unable now to register the aforesaid transfers and to deliver certificates for the aforesaid shares, then further damages to the amount of the value of the aforesaid shares." Before I deal with this claim I may as well once and for all get rid of a matter that has been brought to our notice by counsel for the appellants in regard to paragraph 12 of the statement of claim. In paragraph 12 of the statement of claim it is stated "after the delivery to the company of the aforesaid transfer and the lodging with the company of the certificates for the 1,000 shares comprised in the transfer to the plaintiff T. W. Longman, he, the said plaintiff, sold 250 of the said shares, and being unable through the default of the company to transfer such shares to the purchaser thereof, the said plaintiff has been compelled to purchase and has purchased other shares for delivery to the respective purchasers in lieu thereof, and by reason of such sale and purchase the said plaintiff has sustained damage to the amount of £27 2s. 8d., which ought to be made good to the said plaintiff by the company." Now, although the paragraph does not in terms say so, it is quite plain from the way the case has now been presented to us what is alleged. It is said that, the plaintiffs being lulled into a sense of security by the giving of two receipts which have been read to us, and by some letters in the early part of 1904, were induced to make these sales which are referred to in the paragraph. The answer which is made to that is: "You did not prove anything of the sort." No one was called to say that in truth or in fact the plaintiffs were induced to make these sales by being lulled into a sense of security through the conduct of the defendants through their secretary and the writing of these letters. The appellants meet that by saying: "Our statement of claim is admitted"; but paragraph 12 of the statement of claim does not itself allege anything of the sort, and under these circumstances it seems to me that this part of the plaintiffs' claim may be conveniently disposed of at once by saying that this part of the case has certainly neither been alleged nor proved. I may say, before leaving this part of the case, that with regard to these two receipts of the 11th and 12th of May they are in the same form, and run thus: "Received of the Securities Exchange (Limited)"—they were agents for the plaintiffs—"one transfer of 1,000 preferred ordinary shares for registration in favour of Thomas William Longman, Esq., subject to the approval of the directors." Then there is, "Transferor, P. Bennett. From ——— to ——— 1,000"; then there is, "Fee paid, 2s. 6d.," and that is signed by the secretary. And then there is this: "This receipt must be returned to the company's office, as above, in exchange for the respective share certificates, which will be ready on the 18th inst." I wish to say, with regard to that receipt, that if the plaintiffs did rely upon it as a recognition of their title, and as a promise binding on the company that the share certificate should be given to them, they were, in my judgment, having regard to the terms of this document, relying upon that upon which they had no right at all to rely. When one considers the course of business it would be very wrong indeed to assume that a secretary, in giving a receipt of this kind, ever intends to recognize in the way suggested the title of the person lodging the transfer so as to bind the company to issue at the date named a share certificate. It is plain that the opportunities for making such examination as would justify the giving of such a receipt cannot occur upon presentation of the transfers and the application for a receipt; and even if the secretary himself intended to give a recept which would so bind the company, in my judgment he had no authority to do anything of the sort.

Having disposed of that part of the case I will now try shortly to dispose of the rest of the case. The case is really based upon estoppel, and the alleged estoppel is said to arise in this way: It is based upon what happens in the course of what is called on the Stock Exchange "certification," and it is said that in the course of this certification there arose a duty by the defendant company towards the plaintiffs, and that the defendant company by their neglect of that duty, and by their conduct in carrying out that duty, caused the plaintiffs to alter their position by believing in a state of facts which has turned out not to be true, and they say that under those circumstances the defendant company ought to be estopped from denying that state of circumstances in which the plaintiffs were led to believe by their neglect of duty and conduct, and that under those circumstances they are entitled to bring this action for the non-registration of their 1,500 shares, and to have damages if they cannot have registration. Now with regard to certification one cannot more concisely state what the practice is than to take the statement in Lord Lindley's judgment, which appears in the case of Bishop v. Balkis Consolidated Co. (Limited). The particular passage in Lord Lindley's judgment to which I refer appears on p. 519 of 20 Q. B. D., and I do not think that I can do better than read that statement. [His lordship read the judgment from "The practice of giving certificates . . . from such person to the transferor," and continued:] In the present case the facts may be put very shortly. In the statement of claim it is alleged that "on or about the commencement of May, 1904, the said Peter Bennett duly made and executed to the plaintiff William Longman a transfer for value of 500 of the aforesaid shares . . . and a few days subsequently he duly made and executed to the plaintiff Thomas William Longman a transfer for value of the remaining 1,000 of the said shares. . . . The first-mentioned transfer was made and taken in the name of the said William Longman as a trustee for the plaintiff, Thomas William Longman. On the execution of the aforesaid transfers the said Peter Bennett handed over to the plaintiff the aforesaid certificates for the 1,500 shares." Then it is alleged, "On the 11th and 12th of May, 1904, the plaintiffs caused copy transfers of 1,000 and 500 shares respectively to be left at the office of the company for registration, and they produced to and left with the company the certificates for 1,500 shares which had been delivered to them by the said Peter Bennett. On so leaving the said transfers respectively the plaintiffs paid and the company accepted the fee for registration of 2s. in each case." Then in paragraph 5 there is the allegation: "On or about the 18th of May the plaintiffs tendered the aforesaid receipts to the company and requested delivery of the new certificates in exchange"; and then there is the allegation of the refusal to register. The facts so far as I have read them I think may be taken to have been admitted from the course which was taken at the trial. Then we find some additional facts which also now are to be taken as common ground; they are set forth in the third paragraph of the defence. The defence begins with a statement of the issue of the original certificates on the 19th of April, 1904, to Peter Bennett; and then in paragraph 3 there is this: "About the same time as the registration of the said Peter Bennett and the making out of the said certificates in his name there was lodged for certification with the company by two persons named William Houselander and John Messenger Madders a transfer for value from the said Peter Bennett to the said William Houselander and John Messenger Madders of the said 1,500 preferred shares. In view of the fact that the said Peter Bennett was the registered holder of the said shares, the company duly and in the ordinary course of business certified the said transfers and returned them as so certified to the said William Houselander and John Messenger Madders. The said transfers have since been registered by the company, and the said William Houselander and John Messenger Madders thereupon became the registered holders of the said 1,500 preferred shares, and they or those duly deriving title under them are still the registered holders of the said shares." Then in paragraph 4 it is stated: "Subsequently to the certification and return of the aforesaid transfers to the said William Houselander and John Messenger Madders—namely, on or about the 22nd of April, 1904, the secretary of the company having occasion to forward to the said Peter Bennett a certificate or certificates for other shares in the company, and in forgetfulness of the facts as to the transfers to the said William Houselander and John Messenger Madders, sent a letter to the said Peter Bennett, enclosing by mistake the certificates in his name for the aforesaid 1,500 preferred shares. The said mistake was discovered afterwards—namely, some time prior to the close of the said month of April, and application was forthwith made to the said Peter Bennett to return the said certificates for the said 1,500 shares, which he promised to do but never in fact did." And then in paragraph 5 is this: "It was under the circumstances aforesaid and not otherwise that in or about the 23rd of April, 1904, and as from that date the said Peter Bennett held the certificates in the first paragraph of the statement of claim mentioned, and save as aforesaid the company do not admit any of the facts alleged in the said statement of claim." I think I have read enough of the statement of claim and of the defence to show what really are the circumstances. The plaintiffs say that they were induced to make advances to Peter Bennett by reason of his possession of these certificates which had been issued to him by the company. They say that having regard to the practice of the Stock Exchange and of those who frequent the Stock Exchange, with regard to certification, this certificate having once been lodged by Houselander and Madders, and their transfers having been certificated, it was wrong for the company to return these certificates to Bennett at all, and that it is only in consequence of this wrong return by the secretary of the company of these certificates to Bennett that Bennett has been able improperly to produce these certificates to the plaintiffs and get them to part with their money. According to my view of the facts of this case, and having regard both to the evidence and to some admissions which were made on behalf of the defendants in the course of the argument of the case, I have no doubt at all myself that according to the practice of the Stock Exchange and to the practice of companies who make this certification for the purpose really of assisting in the dealings with shares on the Stock Exchange as described by Lord Lindley in his judgment which I have read, if on a proposed transfer of shares a company has once got certificates lodged with it and has so certified the accompanying transfer, the company does in practice retain the certificates which come with the transfer and retain them until the proposed transfer has been carried out, in which case the company does not return the certificates which have been lodged, but cancels those certificates and issues fresh certificates, one for the number of shares transferred and another for the balance of the shares not transferred, the company retaining these until they have proper information of the determination of the proposed transfer transaction between the proposed transferor and the purchaser. That is my view of the evidence. And if I had only to deal with the question of the duty of the company towards Houselander and Madders—which we have not got to deal with at present—I should be disposed to say that upon the evidence that I have referred to in this case there was a duty upon the company towards Houselander and Madders to retain the certificates, and to deal with them in the way in which I have described. But at present we have no evidence whatsoever before us to lead us to suppose that either by the practice of companies in the certification of shares, or the common recognition of that practice on the Stock Exchange, any duty arises on a company in respect of the retention of these certificates and the dealing with the certificates after the certification of the transfer to any one else excepting the transferee preventing the transfer and the certificate for the purpose of registration. We have no evidence at all to show that either the company or those who frequent the Stock Exchange have ever recognized any duty on the company except that towards the persons coming for the certification and, of course, those claiming through them. In the present case it is said that immediately upon the lodging and retention of these certificates or the completion of the certification there arose a duty of the company towards—I think the expression used is—"persons who may desire to become shareholders in the company." All I can say is that I see no ground for supporting that proposition. As a matter of fact in the present case all that is proved is this, that Bennett being in possession of a certificate or certificates which were properly issued to him by the company' when he became a member of the company, improperly used this certificate or these certificates and so obtained an advance or advances from the plaintiffs upon the security of this certificate or these certificates. It is not alleged and it is not the fact that the plaintiffs had any knowledge whatsoever with reference to these transfers having been presented for certification by Houselander and Madders, or of the fact of the certificates having been lodged with the company, or of the return of those certificates by the company to Bennett. All they knew was that they found Bennett in possession of certificates which were genuine certificates, and which were issued by the company. It is perfectly plain, therefore, that in no sense can the plaintiffs be said to have been parties to the original transaction of the presentation of this transfer and the lodging of these certificates for the purposes of certification. Nor can it be said that in any way the plaintiffs were parties to that certification. I do not think that there is any contest as to the conclusion of fact at which I have arrived, but the plaintiffs say, "Yes, but although this is so, you, the company, neglected your duty to retain these certificates, and your negligence is the real or proximate or direct cause of the loss which we have sustained in this case." Now, to put the conclusion that I have arrived at shortly, it seems to me that the answer to the plaintiffs' claim is, first, that there being admittedly no duty whatever to the plaintiffs personally, they have failed to establish any duty on the part of the company in respect of the retention of these certificates to the public or to any section of the public, or, to define the suggested section a little more closely, to persons desirous of becoming members of the company; and, secondly, that even assuming that any such duty of the company could be established towards persons desirous of becoming members of the company, I should say that it is not true to say that the returning of the certificates to Bennett was the proximate, direct, or real cause, whichever expression may be used, of the loss which the plaintiffs have sustained by having advanced money upon the security of certificates which as between Bennett and Messrs. Houselander and Madders, Bennett was not entitled to deal with, he having already given a good title to Messrs. Houselander and Madders which prevented him from giving a good title to the plaintiffs. It is quite plain that the mere return of the certificates to Bennett would have led to no loss to the plaintiffs whatever. What did cause the loss was the improper use of these certificates when they came into the possession of Bennett. For these reasons I think the plaintiffs' case fails. Speaking generally of these cases of estoppel, it is necessary that the plaintiffs should prove that they have been misled either by word of mouth or by conduct, and if by conduct, it must be by conduct in some transaction to which the defendants were a party. For the reasons I have given it seems to me that that part of the case fails. Then, if the plaintiffs cannot do that, they must prove generally that the defendants have omitted to do some act which it was their duty to do towards the plaintiffs or the public or some section of the public or, as is suggested, those who may be desirous of becoming members of the company. In my opinion, there is no proof of any such misleading, and no proof of negligence of duty towards the plaintiffs or towards any section of the public. The utmost that can be proved, according to my view of the case, is that there has been negligence, as admittedly indeed there has been. That is admitted not only in the third paragraph of the statement of defence but in the evidence of the secretary of the company, negligence in the custody of these certificates; but the mere fact of negligence in the retention of these documents, and I may say generally the mere fact of the proof of negligence, is not sufficient to raise estoppel. At all events ever since the decision in Bank of Ireland v. Evans' Trustees and the case of Johnson v. Crédit Lyonnais it cannot be said that mere negligence, will raise an estoppel; you must have more than that. You must at all events have negligence which is the real and immediate cause of the damage done. It will be remembered that Cockburn, C.J., in his judgment in Swan v. North British Australasian Co., leaves it an open question whether or not such negligence, when it is mere negligence, irrespective of negligence of a duty towards the plaintiffs, might or might not raise some sort of estoppel when it is the real cause of the loss sustained by the plaintiffs. He says: "It is to be observed that in the case in the House of Lords to which I have referred"—that was the case of Bank of Ireland v. Trustees of Evans' Charities—"it was unnecessary to decide the larger question whether negligence leading to a forgery by which another party was defrauded estops the party guilty of it from disputing the genuineness of the instrument. The absence of negligence immediately leading to the result was at once a sufficient ground on which to dispose of the case." So I say in the present case there is the absence of evidence immediately leading to the result complained of, and therefore the estoppel is excluded. I think I have now dealt with all the grounds to which I need refer in the present case. I think that the judgment of Farwell, J., ought to be affirmed, because the plaintiffs have not been misled by any statement or conduct of the defendants; that the defendants have not been shown to have been negligent of any duty which they owed to the plaintiffs individually or as members of a section of the public, and that the negligence which has been shown in the custody of the certificate in question was not the immediate cause or the real cause which led to the loss by the plaintiffs. I think the judgment of Farwell, J., ought to be affirmed and the appeal dismissed with costs.

ROMER, L.J.—I also think that the appeal fails. I can give my reasons shortly. With regard to the main case of the plaintiffs, in the first place I may point out that they do not and cannot rely, as a cause of action against the company, on the certification given to Houselander and Madders. That certification may have placed the company under special obligations to those gentlemen to whom it was given, or to those who claim under them or had notice of the certification and relied on it; but the plaintiffs knew nothing whatever of the certification and cannot base any claim upon it. The ground alleged by the plaintiffs on which they claim to hold the defendant company liable in this action is one of estoppel by what is said to be culpable negligence on the part of the company in forwarding the certificates of the shares to Bennett after they had notice of the transfer to Houselander and Madders, and after recognition of that transfer by the company by the certification. Now I may assume that there was negligence on the part of the company in so forwarding the certificate as between the company and those persons who were entitled to rely on the certification which might have made the company liable to those persons; but, as I have pointed out, the plaintiffs are not such persons, and it appears to me to push the doctrine of estoppel by negligence too far to say that in the present case by forwarding the certificate to Bennett and by allowing him to retain it after he received it the company must be taken to have held out to the world at large or to any person dealing with Bennett that Bennett's title both legal and equitable to the shares was good. The certificate was true on the face of it. Bennett was in truth (as stated by the certificate) the registered holder and owner of the shares, and it is to be remembered that a certificate of shares is not a negotiable instrument, nor is it a warranty of title on the part of the company issuing it: see, inter alia, Shropshire Union Railways and Canal Co. v. The Queen and In re Ottos Kopje Diamond Mines (Limited). I may, indeed, with regard to the certificate, repeat what Fry, L.J., said of title-deeds in the case of Northern Counties of England Fire Insurance Co. v. Whipp. He observed, at p. 493 of 26 Ch. D., that the title-deeds could not be regarded as being in the eye of the law analogous to "fierce dogs or destructive elements where from the nature of the thing the courts have implied a general duty of safe custody on the part of the person having their possession or control." I do not think that merely because the plaintiffs found the certificates in the hands of Bennett they were entitled to assume as against the company, without inquiry of the company, that there had been no dealings by Bennett with the shares, or that the company held out that the owner could give a good title to the shares. If the plaintiffs have suffered loss by their dealings with Bennett it arose, to my mind, from Bennett's fraud and from the plaintiffs taking upon themselves the risk involved in their accepting Bennett's title merely because he held the certificates, and not by any representation or breach of duty on the part of the company to or towards the plaintiffs. With regard to the small subsidiary point made on this appeal with regard to the item of damage mentioned in paragraph 12 of the statement of claim, all I need say is that that special cause of action urged by him was not pleaded nor proved, nor, as I understand it, even properly taken in the court below. It follows that the whole appeal fails and should be dismissed with costs.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The facts with which we have to deal are very short. [His lordship stated the facts as above, and continued:] Now, certification is not an act the performance of which is imposed upon the company either by any provision in the Companies Act or in the articles of association. It is, therefore, one which the company may see fit to do or may not do, but if the company do see fit to give a certification, then as at present advised I think that by that act the company does undertake a duty to any person who deals with shares on the faith of the certification. If the plaintiffs had so dealt with these shares, it would have been necessary to define the extent and nature of that duty, but the plaintiffs knew nothing whatever of the certification and did not act on the faith of it. Further, when the plaintiffs made their advance they knew nothing of the circumstances in which the certificate had been sent by the defendant company to Bennett, consequently they did not change their position, relying on the special circumstances in which the certificate came into Bennett's hands. What the plaintiffs did rely on was merely the certificate and the possession of it by Bennett. The certificate is in the ordinary form under the seal of the company, and simply certified that Bennett was the registered holder of certain shares specified subject to the memorandum and articles of association. The statements in the certificate were perfectly accurate, for at the date Bennett was the registered holder of these shares. Then as regards the possession of the certificate, by section 31 of the Companies Act a certificate is primâ facie evidence of the title of a member to the share or shares which are specified; but it is only primâ facie evidence, and a person who deals with another on the faith of only a primâ facie title is always liable to find that another and better title may be brought forward which will supersede that which is derived from the certificate. That is what took place here. The plaintiffs' title failed because Bennett had created a prior title in favour of Houselander and Madders and was not in a position to confer a good title on the plaintiffs. The case which is put forward on behalf of the plaintiffs is this, that the defendants were guilty of culpable neglect and are estopped from disputing that the plaintiffs have a title to the shares. The title by estoppel may be created no doubt by negligence. The limitations on the rule are stated and were very severely considered in the case of Swan v. North British Australasian Co. (Limited), 2 H. & C. 175. Blackburn, J., in dealing with the case states the rule thus. He refers to what has been stated by Wilde, B., in the Court of Exchequer, which was in these terms: "That if one has led others into the belief on a certain state of facts by conduct of culpable neglect calculated to have that result, and they have acted on that belief to their prejudice, he shall not be heard afterwards as against such persons to show that that state of facts did not exist." Blackburn, J., says: "This is very nearly right, but in my opinion not quite, as he omits to qualify it by saying that the neglect must be in the transaction itself and be the proximate cause of leading the party into that mistake, and also as I think that it must be the neglect of some duty that is owing to the person led into that belief, or what comes to the same thing to the general public, of whom the person is one, and not merely neglect of what would be prudent in respect to the party himself, or even of some duty owing to third persons with whom those seeking to set up the estoppel are not privy." Now in my judgment not one of the limitations which Blackburn, J., there imposes on the application of the doctrine of estoppel by negligence is found satisfied in the present case. The neglect—and I think there was neglect—which occurred in this transaction was not in the transaction with the plaintiffs, it was in the transaction with Houselander and Madders. Secondly, the neglect was not the proximate cause of the plaintiffs' mistake, for the plaintiffs knew nothing of this neglect or of the duty or of the way in which the company had dealt with the certificates. Lastly, I think there was no neglect of duty to the plaintiffs. That there was a neglect of a duty owing to persons with whom the plaintiffs were not privy. I intended with regard to that to refer to what was said by Fry, L.J., in the case of Northern Counties of England Fire Insurance Co. v. Whipp, but that has been already read, and I need not refer to it again. I think, therefore, that the plaintiffs fail in establishing their case, and that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Minton Slater & Co.; Paynes, Blyth, & Huxtable.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). March 3.

CHAPMAN AND OTHERS v. PERKINS. (a.)

Will—Construction—Forfeiture clause—Marriage of a son or daughter within certain prohibited degrees—Marriage in testator's lifetime.

A testator devised all his real and personal estate to trustees upon trust for sale, and to be divided, after certain payments, among his children, sons and daughters (other than A., a daughter), in equal shares; he then inserted a clause to the effect that if any child should contract a marriage with any person of any degree of kindred, unless more remote than third cousin, and also in the case of a daughter without the previous written consent of the trustees or trustee of his will, then he or she should forfeit his or her right to the share in his trust estate. Subsequently the respondent, another daughter, married her first cousin in the testator's lifetime, and on his death claimed to be entitled to a share in his trust estate.

Held, that there was sufficient in the will to show that the testator intended that these acts of forfeiture should take effect only after his death, and that the respondent had not therefore forfeited her interest in his trust estate.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (52 W. R. 467, [1904] 1 Ch. 431) affirmed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Vaughan Williams and Stirling, L.JJ., Cozens-Hardy, L.J., dissenting) reversing an order of Kekewich, J.

The question was whether the respondent, who in the testator's lifetime had married her first cousin, Charles Steele Perkins, had forfeited her share in the trust estate of the testator and in the income thereof.

The facts are given at length in the court below, and are shortly as follows:

Edward Chapman, by his will dated the 24th of March, 1881, after devising all his real and personal estate to trustees upon trust for sale, and to be divided among his children (other than Alice) in equal shares, made the following provisions:

"And I declare that if any son or daughter of mine shall do or suffer any act whether by way of alienation, charge or otherwise, and including any act under any statutes of bankruptcy or for the relief of insolvent debtors for the time being, by reason or means whereof any part or share of him or her in any income or capital of my said estate to or of which he or she shall not have already become entitled in possession or be for the time being actually entitled to the receipt shall, or but for this present clause, would become wholly or in part vested in or payable to any other person or persons, or if he or she shall contract any marriage forbidden by me as hereinafter expressed, then, and in any such case his or her share, right, title, and interest of, in, and to my said trust estate, and the income thereof shall thenceforth cease and determine, and my said trust estate shall thenceforth go and be held in such manner as the same would have been held if he or she had died before me without leaving any child or children living at my death. And I declare that the marriages forbidden by me are in the case of son or daughter marriage with a person of any degree of kindred unless more remote than third cousin and also in the case of a daughter marriage contracted without the previous written consent of the trustees or trustee for the time being of this my will or if more than two of a majority of them."

The respondent married her first cousin on the 9th of November, 1886, and the testator died in 1902.

Kekewich, J., made an order declaring that the respondent had forfeited her share of the testator's trust estate and the income thereof, but this was reversed by the Court of Appeal.

Levett, K.C. (Iselin and W. A. Russell with him), for the appellants.—A will is only deemed to speak from death with respect to the property comprised therein: Bullock v. Bennett, 3 W. R. 291, 7 De G. M. & G. 283. In cases of bankruptcy or alienation, forfeiture has been enforced on the happening of the event before the testator's death: Ancona v. Waddell, 27 W. R. 186, 10 Ch. D. 157, and In re Metcalfe, Metcalfe v. Metcalfe, [1891] 3 Ch. 1, 40 W. R. Dig. 280.

Upjohn, K.C., and Edward Clayton, for the respondent, were not heard.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—I do not propose to go over this elaborate argument again. It appears to me that the decision of Vaughan Williams and Stirling, L.JJ., is perfectly right. There is an intention on the part of the testator, to my mind, overwhelmingly established upon the words of the will itself, and I decline to go beyond that. The argument, from words used with reference to bankruptcy, seems to me to be disposed of by this consideration. Cases in which there was a desire on the part of the testator that his property which he was dealing with should not go to strangers, but should go to his children, and a plain intention shown that the forfeiture clause should apply if the thing happened during his own lifetime, have no reference to the subject-matter with which we are dealing. To my mind, the reasoning of Vaughan Williams and Stirling, L.JJ., as to the intention of the testator is perfectly satisfactory, and I move that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with the majority of the Court of Appeal. I think in this particular will the marriages forbidden are marriages taking place after the testator's death.

Lord JAMES OF HEREFORD.—I concur.

Lord LINDLEY.—So do I.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the appellants, John F. Child.

Solicitors for the respondent, Ward, Perks, & McKay.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Stirling and Mathew, L.JJ.) April 7.

JACKSON v. WIMBLEDON URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a.)

Local government—Sewer or drain—Drain on private ground—Draining several houses—"Single private drain"—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 41—Public Health Amendment Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 59), s. 19.

A drain conveying the drainage of two or more houses belonging to the same owner into a single private drain (as described by section 19 of the Public Health Amendment Act, 1890) is a sewer, and not affected by section 41 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

Decision of the Divisional Court affirmed.

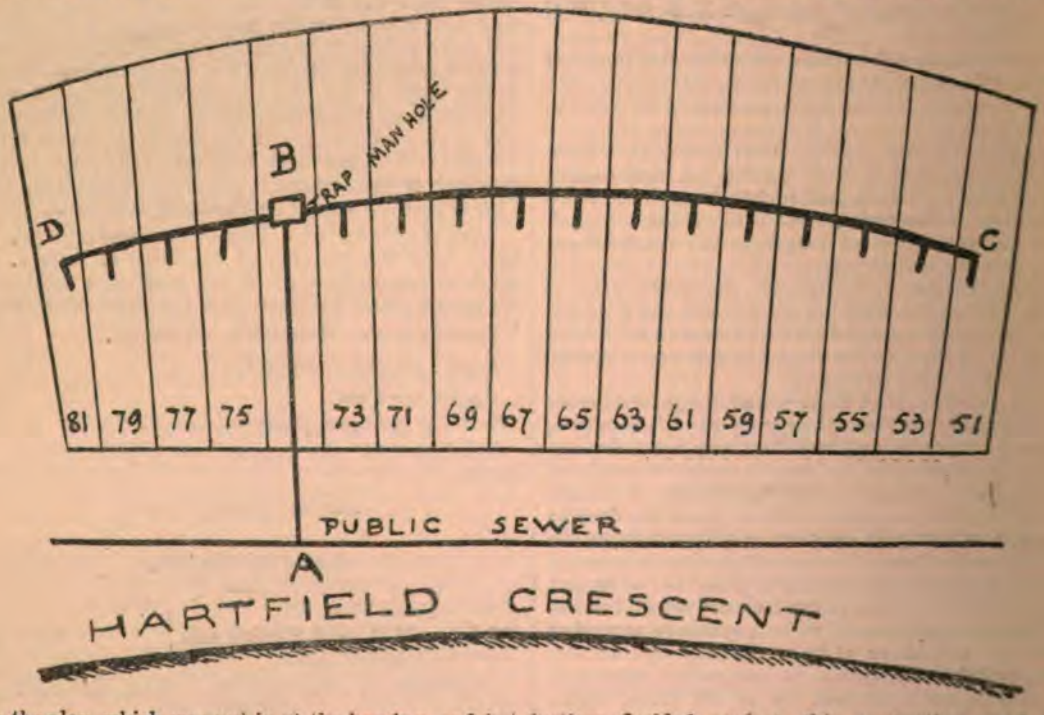
(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Kennedy, JJ.) upon a case stated by justices under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts.

On the 19th of August, 1903, the respondent Jackson appeared before a court of summary jurisdiction in obedience to a summons charging him with having made default in payment of the sum of £35 due from him to the appellants for expenses incurred by them in relaying the main drain at the rear of Nos. 51 to 73 (odd numbers), Hartfield-crescent, Wimbledon, and also with having made default in payment of £13 7s. 5d., being a proportion of the expenses incurred by the appellants in relaying a single private drain connecting No. 73 and No. 75, Hartfield-crescent with a certain public sewer.

On the north side of Hartfield-crescent, in the appellants' district, there are sixteen houses numbered with odd numbers from 51 to 81, both inclusive. The respondent is the owner of twelve of these houses, numbered from 51 to 73, both inclusive. At the rear of the sixteen houses runs a main or common drain which is connected with the public sewer by a branch drain which runs between Nos. 73 and 75 beneath a piece of land between those two houses. Each of the sixteen houses is connected with the main or common drain by means of branch drains conveying the sewage from each house.



In the plan which was put in at the hearing and is here reproduced so far as is material, the main common drain at the rear of the sixteen houses was marked D to C, and the branch drain which ran from a point between Nos. 73 and 75 to the public sewer was marked B to A and both the main drain D to C, and the branch drain B to A, were constructed wholly upon private property. Part III. of the Public Health Amendment Act, 1890, which includes section 19 of the Act, had been adopted in the appellants' district.

Complaint having been made to the appellants as the local authority under the Public Health Act, 1875, as to the drains in Hartfield-crescent, the appellants caused the drains to be inspected, and found it was necessary to relay the main or common drain D to C, and also the branch drain B to A, and caused notice in writing to be given to the owners of the sixteen houses requiring them, within a specified time, to do the necessary works. The owners of Nos. 75 to 81 inclusive duly executed the works required so far as affected the main or common drain D to B at the rear of these premises, but made default in executing the works required to the branch drain B to A. The respondent as owner of Nos. 51 to 73 inclusive did not comply with the notice at all, but made default in executing the works required to be done both to the branch drain B to A, and also to the main or common drain C to B, and the appellants accordingly executed the works and made an apportionment of the expenses by apportioning the expenses of relaying the branch drain B to A between the owners of the sixteen houses, and also the expenses of relaying the main drain B to C upon the respondent. The respondent having made default in complying with the demand of the appellants, proceedings were taken. The amount of the apportionment was not in dispute, and at the hearing the respondent admitted that the branch drain B to A was a single private drain within the meaning of section 19 of the Act of 1890, but he contended that the drain B to C was a sewer within the meaning of section 4 of the Act of 1875, and not a single private drain within the meaning of the Act of 1890. The justices decided against this contention, and the Divisional Court reversed the decision of the justices.

The Wimbledon Urban District Council now appealed.

Section 19 of the 1890 Act enacts: (1) Where two or more houses belonging to different owners are connected with a public sewer by a single private drain an application may be made under section 41 of the Public Health Act, 1875 (relating to complaints as to nuisances from drains), and the local authority may recover any expenses incurred by them in executing any works under the powers conferred on them by that section from the owners of the houses in such shares and proportions as shall be settled by their surveyor, or (in case of dispute) by a court of summary jurisdiction. (3) For the purposes of this section the expression "drain" includes a drain used for the drainage of more than one building.

Macmorran, K.C. (George Humphreys with him), for the appellants.—Your lordships sent back the case to the justices for further particulars, which have now been obtained, but do not in any way assist the court. Section 19 of the 1890 Act has effected a change in the law touching the liability for the repair of drains under section 41 of the 1875 Act. Bradford v. Mayor, &c., of Eastbourne, [1896] 2 Q. B. 205, 44 W. R. Dig. 93, dealt with section 19 and what is a single private drain under that section. The pipe B to A fulfils the condition of a single private drain both under section 19, sub-section 3, and within the Eastbourne case, as it receives the drainage from the houses of different owners, and in any case for the purposes of this case it is admitted to be a single private drain. As a result the respondent is liable, for "two or more houses are connected with a public sewer by a single private drain" under section 19 of the 1890 Act: see Lord Russell of Killowen, L.C.J.'s, judgment in the Eastbourne case, at p. 209, and Wills, J., at p. 215, on this point. Thompson v. Mayor, &c., of Eccles, ante, p. 211, [1905] 1 K. B. 110, decided in the Court of Appeal, approved the decision in the Eastbourne case. It would be an anomalous position to decide that the pipe from B—C constituted a sewer, the pipe draining No. 75 a single private drain, and the pipe draining Nos. 77-81 again a sewer.

Sylvain Mayer, for the respondent.—I submit that B to A is not a single private drain. [COLLINS, M.R.—You must argue this case on the footing that it is, for the respondent has admitted it to be the case, by payment of his proportion of the expenses.] To deal with the pipe B to C it is sufficient to state that the houses drained by it are now in the ownership of one person, Mr. Jackson, for Kershaw v. Taylor, [1895] 2 Q. B. 471, 43 W. R. Dig. 117, has decided that the drains must be taken as they are at the present moment. [MATHEW, L.J.—In that case the pipe was built as a sewer; was the pipe built as a sewer here; were the houses originally the property of one person?] See also Heaver v. Borough Council of Fulham, [1904] 2 K. B. 383, 52 W. R. Dig. 110. If this court decides against me it will virtually repeal the definition of drain in section 41 of the 1875 Act, which is certainly not repealed by the 1890 Act. The object of section 19 of that Act was to prevent persons with separate responsibilities throwing the burden of repairing their drains upon the local authority by means of what section 19 has called a single private drain, as is stated by Wills, J., at p. 215 of his judgment in the Eastbourne case; and it is to be noted that Wills, J., has taken part in all the leading cases on this subject. [COLLINS, M.R.—How do you get over the plain language of the statute? It says two or more houses connected by a single private drain to a public sewer. Here you have a single private drain B to A.] The statute means connected right up to the houses concerned by a single private drain. There is no difficulty in the same pipe being in part a drain, and in part a sewer: Beckenham Urban District Council v. Wood, (1896) 60 J. P. 490. This case is even stronger because C—B—A is not one pipe, but two pipes joined by the man-hole at B.

Macmorran, K.C., in reply.—It was deliberately intended by section 19 to take the burden off the local authority in cases such as these.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the decision of the Divisional Court upon a question arising out the construction of section 19 of the Public Health Amendment Act, 1890. That section has been frequently the subject-matter of discussion, and we have recently dealt with it in this court in the case of Thompson v. Eccles Corporation, where we followed what is now the leading case on the subject—viz., Bradford v. Eastbourne Corporation, in which Lord Russell, L.C.J., delivered an elaborate judgment, and Wills, J., who has taken part in the judgments of many of these cases, also delivered an instructive judgment. Wills, J., has taken part in the decision of the case we are called upon to review. [His lordship read section 19.] In this case we have what is admitted to be a single private drain extending from the point which has been marked B on the plan, to the point marked A, running at right angles to the street and connected with the main public sewer under the street. All along the street are houses. On the right-hand side of the drain A to B are twelve houses which all belong to one owner, Mr. Jackson, and there are four houses on the left-hand side of the vertical line representing the single private drain. As to these four houses, three belong to a Mrs. Eysoldt and the other to a Mr. Holliday. This single private drain leads out from a man-hole at B; into that man-hole the drainage from the houses on the left flows—namely, the three houses belonging to Mrs. Eysoldt and the other belonging to Mr. Holliday. This vertical drain is for the purpose of this case to be treated as a single private drain, as I have said, by reason of an admission of the respondent. Coming to the other side, the drainage of all the houses belonging to Mr. Jackson runs into a common drain under the ground at the backs of the houses, and passes into the public sewer through the vertical private drain.

The main contention of the appellants is that if in any portion of its course the sewage traverses a single private drain on the way to the sewer the case comes within section 19. They say that the houses on the right-hand side, although belonging to one owner, and the houses on the left-hand side belonging to other owners are all in the last resort connected by the single private drain so as to satisfy the section and to let in the liability of the owner. It seems to me that there is a short answer to that contention, and it is given in the court below. The Eccles case treats of the parties liable to repair and the pipe in respect to which the obligation to repair arises, which must be part of a single private drain. The court cannot turn that part into a single private drain by reason of the fact that it is connected with a single private drain and that the sewerage in part of its course flows through a single private drain. It is a condition of liability that the pipe itself is a single private drain; although the sewage is led by it through a single private drain, if it is not a single private drain itself the section does not apply. Now, the pipe that leads up to the man-hole at point B takes the sewage from the houses belonging to one owner only. The Public Health Acts prior to section 19 of the 1890 Act constituted a pipe taking the drainage of more than one house a sewer, and section 19 does not take it out of that category "unless two or more houses belonging to different owners are connected with a public sewer by a single private drain." As I have pointed out, the work to be executed must be work on that which is the subject-matter to which the statute applies, and unless it is in respect to a single private drain within the meaning of section 19, that section does not apply. The Lord Chief Justice and Wills, J., have followed up the course of this drain, and I think it is no answer that because for a certain part of the drainage, the sewage passes through a single private drain that that fact makes the anterior part of the pipe a single private drain. Unless there is some magic in the fact that it passes into a single private drain which changes the nature of it, the pipe is regulated by existing law, and is not controlled or affected by this section dealing with the passage of sewage from houses belonging to different owners. Therefore, for the reasons given in the court below, with which I I agree, I think that the judgment is right and in strict conformity with the decision in Bradford v. Eastbourne Corporation and our own decision in the case of Thompson v. Eccles Corporation. It was submitted to us when the case came before us on the first occasion, that it was material to see whether all these houses were in the ownership of Mr. Jackson, and whether at one time they did not belong to different owners, the suggestion being that what was originally a single private drain could not be turned into a sewer by reason of the houses passing into the hands of one owner. In point of fact the presumption is that they did belong to one owner; they are at present in the hands of one owner, and no suggestion to the contrary was made in the court below. The court below proceeded on that presumption. It seems to me that the onus of proof was upon the person who set up the contrary contention. The matter went back to the justices with a view of obtaining their finding upon that point. The justices have not found anything inconsistent with the contention that the ownership of the houses has all along been that of one person, and we have had affirmative evidence which tends to show conclusively that they have been always in the hands of one owner. There is no evidence to the contrary which would require us to send back the case to the magistrates. We are entitled to found our decision on the same materials as the court below, and on these materials I think the decision is perfectly correct.

STIRLING and MATHEW, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants, Sharpe, Parker, & Co., for Butterworth, Wimbledon.

Solicitors for the respondent, W. W. Young, Son, & Ward.

From Liverpool Court of Passage. (Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) } April 4.

WILLIAMS v. MERSEY DOCKS AND HARBOUR BOARD. (a.)

Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 61), s. 1, sub-section (a)—Limitation of time—Negligence causing death—Action by personal representative—Fatal Accidents Act, 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93).

The plaintiff's husband was injured by a negligent act of the defendants, done in the execution of a public duty, and in consequence thereof he died after the expiration of six months from the date of his injuries, without having brought an action against the defendants to recover damages. Within six months after his death his widow, who was his personal representative, brought an action under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, to recover damages for his death.

Held, that as the negligent act of the defendants causing the injury occurred more than six months before the death of the injured man, an action by the latter to recover damages would have been barred by section 1 (a) of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, and therefore the action by the plaintiff was barred.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from a decision of Judge Taylor, K.C., at the Liverpool Court of Passage.

The action was brought under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846 (commonly called Lord Campbell's Act), by a widow to recover damages for the death of her husband, owing to his falling into a lock belonging to the defendants, which was being repaired, and which, it was alleged, was not properly guarded. The accident happened on the 24th of December, 1902, and the injured man died on the 30th of December, 1904, in consequence of the injuries so received. He did not bring an action in his lifetime against the defendants, but his widow, who was his personal representative, brought this action on the 2nd of February, 1905, in the Liverpool Court of Passage. The defendants, who were admittedly a public authority, pleaded that the action was barred by section 1 (a) of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893. That section provides that where an action is brought for any act done in pursuance or execution or intended execution of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority, or in respect of any alleged neglect or default in the execution of any such Act, duty, or authority, the action "shall not lie or be instituted unless it is commenced within six months next after the act, neglect, or default complained of." It was ordered that this preliminary objection should be heard before the trial of the action.

The judge of the Court of Passage held that as the cause of action under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, was the wrongful act, neglect, or default and the death of the injured person, the action had in fact been commenced within six months next after the matter complained of, and that therefore the action was not barred by section 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893.

The defendants appealed.

Carver, K.C., and Leslie Scott, for the defendants.—Lord Campbell's Act only enables the personal representative of a person who is killed by the negligence of another person to bring an action when the deceased could have maintained an action: Senior v. Ward, 7 W. R. 261, 1 E. & E. 385; Read v. Great Eastern Railway Co., 16 W. R. 1040, L. R. 3 Q. B. 555, 37 L. J. Q. B. 278; Griffiths v. Earl of Dudley, 30 W. R. 797, 9 Q. B. D. 357; Haigh v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Co., 52 L. J. Q. B. 640; Markey v. Tolworth Joint Isolation Hospital Board, [1900] 2 Q. B. 454, 48 W. R. Dig. 99. The deceased man at the time of his death could not have maintained the action, as it had not been commenced within six months after the happening of the injury.

Rigby Swift, for the plaintiff.—Lord Campbell's Act gives the personal representative a new cause of action beyond what the deceased man himself would have had if he had lived: Blake v. Midland Railway Co., 18 Q. B. 93, at p. 110; Pym v. Great Northern Railway Co., 11 W. R. 922, 4 B. & S. 396, at p. 406. The parties, the damages, and the circumstances are all different. The only thing in common is the act of negligence. The plaintiff's right to bring an action only accrued on the 30th of December, 1904, when her husband died. She brought the action within six months from that date, and therefore it is not barred. At the moment of his death the previous wrongful act, neglect, or default gave her a cause of action.

He also referred to Crumbie v. Wallsend Local Board, [1891] 1 Q. B. 503; The Vera Cruz, 33 W. R. 477, 10 App. Cas. 59.

MATHEW, L.J.—This is an appeal from the judgment of the judge of the Court of Passage of the City of Liverpool upon a preliminary point of law, which was ordered to be first disposed of before the trial of the action—namely, whether the defendants are liable to an action by the plaintiff for damages by reason of the death of her husband. It is contended on behalf of the defendants that they are protected by the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, which is an Act "to generalize and amend certain statutory provisions for the protection of persons acting in the execution of statutory and other public duties." The accident to the deceased man happened in 1902, and the action was brought by his widow after his death, which occurred at the end of 1904. It is contended for the plaintiff that her action under Lord Campbell's Act is one quite independent of the cause of action vested in the husband, and first accrued to her upon the death of her husband, and is therefore brought in time. The case turns upon section 1, sub-section (a), of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893. In the particular case before us the deceased man did not bring an action in respect of the injury to him. The action was brought by his widow a long time after the accident. The question is whether the action is maintainable. In my opinion it is not. The "act, neglect, or default" in respect of which the action is brought occurred more than six months before the commencement of the action. We have had a number of cases cited to us upon the question. The test of the right to bring an action under Lord Campbell's Act is whether the action could have been brought by the deceased man himself. That was settled by the cases referred to by Mr. Carver. Here the deceased man, if he had lived, could not have maintained the action himself. Therefore his personal representative cannot now maintain the action. For instance, if the original claim of the injured man was settled, his personal representative could not maintain an action. It is said that the action by the personal representative is a different one from that which was open to the deceased man, the cause of action and the considerations applicable to the two actions being different. The provisions of Lord Campbell's Act are, in my opinion, against that view. If, for instance, the deceased man was guilty of contributory negligence, his personal representative could not recover. The principle is that, whenever an action was not maintainable by the deceased man, his representative has no cause of action. After the expiration of six months from the date of the injury the deceased man could not have brought an action. His widow, therefore, cannot sue. The appeal must be allowed, and judgment must be entered for the defendants.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The case of Read v. Great Eastern Railway Co. is a strong enunciation of the principle applicable to this case; and, as was pointed out in the course of the argument, the effect of the Statute of Limitations was stated by Blackburn, J., in that case (see 37 L. J. Q. B., at p. 280), where he asked: "If he had lingered for seven years, do you say that this action would not have been barred by the Statute of Limitations?" And counsel said in reply that "the plaintiff is bound to contend that there would be no such bar." That is to say, the contention there was, that if the death of the injured man occurred at any lapse of time after the negligence causing the injury, the negligent person would be liable to be sued by the deceased man's personal representative. That is contrary to the principle of the cases which have been referred to. In The Vera Cruz, 10 App. Cas., at p. 70, Lord Blackburn said: "I think that when that Act"—Lord Campbell's Act—"is looked at, it is plain enough that, if a person dies under the circumstances mentioned, when he might have maintained an action if it had been for an injury to himself which he had survived, a totally new action is given against the person who would have been responsible to the deceased if the deceased had lived." In the present case the deceased man could not, after the lapse of six months from the date of the injury, have maintained an action, and it follows that his representative cannot now maintain this action.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Pritchard, Englefield, & Co., for Rees, Matthew, Jones, & Rees, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the defendants, Rawle, Johnstone, & Co., for W. C. Thorne, Liverpool.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } April 13, 15.
Buckley, J. }

In re SOUTHERN BRAZILIAN RIO GRANDE DO SUL RAILWAY CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Winding up—Power to borrow—Irredeemable debenture stock—Floating security—Perpetual annuity—Explanation of memorandum by articles.

A railway company incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1880, one of whose objects, as stated in the memorandum of association, is to borrow money by the issue of debenture stock, cannot in consequence grant perpetual annuities by the issue of such stock. The granting of such annuities is not borrowing, nor is it a purpose subsidiary to the objects of a commercial company, and therefore contemporaneous articles of association of such a company cannot be looked at for the purpose of construing the above-mentioned object to mean the raising of money by the granting of perpetual annuities. And when such a company is wound up the debenture stockholders are entitled to nothing more than the payment of the amount secured by the stock with interest.

Originating summons.

The question to be decided in this summons was whether the above company could issue irredeemable debentures.

The company was incorporated in 1882 under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1880, with its registered office in England.

By clause 3 of the memorandum of association one of the objects for which the company was established was: "(7) To borrow money by the issue of any mortgages, debentures, debenture stock, bonds, or obligations of the company, either at par, premium, or discount, and also to borrow money upon the security of unpaid calls of the company, or by any other means, and upon such other securities as the company may from time to time determine."

Article 17 of the articles of association, which were of the same date as the memorandum of association, stated that the board of directors "may also create and issue for the purposes of the company, debenture stock, bonds, or debentures, to be secured upon the undertaking, revenues and property of the company for the time being, or any part thereof, and such debenture stock, bonds, or debentures shall bear interest at such rates not exceeding 6 per cent., and be irredeemable or redeemable in such manner and at such times and upon such terms and conditions as the board may determine."

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 29th of June, 1883, the board resolved: "(1) That in exercise of the authority conferred upon the board by the seventeenth article of association, irredeemable debenture stock be created to the nominal amount of £295,150, bearing interest at the rate of £6 per cent. per annum, payable half-yearly on the 1st of April and the 1st of October in each year, forming part of an aggregate amount" described; and "(2) that such aggregate amount of debenture stock or debentures . . . be a first charge upon so much of the property and undertaking of the company as shall consist of the railway from Rio Grande do Sul to Bagé with its rolling stock and the Government guarantee of interest thereon pari passu, and shall until default in payment by the company of any sum payable under such charge constitute a floating charge only." Debenture stock was accordingly issued pursuant to the resolutions, and Mr. R. H. Baird, the applicant in the summons, became the holder of the stock to the amount of £2,000. In February, 1905, after approving of the proposed agreement next mentioned, the company went into voluntary liquidation. In March, 1905, the company agreed to sell its railway and undertaking to the Government of Brazil in consideration of moneys which as to a large part were payable in certain Railway Guarantee Rescission Bonds, and in further consideration of the Government paying, redeeming, or satisfying the debenture stock of the company. This involved a scheme of arrangement which was sanctioned by the court, but which bound the contributories only and did not affect the rights of the applicant. The liquidator proposed to pay off the applicant and other debenture stockholders at the par value of their stock, with interest up to date.

The applicant took out this summons against the liquidators asking whether he was entitled, as he claimed, to have some, and if so what sum paid to him out of the assets of the company over and above the par value of his stock and interest, as a term of the redemption of such stock, or as compensation for the loss caused to him by payment off of his stock contrary to the terms of issue.

Buckmaster, K.C., and Harman, for the applicant.—The company had power to grant perpetual annuities by the issue of irredeemable debenture stock, and they have done so, and they are not now entitled to pay off the stock and cease paying the 6 per cent. interest without giving compensation to the stockholders for the loss of their annuities. Debenture stock differs from debentures in this respect. A power to issue debenture stock is a power to issue irredeemable debenture stock: Attree v. Hawe, 26 W. R. 871, 873, 9 Ch. D. 337, 349; Samuel v. Jarrah Timber and Wood Paving Corporation (Limited), 51 W. R. 439, 52 W. R. 673, [1903] 2 Ch. 1, 15, [1904] A. C. 323. The articles of association expressly authorized the issue of irredeemable debenture stock, and being contemporaneous with the memorandum they may be referred to for the purpose of explaining it: Harrison v. Mexican Railway Co., 23 W. R. 403, L. R. 19 Eq. 358; In re South Durham Brewery Co., 34 W. R. 126, 31 Ch. D. 269. The memorandum of association states that to borrow money is one of the objects of the company, and article 17 shows how that object is to be carried out. Even if the company cannot issue irredeemable debenture stock, they are still bound by contract not to call the stock in, and if they do so are liable to the holder of the stock for damages for breach of contract.

Haldane, K.C., and E. H. Cole (originally instructed for the Brazilian Goverment), and Younger, K.C., and Bischoff, for the respondents.—The irredeemable stock for the issue of which article 17 provided meant stock irredeemable only so long as the company was a going concern. The stock is issued as a floating security, and the winding up of the company renders it immediately payable: Wallace v. Universal Automatic Machine Co. (Limited), 42 W. R. 428, [1894] 2 Ch. 547; see also Palmer's Company Precedents, vol. 3, at p. 10. The memorandum and articles only authorize borrowing money, and not selling annuities, and this was the purpose for which the debentures were issued.

Buckmaster in reply.—The resolutions of the board show that the issue of the debenture stock was intended to be a grant of a perpetual annuity. According to the contention of the respondents, a company which had issued debentures not redeemable for twenty years could go into liquidation at any time, and thus become entitled to pay them off at once.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 15.—BUCKLEY, J.—Two contentions have been put forward as to the nature of this stock. The one is that it is irredeemable under all circumstances, and that the applicant is entitled simply to a perpetual annuity. The other is that it is irredeemable only in the sense that the company is not, at its option, entitled to redeem it except under circumstances, and that the winding up is a circumstance under which the stock ceases to be irredeemable. If the applicant is the holder of a perpetual annuity, the question is whether the company had power to grant such an annuity. Clause 3 (7) of the memorandum of association authorizes the company "to borrow money by the issue of any mortgages, debentures, debenture stock, bonds, or obligations of the company." The applicant argues that "debenture stock" there bears the meaning attributed to it in the Companies Clauses Acts, that it means a perpetual annuity. He seeks to evolve this meaning from the fact that this is a railway company, and that railway companies, meaning by that expression companies under the Companies Clauses Acts, issue debenture stock which is perpetual. I think the argument unsound. This is not a railway company governed by the Companies Clauses Acts. Then he contends further that a company such as a railway company, which necessarily has a permanent undertaking in the sense that the permanent way is useless except for the purposes of a railway undertaking, may be more readily supposed to be taking power to issue perpetual debenture stock than a company of a less permanent character. The same argument would apply, say, to a telegraph cable company, and to other companies which might be suggested. The permanence of the undertaking does not, I think, throw light upon the nature of the instrument which the company is taking power to issue. And if it did, I must add that the concession held by this company is only for a term of years and that the Government is entitled to cut short even that term by purchasing after the expiration of the first thirty years from the completion of the railway. Such a company can scarcely contemplate the issue of debenture stock extending beyond the term of its own commercial life. The words of the memorandum are "to borrow money by the issue of" debenture stock. Borrowing necessarily implies repayment at some time and under some circumstances. The applicant seeks to read the clause as if it were to borrow "or raise" money by the issue of debenture stock. Those are not the words. The memorandum of association uses language which, I think, necessarily confines the issue of debenture stock to debenture stock issued in respect of a borrowing involving the obligation at some time to repay. The granting of a perpetual annuity is therefore, in my judgment, not within the memorandum of association.

But next it is argued that article 17 specifically mentions irredeemable debenture stock, and that the memorandum and articles of association may for some purposes be read together, and that in this matter the construction of the memorandum of association can be assisted by the articles. Upon this, my first observation is that article 17 is not expressed as creating any power, but as defining the authority which may exercise for the company an existing power. The words are "the board may create and issue." Further, the purposes for which the articles can be read to explain or supplement the memorandum do not extend to explaining or supplementing the memorandum in respect of a matter which, under the Companies Act, 1862, must be contained in the memorandum of association. An authority to borrow is not properly an object of the company at all, and need not be found in the memorandum of association. The articles may, therefore, I think, be referred to for the purpose of explaining the manner in which a company is by its memorandum authorized to borrow. But the granting of perpetual annuities is not borrowing, and is not a purpose subsidiary to the general objects of a commercial or trading undertaking. The granting of annuities for lives could not be authorized by words in articles of association seeking to explain a clause in the memorandum relating to the borrowing of money. The granting of perpetual annuities stands in like case. I am therefore not entitled to read article 17 for the purpose of saying that clause 3 (7) of the memorandum must be construed to mean something which is not borrowing. I can read the articles in order to explain the sort of borrowing which the memorandum contemplated. But I cannot read the articles for the purpose of saying that the memorandum did not mean borrowing, but meant the granting of perpetual annuities. For these reasons I think that the granting of perpetual annuities by this company is ultra vires, and, if this be so, it results that the applicant's right, if this be a perpetual annuity, cannot be greater than to have the return of the money paid to the company upon the stock. But, secondly, it is said that article 17 and the resolutions of the 29th of June, 1883, may be read as expressing a certain contract of borrowing—namely, a borowing upon the terms that the company, while it is a going concern, shall not be at liberty to call upon the debenture stockholder to accept the repayment of his loan, but shall pay him 6 per cent. upon it. For this purpose it is pointed out that article 17 speaks of the debenture stock, bonds, and debentures alike as capable of being irredeemable, and speaks of the annual sum payable by the company as interest, and that the resolutions provide that the aggregate amount of the debenture stock shall be a charge and shall until default by the company constitute a floating charge only. From this it is argued that this was a borrowing on the terms that the company should have no option to repay so long as there was an undertaking to answer the annual sum. If this second contention be right, then I think it follows that this applicant who asks by his summons a determination of what is the proper amount to pay for redemption is not entitled to receive more than the amount which upon this view was borrowed—namely, the £2,000 paid upon the stock. In either view it appears to me that the applicant is entitled to no more than the interest to date and the par value of his stock. The right declaration upon the summons, I think, is that the applicant is not entitled to receive out of the assets of the company any sum over and above the par value of his stock and the interest upon the same.

Solicitors, Withers & Withers; Dawes & Sons; Bompas, Bischoff, Dodgson, Coxe, & Bompas.

Chan. Div.
Warrington, J. } May 6.

In re B——'S TRUSTS.

Practice—Payment out of court—Evidence—Presumption of death.

Where an application is made for the payment out of court of funds by persons claiming as upon the presumption of death by reason of seven years' absence of the person to whose credit the funds stand, and the court is satisfied with the evidence, it is not in accordance with modern practice for the court to require security to refund before making the order for payment out.

Petition.

The testator in this case gave one fourth part of his residuary estate to his brother J. B. and the nine children of J. B. by name, including H. C. B., or such of them as should be living at the death of the testator, in equal shares.

The testator died on the 9th of July, 1898, and his will was duly proved.

H. C. B. was up to the 9th of January, 1898, a lieutenant in the Warwickshire regiment, then stationed at Chatham. On that day he parted from a friend in Piccadilly-circus, stating that he was going to Chatham that evening to rejoin his regiment. He never rejoined his regiment and had never since been heard of. He was of the age of twenty-six years and in good health and spirits when last seen.

The testator's executors distributed nine-tenths of the said one-fourth share and paid the remaining one-tenth, representing the share of H. C. B. in case he survived the testator, into court under the Trustee Act.

Seven years having elapsed since the 9th of January, 1898, J. B. and the eight other children presented this petition for payment out to them of the funds in court, being a sum of £687 Consols or thereabouts, in equal shares upon the footing that H. C. B. must be presumed to be dead and to have predeceased the testator in the absence of evidence that he survived.

A. C. Nesbitt, for the petitioners.—There is a question as to whether the practice requires the petitioners to give security to refund in cases of this kind, such security having been required in Dowley v. Winfield, 14 Sim. 277. In In re Hanby's Trusts, 25 W. R. 427, on the other hand, security was not required, and in Seton (6th ed.), vol. 2, p. 1655, it is stated that modern practice does not require it.

T. H. Carson, K.C. (amicus curiæ), mentioned In re Mileham's Trust, 15 Beav. 507, where security to refund was required before the order was made.

WARRINGTON, J., held upon the evidence that H. C. B. must be presumed to be dead, and to have predeceased the testator, and made the order for payment out, without requiring any security to refund, holding that the modern practice was for the court to make the order when satisfied upon the evidence; and when not completely satisfied, instead of taking security, to refuse the order.

Solicitor, W. T. de B. Barwell.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy and Ridley, JJ.) April 5.

EAST HAM URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL v. AYLETT. (a.)

Local government—Streets—Paving expenses—Owner at time of completion of the works—Owner in default—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 150, 257.

The owner of the premises when the works are completed is the person liable to summary proceedings in respect to expenses incurred by the local authority in respect of work executed by such authority for which notice has been given under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, although he be not the owner at the time the notice was served.

Case stated by justices of Essex, sitting at a petty session, held at Stratford, Essex, in respect to an information preferred by the East Ham Urban District Council, the appellants, against George Henry Aylett, the respondent, for the recovery of moneys claimed to be due to the appellants by the respondent under sections 150, 257 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

The material paragraphs of the case are: (2) It was proved that the part of Nelson-street to which the matter of the said information relates is not a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, and that it was not sewered, levelled, paved, metalled, flagged, channelled, and made good to the satisfaction of the urban authority. (4) (a) On the 28th of August, 1900, a copy of this notice (i.e., the notice required by section 150) was served by registered letter as prescribed by section 267 on C. A. Nicholl, as owner, he being then in receipt of the rack-rents of the premises as agent for some other persons, not the respondent. The said notice was addressed to the said C. A. Nicholl by name. (7) The appellants carried out the works and completed the same in the month of July, 1901. (8) The respondent became the owner of the said premises by purchase on the 27th of March, 1901, and he sold the premises on the 25th of June, 1902. (9) Cost of such work was duly apportioned by the surveyor to the appellants in the month of July, 1903, and the notice of such apportionment and demand for payment of the apportioned sum was duly served upon the respondent on the 10th day of March, 1904. (12) It was admitted both by the appellants and respondent (a) That the respondent was not the owner of the said premises, Nos. 2 to 28 (even numbers), Nelson-street, at the time when the notice to do the work was served; (b) that he was the owner of the premises in July, 1901, the date when the works were completed; (c) that he was not the owner at the date of the apportionment and demand for payment—namely, the 10th of March, 1904. (14) The respondent contended that he was not liable, as he was not the owner at the date when the apportionment was made and money demanded.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether, under all the circumstances of the case, the magistrates were justified in dismissing the case on the information.

The Public Health Act, 1875, s. 150, enacts: "Where any street within any urban district (not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large) . . . is not sewered, levelled, paved, metalled, flagged, channelled . . . to the satisfaction of the urban authority, such authority may by notice addressed to the respective owners or occupiers of the premises fronting . . . such parts thereof as may require to be sewered . . . require them to sewer . . . within a time to be specified in such notice. If such notice is not complied with, the urban authority may, if they think fit, execute the works mentioned therein, and may recover in a summary manner the expenses incurred by them in so doing from the owners in default, according to the frontage of their respective premises, and in such proportion as is settled by the surveyor of the urban authority. . . ."

Section 257 enacts: "Where any local authority have incurred any expenses for the repayment whereof the owner of the premises for or in respect of which the same are incurred is made liable under this Act . . . such expenses may be recovered . . . from any person who is the owner of such premises when the works are completed . . . and until the recovery of such expenses and interest the same shall be a charge upon the premises in respect of which they were incurred."

Macmorran, K.C. (Temple Martin with him), for the appellant council. — It has never yet been decided that the owner, who was not the owner at the time when the notice under section 150 was served, is liable for paving expenses although he be owner at the time of the completion of the works. But section 257 is quite clear that the expenses may be recovered from any person who is the owner of such premises when the works are completed. It says nothing about the owner in default. In the recently reported case in the Court of Appeal, Millard v. Balby-with-Hexthorpe Urban District Council, ante 165, [1905] 1 K. B. 60, it is quite true the person made liable was both the owner in default and when the works were completed, but the judgments only proceeded upon the latter distinction and in his judgment Collins, M.R., apparently deals with this case. On p. 64 he says: "Whether in the terms of the section alone (i.e., section 150) the owner making default in doing the works required by the notice would remain permanently liable, although he did not continue to be owner at the time of the completion of the works, it is not necessary to consider. For, when we come to section 257, we find that in absolutely unambiguous terms it makes the person who is owner when the works are completed liable. Whether any other person would also be liable it is not necessary to consider." A case very near the present, where there was a charge on the premises under section 257, is In re Allen and Driscoll's Contract, 52 W. R. 680, [1904] 2 Ch. 226. There the purchaser had to bear the burden of the charge, as he was the owner at the completion of the works, although the vendor was the owner in default. Of course now that we have the decision in the Balby case the question of ownership at the time of apportionment and demand no longer arises.

I. A. Symmons (Maurice N. Drucquer with him), for the respondent.—Cases of charges under section 257 are not authorities for cases of summary proceedings under the same section, otherwise there would have been little reason to take the Balby case to the Court of Appeal, for In re Buttersworth and Richer, [1888] 37 Ch. D. 535, would have been ample authority. In the Balby case the judgments were based upon the fact that the owner Millard was the owner in default. See Collins, M.R., at p. 64, and Stirling, L.J., at p. 67: "If that be the meaning Millard remains liable, for he was the owner of the premises when the notice to do the work was given and he failed to comply with it, and he was also owner when the works were completed. Therefore it appears to me in the words of the Act his liability is clearly made out." If a decision is given against the respondent then the words of section 150 "may recover in a summary manner the expenses from the owners in default" become meaningless. They must mean either (1) the owners who are owners at time of completion of the works; or (2) who are not owners at time of completion. Reg. v. Swindon Local Board, 27 W. R. 732, 4 Q. B. D. 305, decided against the latter view, and an adverse decision would make the former view unnecessary, because ownership in default would be altogether unnecessary to ground liability.

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—Without saying that the point is exactly covered by Millard v. Balby-with-Hexthorpe Urban District Council, it is absolutely necessary for Mr. Symmons, and he has ably sought to do so, to explain the passage from the judgment of the Master of the Rolls where, speaking of section 257 and of the persons liable under that section, he says: [His lordship repeated the passage quoted by Mr. Macmorran.] Unless we say that was absolutely unnecessary for the decision or was not the point he was considering, it would have great weight. On looking at section 257 it seems to me to fix the liability upon the person who is the owner of the premises at the time of completion because it provides that "where any local authority have incurred expenses whereof the owner of the premises for or in respect of which the same are incurred, is made liable under this Act . . . such expenses may be recovered from any person who is the owner of the premises when the works are completed." It hence refers to the person upon whom the notice is served under section 150 and supposes the possibility of a change of ownership and instead of saying "may be recovered from such person," it says, "from any person who is the owner of the premises when the works are completed." It does contemplate a different period of time, viz., the time of completion as distinguished from the time of default, and it does contemplate the possibility of a different person being the owner at the time of the completion of the works. Moreover, although I agree that for the purposes of considering the liability to summary proceedings under section 150 and section 257, the cases dealing with a charge on the premises are not really authorities and that vendor and purchaser cases should not be cited as authorities on the point, yet In re Allen and Driscoll's Contract, [1904] 2 Ch. 226, does show that for the purpose of ascertaining when the actual liability arises, the period of completion of the work is the period to be taken into consideration; for in that case the person in default was the vendor, but the person who was the owner of the premises at the time of completion of the work was the purchaser, and it was held that the purchaser must bear the burden. I come to the conclusion that the person liable is the owner of the premises at the time of completion, whether we take the words of section 257 itself or whether we take the view that a contrary decision could not be supported in the face of Millard v. Balby-with-Hexthorpe Urban District Council, [1905] 1 Q. B. 60; for I think the Master of the Rolls used language by way of obiter dicta which was intended to cover this case, although Stirling, L.J., did not go quite so far. The appeal must be allowed with costs and the case go back to the justices with an order to convict.

KENNEDY and RIDLEY, JJ., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for appellants, Wilson & Son.

Solicitors for respondent, Surtees & Surtees.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy and Ridley, JJ.) April 5.

TROUGHTON v. MANNING. (a.)

Motor-car—Reckless driving—"Having regard to all the circumstances of the case"—Motor-car Act, 1903 (3 Ed. 7, c. 36), s. 1, sub-section 1.

The offence, created by section 1, sub-section 1, of the Motor-car Act, 1903, of driving a motor-car on a public highway recklessly or at a speed which is dangerous to the public, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, is not committed when the speed is in itself reasonable and the person injured is a person not on the highway but on the car itself.

Case stated by the justices of Ramsgate on an information by the appellant against the respondent, a collector of bridge tolls at Sandwich, for that the appellant on the 23rd of July, 1904, drove a motor-car recklessly, contrary to the Motor-car Act, 1903, s. 1, sub-section 1.

The justices convicted the appellant, and fined him £20 with costs £3 18s.

The material facts as set out in the case were: The appellant on the 23rd of July, 1904, drove his motor-car over Sandwich Bridge, crossing the River Stour from the Ramsgate side, being stopped by the respondent a short distance from, and before reaching the toll-gate, situated on the bridge at the side nearer to Sandwich. No demand was made upon the appellant for payment of any toll before he entered on the bridge, although certain notices were exhibited in the roadway. The appellant was informed by the respondent that a toll was payable for the passage of the bridge, but he declined to pay, and told the respondent to take the registered number of the car and backed it off the bridge, on the same side on which he had entered it—namely, the Ramsgate side, and turned it round with a view of proceeding in the direction in which he had come. The respondent thereupon placed himself in front of the car with a view to prevent its proceeding further. The appellant, having warned the respondent to keep clear, set the car in motion. The respondent thereupon proceeded to the near side of the car with a view to seizing and detaining it or some part of it. The appellant proceeded along the the road to Ramsgate at a pace which was admitted to be not more than twelve miles an hour, with the respondent hanging on the side of the car, and the respondent was carried 213 yards in that position with his heels on the ground. The respondent asked the appellant to stop, which he failed to do, and eventually the respondent let go the car and fell to the ground and was picked up in an insensible condition. The speed of the car while the respondent was hanging thereon was in itself a reasonable speed, and no danger was caused to any person other than the respondent. It was contended for the respondent that the driving was reckless within section 1, sub-section 1, and for the appellant that it was not.

The justices convicted the appellant of reckless driving in view of all the circumstances of the case.

Section 1, sub-section 1, of the Motor-car Act, 1904, enacts: "If any person drives any motor-car on a public highway recklessly or negligently, or at a speed or in a manner which is dangerous to the public, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, including the nature, condition, and use of the highway, and to the amount of traffic which actually is at the time, or which might reasonably be expected to be, on the highway, that person shall be guilty of an offence under the Act."

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

C. W. Mathews, for the appellant.—There is no evidence here of reckless driving, the justices having found to the contrary. The words in the section "having regard to all the circumstances of the case" do not apply to reckless or negligent driving: Smith v. Boon, 49 W. R. 480, 84 L. T. 593.

Drury, for the respondent.—The only question is whether there was evidence of reckless driving. It is really a question of fact. Reckless driving has no necessary relation to speed at all. The man actually asked the driver to stop, and it was reckless driving to drive when the man was evidently in a dangerous position.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This is a case which raises a question of considerable difficulty, and was very properly put by Mr. Drury in arguing the case. It depends entirely upon whether there was evidence upon which the justices could find, under the circumstances of this case, that there had been reckless driving within the meaning of section 1, sub-section 1, of the Motor-car Act, 1903. The facts bearing upon the point are that the toll-keeper, quite rightly, tried to get toll from the motor-car driver when the car had passed over the bridge and had turned back. The driver refused to pay. The toll-keeper got on to the car, which was at that time off, or very nearly off, the bridge, and hung on to it for some distance. Then, according to what was stated in paragraph 5 of the case, "the respondent asked the driver to stop" to let him get off. The next paragraph of the special case is also material: "The speed at which the car was running was a reasonable speed, and no danger was caused to any person other than the respondent." It was contended by Mr. Mathews that the magistrates were wrong in taking into consideration, with respect to negligence and reckless driving, the words "having regard to all the circumstances of the case, including the nature, condition, and use of the highway . . ." It is quite impossible, in my opinion, to consider a case of negligent driving without having regard to these matters mentioned in the section. It is contended that these words "having regard to the circumstances of the case" only relate to "at a speed or in a manner which is dangerous to the public." I do not think it makes much difference, for they are the kind of considerations which people must take into view before it could be said that there was negligent or reckless driving. I have come to the conclusion, with some hesitation, that this conviction cannot be supported. Before I give my reasons why I think it cannot be supported I wish to say I am not countenancing the practice which it seems to me does prevail with drivers of motor-cars where there is only one person on the road. As a fact they think under such circumstances, so long as they blow their horn, they may go at any rate of speed within the statutory limit, and persons must get out of their way. It seems to me that that is not the case which arises here, and although the magistrates have thought it a serious one, it seems to me that there is no evidence of any breach of the section, having regard to what is intended to be considered by the section. Possibly some question may arise as to the personal liability of the driver to the toll-keeper. The magistrates have held that the speed was reasonable in itself, and that there was no danger threatened to any person other than the respondent. That being so, the personal grievance of the toll-keeper against the driver in respect to his conduct is not sufficient as evidence of reckless or negligent driving having regard to all the circumstances of the case. It does seem a case of an unfortunate occurrence which may have been caused by want of reasonable care towards this particular man, but I think we should be straining the statute if we made it a criminal offence in a case where there was no reckless or negligent driving in respect to any person on the highway, but where a man got upon the car and was injured by the neglect of the driver to stop. In a case where the justices have got any evidence before them of an offence within the statute, we should be slow to interfere with their finding, but we ought not to strain the statute or put upon it a construction which would make it a criminal offence to injure a person independent of whether it could be regarded as reckless or negligent driving within the statute. The appeal must be allowed.

KENNEDY, J.—There is very little which I can usefully add to what my lord has said. I may express my view a little differently. The toll-keeper was, as the case says, a person who, rightly or wrongly, had a notion that he could seize in some way part of the car. I do not know what that means. It was suggested by counsel that he thought he could levy a distress. However, he became by clinging on, a sort of uninvited and undesirable traveller on the car—no doubt not on a comfortable seat, but, on the contrary, in a position of danger, perched, if I may say so, on the side of the car. The intention of the section is to deal with misconduct in the management of the car. I do not think the intention of the section is to punish a person for reckless conduct which may have an ill effect upon a person on the car itself. It means to prescribe a punishment for conduct in the management of the car occasioning injury to persons on the highway lawfully using it, though acting negligently themselves. Here the person injured became a passenger on the car, against the will of the owner no doubt, and it seems to me that the Act does not mean to deal with speed or management of the car which may be dangerous to those on the car itself, whether by right or by invitation or as trespassers. We can imagine the case where the speed was such that there would be a real danger of the occupants being thrown out. But could the man be said to be driving recklessly within the meaning of the Act to the danger of persons in the car but to nobody else? I think not. It was not intended to create an offence in respect of persons in the car, whether trespassers or not. The appeal must be allowed.

RIDLEY, J.—I agree.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for appellant, Sandford & Co.

Solicitors for respondent, Hare & Co., for Hardman, Deal.

C. C. R.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy, Ridley, Channell, and Phillimore, JJ.)

Jan. 28; Feb. 20.

REX v. OSBORNE. (a.)

Criminal law—Indecent assault—Evidence—Complaint by prosecutrix—Admissibility.

Upon the trial of a prisoner on a charge of indecent assault on a girl under the age of thirteen, her consent therefore being not material to the charge, a complaint made to a third party in the absence of the prisoner is admissible in evidence, not as part of the res gestæ or as evidence of the truth of the things alleged, but as confirming the testimony of the prosecutrix.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Reg. v. Lillyman, 44 W. R. 654, [1896] 2 Q. B. 167, considered.

Case stated by the chairman of the Worcestershire Quarter Sessions.

The prisoner was indicted on two counts, first for indecently assaulting one Keziah Parkes, and on a second count with a common assault upon her.

It was proved that he kept a fried fish shop in Kidderminster at a distance of five minutes' walk from where the prosecutrix resided, and on the day in question Keziah Parkes, a girl of the age of twelve years, her sister Nelly Parkes (aged eight) and a girl named Mary Moule (aged eleven) went to the prisoner's shop about 3.30 p.m. to buy potato chips. They had been in the habit of going to the shop and selling dripping to the prisoner. Mary Moule asked the prisoner if he wanted any dripping, and he replied that they could fetch him some if they would come back at once. Mary Moule and Nelly Parkes went back to fetch the dripping. Keziah Parkes asked if she should go with them, but the prisoner said: "No, stop with me." As soon as the other girls were gone the prisoner took Keziah Parkes into the back kitchen, pulled her on to his lap, and indecently assaulted her. Keziah Parkes offered no resistance or objection. The prisoner left the kitchen to attend to a customer in the shop, and when the customer left the prisoner returned to the kitchen and asked Keziah Parkes to come back on to his lap, but she refused and ran off towards home. On her way home she met Mary Moule and her sister coming back to the shop, and they asked her "why she was going home, and why she did not wait till they came back." She had not spoken to them till this question was asked. Mary Moule was called, and was asked when she met Keziah Parkes in the street, "Did you speak to her?" Moule replied, "Yes, I asked her why she did not stop for me." The question was then asked, "What did she say?" Counsel for the prisoner objected to the question on the grounds (a) that an answer given by a prosecutrix to a question on a charge of indecent assault could not be given in evidence, as such an answer was not a complaint within the meaning of Reg. v. Lillyman, 44 W. R. 665, [1896] 2 Q. B. 167; and (b) that as the prosecutrix was under the age of thirteen her consent was not material to the charge, and consequently any statement she made, whether in reply to a question or not, could not be given in evidence, as the rule in Reg. v. Lillyman applied only to cases where want of consent was a material element to the charge. Counsel for the prisoner relied upon the decision in Reg. v. Merry, 19 Cox C. C. 442 that an answer to the question was not a complaint; and also upon the decision in Rex v. Kingham, 66 J. P. 393, that where consent is not a material element the statement of the prosecutrix is not admissible. Counsel for the prosecution relied upon the decision in Reg. v. Kiddle, 19 Cox C. C. 77, where it was decided that the rule in Reg. v. Lillyman applied to cases where the girl on whom the offence was alleged to have been committed was of such tender years that the court directed her evidence to be taken, but not upon oath, and where the question of her consent was immaterial.

The chairman, being of opinion that the conduct of the prosecutrix in running away home and not waiting for her companions was part of the res gestæ, and that her statement would be evidence why she ran away home, allowed the question to be put, on the authority of Reg. v. Jolly, 60 J. P. 569, and Reg. v. Kiddle. Moule replied to the question why the prosecutrix did not stop for her, "Because she did not like the prisoner, and would not go near him again, as he unbuttoned her drawers. That was all she said." The prisoner, when charged at the police station, said: "She came and sat on my lap herself. She has done it many times, and is more to blame than me." The chairman, in summing up, told the jury that it was immaterial whether the girl consented or not to what was done to her, but that they ought not to convict unless in their opinion there was corroborative evidence, and that the only corroboration of the child's story was the prisoner's statement at the police station. He did not refer in any way in his summing up to the answer given by the girl Keziah Parkes to the question asked her by Mary Moule. The prisoner was convicted and judgment was postponed.

The questions of law for the court were: Whether the fact that a statement made by a prosecutrix to a third person immediately after the alleged indecent assault was in answer to a question from such a person, prevented such statement from being given in evidence in accordance with the rule laid down in Reg. v. Lillyman? (2) If such a statement could be given in evidence, although it was in answer to a question, did the fact that the offence charged was one where the consent of the prosecutrix was immaterial make such statement inadmissible? (3) Could such statement be given in evidence when the prosecutrix did not state that the act charged was against her will?

J. R. V. Marchant, for the prisoner.

J. B. Mathews, for the prosecution.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 20.—The judgment of the COURT was read by

RIDLEY, J.—In this case the prisoner Osborne was tried at the Worcestershire Quarter Sessions on an indictment containing two counts, the first for indecent assault and the second for common assault on Keziah Parkes, a girl twelve years old. It appeared that Keziah Parkes, along with a younger sister and another girl named Mary Moule, of a similar age, went to a shop kept by the prisoner for the purpose of buying chips. Two of the girls—namely, Moule and the younger sister—went out of the shop on an errand, and during their absence the alleged assault was committed by him on Keziah. She then left the shop, and on her way home met Mary Moule with her sister coming back to the shop. Mary Moule was called at the trial and was asked, when she met Keziah Parkes in the street, "Did you speak to her?" Moule replied, "Yes, I asked her why she did not stop for me." The next question put to the witness was, "What did she say?" Objection was then taken for the prisoner that the witness's answer was not admissible in evidence, but the chairman admitted the evidence. The girl's answer was as follows: "Because she did not like the prisoner, and would not go near him again, as he unbuttoned her drawers. That was all she said." The prisoner was convicted, and the point raised for our decision is whether this ruling was right. It was contended for the prisoner that the evidence was inadmissible. First, because the answer made by the girl was not a complaint, but a statement or conversation having been made in answer to a question, and secondly, because as Keziah Parkes was under the age of thirteen her consent was not material to the charge. As to the first point, the case of Reg. v. Merry was quoted. In that case a question had been put to a girl of nine years old by her mother in a case of indecent assault, and the learned judge ruled that as the proposed evidence was a statement made in answer to a question it was a conversation and not a complaint, and he declined to allow it to be given in evidence. It does not appear, however, from the report what the question was that was put to the girl. It appears to us that the mere fact that the statement is made in answer to a question in such cases is not of itself sufficient to make it inadmissible as a complaint. Questions of a suggestive or leading character will indeed have that effect and will render it inadmissible, but a question such as this, put by the mother or other person, "What is the matter?" or "Why are you crying?" will not do so. These are natural questions which a person in charge will be likely to put. On the other hand, if she were asked, "Did So-and-so (naming the prisoner) assault you?" "Did he do this and that to you?" then the result would be different and the statement ought to be rejected. In each case the decision on the character of the question put as well as other circumstances, such as the relationship of the questioner to the complainant, must be left to the discretion of the presiding judge. If the circumstances indicate that but for the questioning there probably would have been no voluntary complaint the answer is inadmissible. If the question merely anticipates a statement which the complainant was about to make it is not rendered inadmissible by the fact that the questioner happened to speak first. In this particular case we think that the chairman of quarter sessions acted rightly and that the putting of this particular question did not render the statement inadmissible.

Upon the second point it was contended that although under the decision of Reg. v. Lillyman the particulars of a complaint made may in some circumstances be given in evidence on a charge of rape that ruling does not extend to charge of criminal knowledge or indecent assault, where, as in the present case, consent is not legally material. This contention is supported by Rex v. Kingham decided in 1902, but, on the other hand, in Reg. v. Kiddle, 19 Cox. C. C. 77, decided in 1898, it was ruled that the decision in question does extend to all charges of this character whether consent is a defence or not. In Reg. v. Lillyman the prisoner was charged on an indictment containing three counts: First, attempt to have carnal knowledge of a girl above thirteen and under sixteen; second, an assault with intent to ravish her; third, an indecent assault. The prisoner was found guilty upon the first count only, and upon that count, in order to establish guilt, it was not necessary to prove want of consent. But the prosecutrix swore that what was done to her was done without her consent, and the court in giving judgment said that as she had so deposed the complaint was admissible. Two points were taken and argued, first, whether the fact that the complaint was made was evidence; second, whether particulars of it could be given; and it is to the latter of these that the greater part of the judgment relates. This point was not argued before us as distinguished from the first point on the present occasion, and the only question, therefore, for our determination is whether where consent is no part of the charge the complaint is admissible. By the judgment in Reg. v. Lillyman it was decided that the complaint was admissible not as evidence of the facts complained of nor as being a part of the res gestæ (which it was not), but as evidence of the consistency of the conduct of the prosecutrix with the story told by her in the witness-box and as being inconsistent with her consent to that of which she complains. Mr. Marchant argued upon this that the reasons so given were one only, and that the consistency of the complaint with the story given by the prosecutrix was material only so far as the latter alleged non-consent. If, however, the argument were sound, the words in question might have been omitted from the sentence and it would have been sufficient to say that the complaint was admissible only and solely because it negatived consent. We think, however, if it were a question of the meaning of words that the better construction of the judgment is that while the court dealt with the charge in question as involving in fact though not in law the question of consent on the part of the prosecutrix, yet the reasons given for admitting the complaint were two—first, that it was consistent with her story in the witness-box, and secondly, that it was inconsistent with consent. The reasoning proceeded thus: On the second and third counts consent was material in law, on the first it was material in fact, there is for this purpose no difference between the two. It is not therefore because the charge itself involves proof of the absence of consent that the evidence is admissible, on the contrary the prosecutrix herself can make it evidence by deposing that she did not consent when that is no part of the charge. In other words, whether non-consent be legally a necessary part of the issue, or whether, on the other hand, it is what may be called a collateral issue of fact, the complaint becomes admissible. But how does non-consent become a collateral issue of fact? The answer must be in consequence of the story told by the prosecutrix in the witness-box. And the judgment treats the two cases on the same footing. If non-consent be a part of the story told by the prosecutrix, or if it be legally a part of the charge, in each case alike the complaint is admissible. But if that is so does not the reasoning apply equally to other parts of the story, and not merely to the part in which the prosecutrix has denied consent. If not, it seems illogical to allow, as the court did allow, that the whole of the story may be given in evidence. The true result is, we think, that while the decision in Reg. v. Lillyman is not strictly on all fours with the present case, yet the reasoning which it contains answers the question now raised for decision. But however that may be, it appears to us that in accordance with principle such complaints are admissible, not merely as negativing consent but because they are consistent with the story of the prosecutrix. In all ordinary cases, indeed, the principle must be observed which rejects statements made by anyone in the prisoner's absence. Charges of this kind form an exceptional class, and in them such statements ought under proper safeguards to be admitted. Their consistency with the story told is from the very nature of such cases of special importance. Did the woman make a complaint at once? If so, that is consistent with her story. Did she not do so? That is inconsistent. And in either case the matter is important for the jury.

It is in accordance with this view that in early times it was incumbent on the woman who brought an appeal of rape to prove that while the offence was recent she raised "hue and cry" in the neighbouring towns and showed her injuries and clothing to men, and that the appellant might raise as a defence the denial that she had raised the hue and cry. The passages in Bracton De Coronâ, lib. 3, fol. 147, and in the Pleas of the Crown, Selden Society, vol. 1, and Warwickshire Eyre, A.D. 1221, p. 109, as also in the Mirror of Justices, Selden Society, vol. 7, and Exceptions, cap. 21, p. 103, are interesting and instructive as showing that the distinction in this special class of case has been recognized from the earliest times. The hue and cry was the phrase used generally for the pursuit of a felon, but we have not found any other case than rape in which it was for the prosecution to show that they had raised it or in which it was a defence to show that it had not been raised. It is, however, right to refer to a passage in Bracton De Coronâ, lib. 3, fol. 139, in which he describes the objection made by an appellant that the hue and cry had not been raised as ista generalis exceptio et primâ: see this passage referred to in the late Mr. Justice Stephen's History of Criminal Law, vol. 1, p. 246. But it seems to have been specially applicable to this class of case only. A further weighty authority for the existence of this exception to an acknowledged general rule is to be found in Hale's Pleas of the Crown, vol. 1, p. 633, where it is stated that the party ravished is to give evidence on oath, and her credibility must be left to the jury. "For instance, if the witness be of good fame, if she presently discovered the offence, made pursuit after the offender, showed circumstances and signs of the injury . . . these and the like are concurring evidences to give greater probability to her testimony when proved by others as well as herself. But on the other side, if she concealed the injury for any considerable time after she had opportunity to complain . . . and she made no outcry when the fact was supposed to be done when and where it is probable she might be heard by others, these and the like circumstances carry a strong presumption that her testimony is false or feigned." We think these words may be adopted as stating the law accurately, and they indicate that these complaints are to be admitted not only because they bear on the question of consent, but also because they bear on the probability of her testimony in a case in which without such or other corroboration reliance might not be placed on her testimony. Our attention has been called to the case of The Commonwealth v. Cleary, (1898) 172 Mass. 175, decided in 1898 by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts. In that case the indictments were for unlawfully abusing a child under the age of sixteen years. The girl had made a complaint, and the fact was given in evidence. No question arose as to the admissibility of its details, but the point reserved for the decision of the court on conviction of the prisoner was whether the proof of this complaint could be admitted. The argument proceeded on the question whether it was too remote in point of time, but Holmes, J., in giving the judgment of the court, said: "It is not argued that the common law in cases of rape does not apply: see Commonwealth v. Roosnell, (1886) 143 Mass. 32; Commonwealth v. Hackett, (1898) 170 Mass. 194, 196. The rule that in trials for rape the Government may or must prove that the woman concerned made complaint soon after the commission of the offence is a perverted survival of the ancient requirement that she should make hue and cry as a preliminary to bringing her appeal: Glanville, xiv., 6; Bracton, fol. 147*a*; Fleta, 1, c. 25, s. 14; Statute 4 Ed. 1, Statute 2. Appeals became obsolete and left rape to be dealt with by indictment before the development of the modern law of evidence." He then quotes the passage from Hale, P.C., above set out, and says: "If it means what it has been taken to mean, that the Government can prove fresh complaint as part of its original case, it cannot be justified by the general principles of evidence which now prevail. . . . The evidence is not admitted as part of the res gestæ, or as evidence of the truth of the things alleged, or solely for the purpose of disproving consent, but for the more general purpose of confirming the testimony of the ravished woman: Reg. v. Lillyman." And further on he says: "The test is whether according to the principles of the exception her having made the complaint tends to corroborate testimony given by the child at the trial." For these reasons the evidence was in that case held to be admissible.

With that statement of the law we concur. We are at the same time not insensible of the great importance of carefully observing the proper limits within which such evidence should be given. It is only to cases of this kind that the authorities on which our judgment rests apply, and our judgment also is to them restricted. It applies only where there is a complaint not elicited by questions of a leading and inducing or intimidating character, and only when it is made at the first opportunity after the offence which reasonably offers itself. Within such bounds we think the evidence should be put before the jury, the judge being careful to inform the jury that the statement is not evidence of the facts complained of, and must not be regarded by them, if believed, as other than corroborative of the complainant's credibility, and when consent is in issue, of the absence of consent. For these reasons we think the conviction should be affirmed.

Solicitor for the prosecution, G. A. Weston, Kidderminster.

Solicitors for the defence, Stallard & Turner, for A. Spencer Thursfield, Kidderminster.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). March 24.

OGDENS (LIMITED) v. NELSON.
OGDENS (LIMITED) v. TELFORD. (a.)

Contract — Construction — Agreement to participate in profits of business for a specific period—Sale within that time—Implied stipulation.

The appellants, who were wholesale tobacconists, agreed with the respondent in consideration of his undertaking to become a customer and not to sign any agreement with any company or firm which would prevent him from buying or selling the appellants' goods, and to continue to buy and sell such goods, that the respondent should for four years share in a distribution by the appellants of an annual bonus among such of their customers as should purchase direct from them, the distribution to be made according to the purchases for the year. Before the expiration of the four years the appellants sold their business and went into liquidation. The respondent had fulfilled his part of the undertaking.

Held, that there was an implied undertaking on the part of the appellants that they would continue to carry on their business, and would not do any voluntary act which would make it impossible to distribute the sums which they had undertaken to distribute, and therefore that by parting with their business there was a breach of contract, which entitled the respondent to damages.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (ante, p. 71, [1904] 2 K. B. 410) affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (ante, p. 71, [1904] 2 K. B. 410) (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.), affirming that of Lord Alverstone, L.C.J. (51 W. R. 696, [1903] 2 K. B. 287).

The case is set out at length in the court below. Shortly stated it is as follows:

The appellants sent out a circular to retail tobacconists to the following effect: "Bonus distribution.—Our entire net profits and £200,000 per year for the next four years, commencing the 2nd of April, 1902. We will for the next four years distribute to such of our customers . . . net profits on goods sold by us in the United Kingdom and £200,000 per year, &c. . . . ." Distribution to be in proportion to purchases made. Accompanying this circular there was a form of contract. "Messrs. Ogdens (Limited), Liverpool—Dear Sirs,—I beg to inform you that I have not signed the agreement with the Imperial Tobacco Co. (Limited), dated March, 1902, and in consideration of participating in your bonus distribution of the entire net profits on goods sold by you in the United Kingdom and £200,000 per year for the next four years, as set out in your particulars, I hereby agree not to sign it . . . and I also undertake to continue to buy, display, and sell your goods." This the respondent signed and sent to the appellants.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Pursuant to the bargain so made, the respondent dealt with Ogdens, and in July, 1902, received a share of £50,000, being one quarter of the £200,000, for the three months ending on the 2nd of July, 1902; and also received credit in account for his share of the bonus for the three months ending the 2nd of October, 1902.

In September, 1902, the appellants sold their business in the United Kingdom to the Imperial Tobacco Co., they ceased to carry on business in the United Kingdom and went into voluntary liquidation.

It was held by the Lord Chief Justice that it was an implied term of the contract that Ogdens would continue to carry on their business for the full period of four years, and that the respondent was entitled to damages. The Court of Appeal were of the same opinion.

Ogdens appealed.

Asquith, K.C., and F. E. Smith (Rufus Isaacs, K.C., and Hemmerde with them), for the appellants.

J. R. Randolph (Bankes, K.C., with him), for the respondents.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case, I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal was right and ought to be affirmed. I very much doubt whether in dealing with this contract we can get any light from other cases decided upon other forms of contract. I do not think the question here depends upon how much you can imply. That part of the contract upon which I rely, and on which the Court of Appeal relied, is that which is expressed.

It is clear that offers were made to the retail traders by rival associations in order to, as it was called, capture the tobacco trade. One association, the Imperial, offered for a named period to give them a certain amount of the profits, or a certain percentage of the profits, and to distribute by way of bonus £50,000. Upon which the appellants telegraphed to the customers generally, or at all events to this particular litigant: "Advise you not to sign Imperial agreement. See our circular in the morning." Now, the circular in the morning, which forms part of the contract, offers this bonus distribution: "Our entire net profits and £200,000 per year for the next four years." Is it possible to talk about there being no bargain in respect of this matter, and that you are to look to an implication for it? It appears to me that there is a definite offer, and that that distribution is to occupy four years. Then the acceptance seems to me to be equally free from doubt.

The acceptance is prepared for the signature of the intending customer by those who are making the offer, so that it is their own language which they get the customer to sign. Once that bargain is made and the customer signs it, whatever else may happen, there is undoubtedly not an implied but an express contract to distribute for four years during that period annually £200,000. There is no doubt that the meaning of this contract was that it was to last for four years. The customer was entitled to say: "I have given you my signature, and I have thereby enabled you—at all events, it is supposed by you that I have enabled you—to continue this strife between two associations. I have performed my part of this contract; now perform yours." It may be that the customer cannot compel them in law to carry on their business; it may be that he cannot prevent them from selling themselves as they did; but having done it they are bound to pay the damages which are consequent upon their having put it out of their power to carry on the business, and having failed to perform their contract to pay the respondent a proper proportion of the £200,000 a year, which is all that is now insisted on by him.

Under the circumstances I construe this document without any reference to any other documents. I confess I am very jealous of attempting to interpret one contract by another contract made under different circumstances. I look at this contract alone, and I cannot entertain a doubt that there was a breach of the contract, and I move that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

Lords MACNAGHTEN, JAMES, and LINDLEY concurred.

In the second appeal, which was similar, there was no argument.

Orders of the Court of Appeal affirmed, and both appeals dismissed with costs.

Solicitors, A. Middleton Rickards; Smith, Rendell, & Dodds, for A. H. Bullock, Cardiff; Bell, Brodrick, & Gray, for Cousins, Botsford, & Phœnix, Cardiff.

From C.A. (England). Feb. 17.

BOLITHO & CO. v. GIDLEY AND OTHERS. (a.)

Married woman — Separate property — Restraint on anticipation—Judgment—Income due after judgment —Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 19.

Income of a married woman which she is restrained from anticipating, accrued due since a judgment against her, cannot be taken in execution under that judgment.

Whiteley v. Edwards, 44 W. R. 530, [1896] 2 Q. B. 48, approved.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) affirming that of the judge at chambers.

The respondents were trustees of a married woman with separate property subject to a restraint on anticipation, and her income was regularly paid to her bankers, the appellants.

The appellants, to whom she was indebted, recovered judgment against her, and obtained a garnishee order nisi against the respondents to attach all debts due or accruing due from the respondents as trustees to the married woman. Between the judgment and the garnishee order the respondents received income of the married woman which was not due at the date of the judgment.

The Court of Appeal held that the judgment and garnishee order were ineffectual as against this income.

The bankers appealed.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Duke, K.C., and Morten, for the appellants.—Whiteley v. Edwards, 44 W. R. 530, [1896] 2 Q. B. 48, is indistinguishable, but the question has never been decided in this House.

They referred to Hood-Barrs v. Heriot, 44 W. R. 481, [1896] A. C. 174; the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 1, sub-section 2, and section 19 of the Act of 1893; Holtby v. Hodgson, 38 W. R. 68, 24 Q. B. D. 103; Hyde v. Hyde, 36 W. R. 708, 13 P. D. 166; Cox v. Bennett, 39 W. R. 401, [1891] 1 Ch. 617; Hood-Barrs v. Cathcart, 42 W. R. 628, [1894] 2 Q. B. 567.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Abrahams, for the respondents, were not heard.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—So far as I am concerned I have listened with great attention to the very ingenious argument presented by the learned counsel at the bar, but it appears to me that the whole question comes back to what has been the operation of the Acts of Parliament referred to. I have been unable to follow any suggestion which would not have the effect of defeating the Acts of Parliament if the proposition insisted upon here were maintained.

I do not think the matter is susceptible of very lengthened exposition. In my view the Acts of Parliament have prohibited in effect the execution which is insisted upon here; and beyond saying that that is my view of the true construction of the two Acts referred to, I am unable to go any further. It appears to me to be hopeless to expound in any clearer way the operation of the statutes otherwise than by the language of the statutes themselves.

Under these circumstances I content myself with saying that I think this appeal ought to be dismissed.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The case appears to me to be absolutely clear, and in my opinion the judgment appealed from is perfectly right. I think if effect were given to the contention of the appellants it would render all restraints upon anticipation absolutely inoperative. No doubt a married woman restrained from anticipation would still be prevented from entering into a contract with regard to the property as to which she was restrained; but she would have nothing to do but the very thing which the testator or settlor desired to prevent her doing—that is to say, run up debts; and then there might be a judgment against her of an anticipatory character, swooping down upon her property from time to time as it was received, so getting rid altogether of the restraint on anticipation.

I entirely agree in the judgment which has been proposed.

Lord LINDLEY.—I think this is a hopeless appeal. The Married Women's Property Acts emancipated married women from legal disabilities, but it left them under the disability which the courts of equity had put them under when they invented the restraint on anticipation. Whether that was a good policy or bad we have nothing to do with; but they did not emancipate them from that—they left them bound. This matter was very carefully considered in Scott v. Morley, 36 W. R. 67, 20 Q. B. D. 120; Hood-Barrs v. Cathcart, and Whiteley v. Edwardes. Those cases are all opposed to this appeal. The reasoning is based, of course, upon the language of the Act which was before the court in those days, and I do not see any answer at all to that reasoning. If you look at the cases on the other side, there is not one which helps the appellants. Holtby v. Hodgson does not help them; nor does Hyde v. Hyde, nor does Cox v. Bennett, nor Hood-Barrs v. Heriot. As regards the Act of 1893, whatever may be said of it, it does not help the appellants. It appears to me that this is really a hopeless appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Woodward & Co., for Woollcombe & Sons, Plymouth.

Solicitors for the respondents, Blair & W. B. Girling, for G. Gidley & Son, Plymouth.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) — May 2.

In re NORTH OF ENGLAND STEAMSHIP CO. (LIMITED AND REDUCED). (a.)

Company—Special resolution—Confirmation—Notice of meetings—Contingent notice—Articles of association—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 51.

A provision in the articles of association of a company to the effect that whenever it is intended to pass a special resolution the two meetings may be convened by one notice, and that it shall be no objection that the notice convenes the second meeting contingently on the resolution being duly passed at the first meeting, is not ultrà vires the company as being inconsistent with section 51 of the Companies Act, 1862, and a contingent notice given in conformance with such a provision is valid.

Alexander v. Simpson, 38 W. R. 161, 43 Ch. D. 139, distinguished.

Decision of Buckley, J. (ante, p. 442, [1905] 1 Ch. 609), reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Buckley, J. (reported, ante, p. 442, [1905] 1 Ch. 609) dismissing a petition presented by the above-named company for confirmation by the court of a reduction of capital in accordance with a special resolution of the company.

On the 4th of February, 1905, a notice in writing was given to the members of the company that an extraordinary general meeting of the company would be held on the 15th of February, at the place and time in the notice mentioned, at which the subjoined resolution (which was a resolution for the reduction of the company's capital) would be proposed. The notice also stated: "Should such resolution be duly passed by the required majority the same will be submitted for confirmation as a special resolution to a subsequent extraordinary general meeting of the company, which will be held on Friday, the third day of March, 1905, at the same time and place." Article 70 of the company's articles of association was in the following terms: "Seven clear days' notice shall be given to members of any meeting of the company, and whenever it is intended to pass a special resolution the two meetings may be convened by one and the same notice, and it shall be no objection to such notice that it only convenes the second meeting contingently on the resolution being passed by the requisite majority at the first meeting." The resolution was passed by a three-fourths majority at the meeting held on the 15th of February, and was duly confirmed at the meeting held on the 3rd of March.

Buckley, J., was of opinion that the notice of the second meeting did not comply with section 51 of the Companies Act, 1862. He held, therefore, that the special resolution had not been passed in the manner provided by the Act, and dismissed the petition.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The company appealed.

Martelli, for the company, cited Alexander v. Simpson, 38 W. R. 161, 43 Ch. D. 139; In re Espuela Land and Cattle Co., 48 W. R. 684; In re The Jenner Institute, 15 T. L. R. 394; Tiessen v. Henderson, 47 W. R. 459, [1899] 1 Ch. 861.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The question which we have to determine is whether the confirmatory meeting which was essential to the passing of this resolution was a meeting of which due and proper notice was given. It was said that the notice given was not a due and proper notice because it was not a notice of a meeting which would in any event take place, but was notice of a contingent meeting, which would take place only if something happened before the day fixed for the meeting—in other words, a notice that the meeting would be held for the purpose of confirming a resolution if the resolution submitted to the first meeting was duly passed. It was said that notice of such a contingent meeting was a bad notice, and the proceedings consequent upon it are invalid. And it was said that we ought so to hold in this case by reason of the decision of the Court of Appeal in Alexander v. Simpson. For myself I do not think that the decision in Alexander v. Simpson obliges us to hold that the notice of this confirmatory meeting was bad. When one looks at the judgments in that case one finds from the judgment of Bowen, L.J., that he was in no way dealing with section 51 of the Companies Act, 1862, but he was dealing with article 52 of the articles of association of the particular company there in question. With regard to that company, article 52, on which the question turned, provided: "Seven days' notice in writing specifying the place, the day, and the hour of meeting, and in case of special business the general nature of such business, shall be given to the members before every general meeting, but the non-receipt of such notice shall not invalidate the proceedings at any general meeting." Those being the terms of article 52, notice was given of an extraordinary general meeting, and then the notice continued: "Should such resolutions be duly passed the same will be submitted for confirmation as special resolutions to a subsequent extraordinary general meeting of the company, which will be held on Monday, the 29th of July, 1889, at the same time and place." The question which was really argued was what was the proper construction of that notice. Did it mean that the second meeting would in any event be held on the 29th of July, and the resolution for confirmation would then be submitted, provided such resolution had been previously passed, or did it mean that the meeting called for the 29th would only be held in the event of the resolution being passed previously subject to confirmation? The court held that according to the natural construction of that notice any shareholder would properly come to the conclusion that the second meeting would only be held contingently on the resolution being passed at the first meeting, and they refused to accede to the argument that the notice should be construed as a notice that the second meeting would be held in any event, and the resolution would be submitted for confirmation if passed at the earlier meeting. That is all that the court had to decide there, and it is remarkable that in the argument on behalf of the appellants this is said at p. 146 of 43 Ch. D.: "If the notice had said, 'If the resolutions are passed, a meeting to confirm them will be held on the 29th of July,' that, no doubt, would not have been a good notice; but what they say is, in substance, 'A second meeting will be held on the 29th of July, and if the resolutions are passed at the first meeting they will be submitted to the second for confirmation'; and that, we say, is a sufficient notice." It is plain, therefore, that the whole point there was the construction of the notice. The appellants there admitted that if the construction was that the meeting would only be held contingently upon the resolution being passed at the first meeting, the notice would, having regard to the terms of article 52, be invalid and insufficient. But we have nothing to do here with article 52. Those who drew the articles of this company were obviously desirous of having an article which differed from the article in Alexander v. Simpson. Accordingly there were added to the first part of article 70, which substantially coincides with the article in question in Alexander v. Simpson, concluding words which entirely differentiate it from article 52. It seems to me that the notice which has been given in the present case, which in effect is the same as the notice which was given and discussed in Alexander v. Simpson, has been made a proper notice so far as the articles of association are concerned by those words introduced into the concluding part of article 70. I think those words do amply justify the notice which has been given in the present case.

That being so, we have to decide in this case a question upon section 51 of the Companies Act, 1862. We have here article 70, which, in my judgment, does justify the notice given, and the notice, therefore, is valid unless article 70 is, by reason of the words at the conclusion of it, ultrà vires, and that depends upon section 51 of the Act. When one looks at that section I can see nothing to render article 70 ultrà vires. [His lordship read section 51, and continued:] The regulations of the company in the present case prescribe that notice may be given in effect in the form in which this notice has been given, and I myself am unable to see that there is anything in this article, which authorizes the giving notice of a contingent meeting, which is inconsistent with either the spirit or the letter of section 51. That section does not say in express words, nor, as it seems to me, by any implication, that there may not be a notice of a meeting which shall take place contingently upon the passing of a resolution at a former meeting. I can quite understand that there might be an article with reference to notice of meetings which really would be inconsistent with the spirit if not with the letter of section 51. The substantial intention of the Legislature in section 51 is that there ought to be a first meeting at which a resolution should be submitted to the shareholders, and that then there should be a proper interval of time, not too long and not too short, within which the shareholders should be able to consider the question. If an article authorizes giving notice in such a form as substantially to deprive the shareholders of the opportunity of consideration which the Legislature intended that they should have, I can see that such an article might be held to be ultrà vires; but I cannot come to the conclusion that an article which authorizes the giving notice of the two meetings required by section 51 in one notice, and subject to the proviso that the second meeting would only take place if there had been such a resolution passed at the first meeting as would or could be the subject of confirmation at the second meeting, could deprive any member of the company of any protection which the Legislature intended that he should have. The fact is that, word it how you will, if you have a provision like that in section 51 requiring two meetings, and that the resolution shall only become effective if confirmed at the second meeting after the stated interval of time, you cannot prevent the second meeting being contingent upon the passing of the resolution at the first meeting. It must necessarily be contingent. It was said that as that is so, there should always be two notices, and that notice of the second meeting should not be given until the contingency had occurred by the passing of the resolution at the first meeting. I think that that is a mere matter of detail. As I understand the judgments, both of Chitty, J., and the Lords Justices in Alexander v. Simpson, all of them seem to have assumed that you might by a proper statement that the second meeting would be held whether the contingency contemplated by the Act occurred or not have made the notice a valid notice. In those circumstances the Court of Appeal seem to me to have in effect said that there is nothing, in the mere fact that notice of both meetings is comprised in one document, to make the article which authorizes that in any way ultrà vires. It seems to me, therefore, that there is nothing in article 70 which is invalid or which in any way interferes with the rights or the protection which the Legislature intended the shareholders to have. I think that the substance of Buckley, J.'s, decision is that article 70 is ultrà vires. I do not agree with him. I should like to say that with respect to any decision of Buckley, J., especially upon such a subject as this, I never differ from him without feeling that I am taking a step which I should not like to take without strong conviction; but I think that his decision in this case is wrong because it is based upon a wrong idea both of section 51 and of the effect of the decision of the Court of Appeal in Alexander v. Simpson. In these circumstances I think that we ought to allow this appeal and to sanction the reduction of the capital of this company.

ROMER, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion. I know of no sufficient reason for saying that an absolute notice cannot be given of a meeting for the purpose of considering and, if thought fit, of passing a resolution upon a subject which is of necessity contingent. I think that a notice given for such a meeting is not in itself necessarily bad because it proposes to deal with a contingent matter as the subject of the resolution—for instance, notice of a meeting to appoint a liquidator of a company if the company at the same meeting or before passes a resolution for a voluntary liquidation. I cannot see why that notice should not be good and be acted upon if the resolution to wind up is duly passed. If, therefore, a meeting has to be called to pass a resolution which in its nature is contingent, in construing the notice of such a meeting the substance should be looked at, whatever the wording may be, and in order, if possible, to make it valid the notice should be construed, if it fairly can be, not as a contingent notice, but as an absolute notice of a meeting for the purpose of considering a matter which is contingent. Of course, if the subject-matter to be dealt with is contingent, it will be obvious that it will not be necessary to attend if the contingency does not arise. Speaking for myself, I should have thought, but for the decision that was arrived at, that the notice in Alexander v. Simpson might well have been treated, not as a contingent notice, but as an absolute notice of a meeting to deal with a matter which was contingent, and which only took a contingent form because obviously it would be no use to attend the meeting if the resolution to be confirmed had never passed. But there is the decision in Alexander v. Simpson, and we are bound by it; but personally I am not disposed to extend it if I can help doing so. I think that the ground of that decision must be taken to be that the court was of opinion that the notice of the second meeting was not such as complied with the articles of association of the company, and that the informality of the notice could not be got over, because there might be some shareholders who relied upon the terms of the articles and might be misled by the form of the notice. But in the case before us, as was pointed out by my lord, article 70 expressly provides that notice of the second meeting may be given contingently upon the resolution being passed at the first meeting. I can see no reason for holding that such a provision in the articles is ultrà vires, either as offending against the statutory provisions of section 51 of the Companies Act, 1862, or on any other ground. That being so, I think that the notice should be held to be a valid notice binding upon all the shareholders, and accordingly that the meeting summoned by it was duly held and the resolution passed at that meeting duly passed, and that resolution, which is binding upon all the shareholders and valid, ought to be acted upon. The petition, therefore, ought to have been heard on the merits. We have heard it, and we think that the prayer ought to be granted.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question we have to consider is whether the special resolution has been duly passed by the company. Under section 51 of the Companies Act, 1862, such a resolution must be passed at one meeting and confirmed at another meeting. The Act provides that notice must be duly given of the second meeting, and then it proceeds to say that a notice shall be deemed to be duly given when given in manner prescribed by the regulations of the company. We are therefore referred by the Act itself for the purpose of ascertaining the validity of the notice to the articles of association. There is no question here but that the first meeting was duly held. The difficulty arises as to the second meeting, and it arises because notice of both meetings was given by the same document. There is no question that that notice is in entire conformity with the articles of association of the company. Article 70 by the last clause provides for giving notice in this precise form. Why then are we not to hold that this notice was duly given and this meeting duly held? The learned judge in the court below referred to Alexander v. Simpson, and he held, and rightly, that that case did not govern the present. He so held for this reason, that the question arising there was upon the construction of the articles of association of the company in question, and those articles were, so far as material to this question, entirely different in form from those with which we have now to deal. The words in article 70 have obviously been inserted to meet the difficulty which that decision gave rise to, and unless it appears that this article infringes against the terms of the Companies Act we are bound to give effect to it. I cannot see that this article does infringe against either section 51 or any other part of the Act. If the provisions of section 51 were to be read in the strict way in which the articles of association in Alexander v. Simpson were construed it would give rise to considerable difficulty in cases where a large proportion of the shareholders are resident at a distance from the registered office of the company. I do not for myself see that this article (Article 70) infringes in any way against the provisions of the Act or deprives the shareholders of any protection to which they are entitled. I think, therefore, that the second meeting was duly held in accordance with the articles of association, and that this appeal should be allowed.

Solicitors, Gibson & Weldon, for Bertrand Watson, Stockton-on-Tees.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams and Stirling, L.JJ.) March 2.

ORMEROD, GRIERSON, & CO. v. ST. GEORGE'S IRONWORKS (LIMITED). (a.)

Practice—Discovery—Production and inspection of documents—Liberty to take copies—Right to make copies—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 30, rr. 14, 15; ord. 65, r. 27, sub-rule 18.

Under an order for production of documents in the common form, giving the person obtaining the order liberty to inspect and peruse the documents produced, and to take copies and extracts therefrom, the person obtaining such order has the same right to make copies of the documents himself as he had under such an order by the old practice of the Court of Chancery before the passing of the Judicature Acts. Such right is not taken away by sub-rule 18 of rule 27 of order 65, the object of that sub-rule being only to deal with the costs in cases in which an application for copies of documents is made to the opposing party.

This was an appeal from an order of Joyce, J., which raised a question as to the right of a party to an action who had obtained an order for inspection to make copies of the documents.

By an order in the above action dated the 17th of February, 1903, made upon the application of the plaintiffs, the defendants were ordered to make affidavits of documents and produce the documents which should by such affidavits appear to be in the possession or power of the respective defendants, the production as to the defendants, the St. George's Ironworks (Limited), to be at the office of their solicitor. The order continued: "And the applicants, their solicitors and agents, are to be at liberty to inspect and peruse the documents so produced and to take copies and abstracts thereof and extracts therefrom as the applicants shall be advised."

By a further order dated the 8 h of June, 1904, it was ordered that the plaintiffs be at liberty at all reasonable times, upon reasonable notice to the solicitor to the defendants, the St. George's Ironworks (Limited), to attend with Sir Eustace Piers, Bart., the father and duly appointed agent of the plaintiff Charles Piggott Piers, at the office of the defendants' solicitor, "to inspect the documents disclosed by the said defendants in this action, and to take copies and abstracts thereof and extracts therefrom as the applicants shall be advised."

Sir Eustace Piers attended with a clerk of the plaintiffs' solicitors at the office of the solicitor of the defendants, the St. George's Ironworks Co., and proceeded to make copies there of the documents disclosed.

After a time the defendants declined to allow Sir Eustace Piers to make any further copies, but offered to supply copies in accordance with sub-rule 18 of ord. 65, r. 27.

The plaintiffs then applied that the defendants, the St. George's Ironworks Co., might be ordered to bring the documents disclosed by their affidavit into court.

On this application the defendants, the St. George's Ironworks Co., contended that by reason of the provisions in sub-rule 18 of rule 27, order 65, the plaintiffs, on the true construction of the order for affidavits and production of the 17th of February, 1903, were only entitled to receive copies of documents from the defendants and not to make copies themselves except in the event of the defendants refusing to supply them.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The question was argued in chambers before Joyce, J., who gave a written judgment to the effect that the order for affidavit and production was in the time-honoured form in use before the Judicature Act and since continued. That form of order authorized the person inspecting to take or make copies or extracts: Pratt v. Pratt, 30 W. R. 837. The only question was whether R. S. C. ord. 65, r. 27 (18), directly or indirectly altered the effect of such an order. In his lordship's opinion all the rule did was to provide what the charge was to be, when the inspecting party formally (by writing) required a copy or extract to be made for him by the other party. He did not see how the rule contended for by the respondents could practically be worked, and how was the line to be drawn between what the inspecting party might copy and what he might not.

The result was that the respondents must either undertake to allow the applicants to copy as they please or the documents must be brought into court (Prestney v. Corporation of Colchester, 31 W. R. 757, 24 Ch. D. 376), which was the strict course, production at the office of the solicitor being in truth an indulgence permitted for the convenience and with the assent of the parties or one of them: Brown v. Sewell, 29 W. R. 295, 16 Ch. D. 517.

In accordance with this judgment an order was made dated the 8th of February, 1905, that "unless the said defendants forthwith undertake to allow the applicants, their solicitors and agents, to copy the said documents as they please, the said defendants, the St. George's Ironworks (Limited), by their secretary or other proper officer, do within ten days from the service hereof produce and leave at the Central Office, Royal Courts of Justice, London, the documents mentioned in such affidavit, except such of the documents which they thereby object to produce. And it is ordered that the applicants and the said defendants and their solicitors and agents are to be at liberty to inspect and peruse the documents so produced and left, and to take copies and abstracts thereof and extracts therefrom as they may be advised."

Liberty was given to the St. George's Ironworks Co. to appeal.

The St. George's Ironworks Co. appealed.

The following are the rules cited in the argument and judgments:

Ord. 72, r. 2.—Where no provision is made by the Acts or these rules the present procedure and practice remain in force.

Ord. 31, r. 14.—It shall be lawful for the court or a judge, at any time during the pendency of any cause or matter, to order the production by any party thereto, upon oath, of such of the documents in his possession or power relating to any matter in question in such cause or matter as the court or judge shall think right, and the court may deal with such documents, when produced, in such manner as shall appear just.

Ord. 31, r. 15.—Every party to a cause or matter shall be entitled at any time, by notice in writing, to give notice to any other party, in whose pleadings or affidavits reference is made to any document, to produce such document for the inspection of the party giving such notice or of his solicitor, and to permit him or them to take copies thereof; and any party not complying with such notice shall not afterwards be at liberty to put any such document in evidence on his behalf in such cause or matter unless he shall satisfy the court or a judge that such document relates only to his own title, he being a defendant to the cause or matter, or that he had some other cause or excuse which the court or judge shall deem sufficient for not complying with such notice, in which case the court or judge may allow the same to be put in evidence on such terms as to costs and otherwise as the court or judge shall think fit.

Ord. 65, r. 27.—The following special allowances and general regulations shall apply to all proceedings and all taxations in the Supreme Court of Judicature:

Sub-rule 18.—As to taking copies of documents in possession of another party, or extracts therefrom, under rules of court or any special order, the party entitled to take the copy or extract is to pay the solicitor of the party producing the document for such copy or extract as he may, by writing, require, at the rate of 4d. per folio, and if the solicitor of the party producing the document refuses or neglects to supply the same, the solicitor requiring the copy or extract is to be at liberty to make it, and the solicitor for the party producing is not to be entitled to any fee in respect thereof.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Bathurst, for the appellants.—The constant attendance of the plaintiffs' agent with a clerk at the solicitor's office caused great inconvenience and prevented the solicitor carrying on his own business. We submit that the plaintiffs have no right to make copies themselves of documents, at any rate so long as we are willing to supply copies. The orders only authorize them to "take" copies—that is, to accept copies from us, not to make these copies themselves. The right of inspection has been held by implication to carry with it the right to make copies in certain cases, but the right to make copies is not an invariable incident of the right to inspect. In the present case the right to make copies is excluded by the express terms of sub-rule 18 of rule 27 of order 65.

The following authorities were referred to in the course of the argument: Brown v. Sewell, 29 W. R. 295, 16 Ch. D. 517; Bonnardet v. Taylor, 9 W. R. 452, 1 J. & H. 383; Pratt v. Pratt, 30 W. R. 837; Prestney v. Mayor of Colchester, 31 W. R. 757, 24 Ch. D. 376; Bevan v. Webb, 49 W. R. 548, [1901] 2 Ch 59; Mutter v. Eastern and Midland Railway Co., 36 W. R. 401, 38 Ch. D. 92; In re Balaghât Gold Mining Co., 49 W. R. 625, [1901] 2 K. B. 665; Prentice v. Phillips, 2 Hare 152; Coleman v. West Hartlepool Harbour and Railway Co., 5 L. T. 266; Republic of Peru v. Weguelin, 7 C. P. 352, 20 W. R. Cb. Dig. 89; Bray on Discovery, p. 174; Daniel's Chancery Practice (7th ed.), vol. 2, p. 1574; Seton on Judgments (6th ed.), p. 80; Kerr on Discovery, p. 24.

Cassel, for the respondents, was not called upon.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., stated the facts, and after reading from the judgment of Joyce, J., continued: I do not think that it was contended that under the practice of the courts before the Judicature Acts an order in the form that we have here would not have given the person who had obtained the order, the right to make copies of documents himself if he thought fit. But it is said that that effect of the old form of order has now been taken away. As I understand the argument of counsel for the appellants, they contend that it is taken away by the words of sub-rule 18 of rule 27 of order 65. [His lordship read sub-rule 18, and continued:] It is said that in this sub-rule 18 the word "take" is used in the sense of obtaining copies from the other side, and that it was intended by this sub-rule to say that the old right to make copies of documents upon production and inspection is taken away from the party who is making the inspection. I cannot accede to that argument. In the first place it seems to me manifest that the words "take copies" are frequently used in legal documents to cover the case of a copy being made by a party inspecting as distinct from the case of his getting a copy from the other side. A good deal of reference has been made to the case of Mutter v. Eastern and Midland Railway Co. Now, that case is really an illustration of the fact that the words "take copies" can be used in the sense of making copies because I find in the judgment of Chitty, L.J., at p. 98 of 39 Ch. D.: "In regard to the other right according to the mere words of the enactment it is a right to inspect, and to inspect only, but there is no prohibition on the shareholder, during the time that he makes his inspection, making notes of that which he inspects. As was said, he might, if he could, commit the whole register to memory. That, of course, would be a difficult thing to do. But there is nothing in the Act which prevents his making a note, and if he may make a note, I do not see why he may not make a complete note of any particular part; in other words, why he may not make an extract, and from that it seems to follow that he may make a reasonable use of the inspection and take a copy." In that portion of his judgment it seems to me plain that the learned judge is speaking of what the party inspecting may do himself, and he contemplates that the party inspecting may make copies for himself, and describes that process by the word "take," and Lindley, L.J., on p. 101, employs the word "take" in the same sense. I shall say no more about the application of the word "take" to copies made by the party inspecting with his own hands. It is plain that the word "take" can be used in the sense of making copies, though in sub-rule 18 it is otherwise.

Then it is said that that though a right of inspection will generally give a right to take copies, yet that right is negatived, and as an instance of the negation of that right the case is cited of In re Balaghât Gold Mining Co. (Limited). In that case the right of inspection of the register of members of a company was given by section 32 of the Companies Act, 1862, and the court held that the only right of taking copies that existed was the right which was defined by the statute, that is to say, the right of being furnished with copies. It is argued that because sub-rule 18 enables copies to be obtained for a price, we ought in this case to hold that that negatives the ordinary inference that a party to whom the right of inspection is given has the right to make copies. I say "ordinary inference" because ordinarily speaking, the right to make copies is necessary to a full enjoyment of the right of inspection, as appears from the case of Mutter v. Eastern and Midland Railway Co., in which the court held that the right to take copies was a necessary consequence of the right to inspect and peruse the register of debenture stockholders of a company, given by section 28 of the Companies Clauses Act, 1863. It is true that in both these cases the right to inspect was a statutory right, and the statute must be looked at to see whether a right to take copies is consequential on the right of inspection. But the distinction between the two cases is pointed out by Smith, M.R., in In re Balaghât Gold Mining Co. [His lordship read the judgment: "I quite agree with what fell from Lindley, L.J., . . . the person who inspects can get such copies as he requires by paying for them," and continued:] In my judgment neither of these cases assists us in the particular case we are now dealing with. When once you have ascertained that the word "take" covers the case of a person making copies for himself, the only question that remains to be decided is whether there is anything in the Acts or the rules which ought to lead us to say that it was intended that in future the sole right should be the right to purchase copies from the other side, and that the right to make copies was no longer in existence. I can find nothing in the Acts or the rules to lead us to that conclusion. It was said that the making of copies by the person inspecting might cause great inconvenience in the office of the solicitor where the documents are produced. I do not think that that is a sufficient reason for saying that the settled practice has been altered and that there is now no longer any right to make copies. In my opinion, Joyce, J., was perfectly right in making the order which he made. The defendants were in default in refusing to allow copies of the documents to be made. The real answer to the argument of the defendants was pointed out by Page-Wood, V.C., in Bonnardet v. Taylor, that the practical result would be, if their contention were right, that it would be necessary to bespeak copies of whole documents when only portions of such documents were required. I think that the appeal ought to be dismissed, and dismissed with costs.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion and I agree with the reasoning of Joyce, J. The real question is what was the meaning of the order made by Joyce, J., on the 17th of February, 1903? That order is the common order for production of documents and is practically in the Form 18 in Appendix K to the Rules of the Supreme Court, and it is, as Joyce, J., observes, the form which was in use in the Court of Chancery prior to the Judicature Act. Now as to the meaning of the order when made by the court before the Judicature Act, there is, I think, no doubt. There is no dispute as to the meaning, and if authority is wanted it is to be found in Bonnardet v. Taylor. Page-Wood, V.C., in that case says: "The common order gives the plaintiffs power to go themselves and make copies and extracts, though the usual practice is to take the copies from the solicitors of the defandants." There can, I apprehend, be no question as to what was the meaning of the order at that time or that the word "take" in such an order included "make." The second order made by Joyce, J., on the 8th of June, 1904, was practically in the same form, and again if that order had been made before the Judicature Act there can be no question but that the word "take" would have included "make." That being so, the question is whether there is anything to lead us to suppose that the meaning of the order has been altered since the Judicature Act. [His lordship read rule 14 of order 31]. By these two orders of the 17th of February, 1903, and the 8th of June, 1904, the court did direct the production of documents by the defendants, and also gave liberty to the plaintiffs to take such copies and extracts as they might be advised. Rule 15 of the same order is also noteworthy. It deals with a more limited matter, the production for inspection of documents which are mentioned in pleadings or affidavits, and it provides that every party shall be entitled to give notice to the other party to permit him "to take copies" of such documents. It is not disputed that the word "take" there includes "make." Now we come to sub-rule 18 of rule 27 of order 65. That order deals with "costs," and rule 27 deals with "Special Allowances and General Regulations." [His lordship read sub-rule 18, and continued:] It is said that the effect of that sub-rule is to deprive a litigant of a right which before the Judicature Act he would certainly have had under an order made in this form, the right, that is, of himself making copies of the documents produced. In my judgment that right of making copies or extracts is one which is valuable to a litigant. It is valuable because it may save expense to a poor man, and it might be valuable in other ways. It might hamper litigants if they were deprived of that right. Is that the true effect of sub-rule 18? In my opinion it is not. I think that if it had been intended to deprive litigants of rights which they enjoyed before the Judicature Acts it would have been done by express words. It appears to me that this sub-rule was only intended to deal with the costs of copies of documents obtained from the opponent. That was the view taken by Joyce, J., and I agree with him. It was said that the practice is inconvenient. I agree, and no doubt it is one which is not often resorted to. But as regards the inconvenience it is always in the power of the court to make an order which will minimize the inconvenience, and Joyce, J., has made such an order in the present case. As regards its being rarely resorted to, I do not think that that circumstance ought to take away the privilege. I think that the order of Joyce, J., should be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Robert Kent; Lewis & Lewis.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. — April 7, 14.

In re COULL'S SETTLED ESTATES. (a.)

Settled land—Settlement by will—Subsequent settlement of other land to same uses, subject to incumbrance—Compound settlement—Discharge of incumbrance on purchased land by mortgage of lands comprised in both settlements—Trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 2, sub-sections 1, 8; s. 45, sub-section 1—Settled Land Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 69), s. 16, sub-section 1.

By his will R. C. devised a residential estate in settlement. Subsequently a tenant for life under the will purchased a neighbouring property, and, having mortgaged it, settled it on the subsisting uses of the will, but subject to the mortgage and the repayment to himself of the costs, charges, and expenses arising out of the transaction. There were no trustees of the original settlement. On an application by the tenant for life to have the amount of the mortgage and costs raised by a mortgage of both properties,

Held, that the main settlement and the subsidiary settlement constituted a compound settlement, and that trustees of the compound settlement should be appointed for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, with power to raise by mortgage of the entire property what was required to discharge the incumbrance on the lands comprised in the subsidiary settlement, together with the costs of this application, and to apply the amount raised accordingly.

Summons.

By his will dated the 21st of July, 1870, Robert Coull devised a residential estate in Northumberland upon certain uses.

The present applicant, the tenant for life under the said will, purchased an estate situate in the midst of the said residential estate for £7,800, and mortgaged it for £7,000, himself providing the balance. The purchase of this additional estate was clearly proved to be most desirable and beneficial in the interests of all concerned.

By a deed dated the 5th of December, 1904, the tenant for life settled this subsidiary estate on the subsisting uses of the said will, but subject to the mortgage and repayment to himself of the costs, charges, and expenses arising out of the transaction.

(a.) Reported by P. JOHN BOLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The deed contained a proviso that the trustees thereof should have full power by sale or mortgage of the property thereby assured to raise the amount of the costs, charges, and expenses above referred to. There were no trustees of the main settlement within the meaning of the Settled Land Acts.

The present application was made by the tenant for life in order to obtain the sanction of the court to his raising the amount of the incumbrance, together with the costs, charges, and expenses, by means of a mortgage of both properties, and that the trustees of the deed of the 5th of December, 1904, might be appointed trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts of the compound settlement created by that deed and the said will.

P. Ogden Lawrence, K.C., and Stone, for the applicant.

Austen-Cartmell, for the infant remainderman.

Fischer Williams, for the trustees of the subsidiary settlement.

KEKEWICH, J., in giving judgment, said: The question is whether it will suffice to appoint trustees of either one or other of the settlements, or whether there ought to be appointed trustees of the settlement compounded of the two. The phrase compounded is not to be found in the Settled Land Acts, but has been conveniently invented to describe what is distinctly mentioned and contemplated by the Act of 1882, s. 2, sub-section 1. This is a distinct settlement as contemplated by that enactment and conveniently styled a compound settlement. It seems to me that, regarding the question merely as one depending on the construction of that enactment, there must be appointed trustees of the compound settlement to whom notice may be given pursuant to section 45, sub-section 1, and that unless trustees are appointed of the compound settlement there will be none to whom notice can properly and adequately be given pursuant to that section.

The case of In re Lord Stafford's Settled Estates (reported only before Warrington, J.), 52 W. R. 536, [1904] 2 Ch. 72, is very similar to this, and (referring to the judgment [unreported] of Byrne, J.) it is impossible to find a more distinct decision that in such a case as is now before the court an appointment of trustees of the compound settlement must be made before the application of capital money arising under the subsidiary settlement to purposes with which the main settlement is also concerned can be sanctioned. [His lordship then referred to the cases of In re Mundy's Trust, 39 W. R. 209, [1891] 1 Ch. 399; In re Byng's Settled Estates, 40 W. R. 457, [1892] 2 Ch. 219; and In re Lord Monson's Settled Estates, 46 W. R. 330, [1898] 1 Ch. 427; and said:] While I have three cases in which the question whether trustees of the compound settlement ought to be appointed might have been raised but was not raised, I find in no one of them any indication of opinion that such an appointment is not necessary, whereas, on the other hand, I have the fully considered opinion of Byrne, J., that it is necessary, and that was acted on by Warrington, J.

It was argued that the proviso in the subsidiary settlement was a power of sale within the meaning of the Act of 1882, s. 2, sub-section 8, and that therefore the trustees of that settlement were trustees of it within the meaning of the Settled Land Acts. It was further argued that if they are trustees within the meaning of the Acts of the subsidiary settlement, they therefore are also trustees of the main settlement by reason of section 16, sub-section 1, of the Act of 1890. I doubt this, because I do not think that they are trustees of the subsidiary settlement within the meaning of the Acts. Mr. Wolstenholme, in a note to section 2, sub-section 8, of the Act of 1882, says: "It is conceived that executors with power to sell for payment of debts are not, but that persons with a general power of sale are, trustees within this section. The power must be general." This, in my judgment, is correct.

Application granted.

Solicitors, Crossman, Prichard, Crossman, & Block, for Brumell & Sample, Morpeth.

Chan. Div.
Buckley, J. } May 3, 4, 5, 11.

MAYOR, &c., OF SWANSEA v. NATIONAL TELEPHONE CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Telephone—"Restricted intercommunication"—"Proper facilities"—Telegraph Act, 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 38), s. 3 (5)—Telegraph (Telephonic Intercommunication) Order, 1899.

Where a licensee of the Postmaster-General providing public telephonic communication in a defined area requests another licensee to give facilities for intercommunication between the subscribers of their respective systems, in the absence of an order of the Postmaster-General prescribing the terms and conditions of such intercommunication, the court will not prescribe any particular method; but if the method insisted on by the party applied to amounts, in the opinion of the court, to a refusal of proper facilities, the court may declare that the party applied to has so refused, and that the other party is entitled to be afforded proper facilities, and may order the party applied to to grant such facilities.

Action.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff corporation for the purpose of enforcing against the defendant company rights which the plaintiffs claimed to possess under section 3 (5) of the Telegraph Act, 1899.

The statement of claim asked (1) for a declaration that under that sub-section the plaintiffs were entitled to be afforded by the defendants all proper facilities for restricted intercommunication within the meaning of the Telegraph (Telephonic Intercommunication) Order, 1899, between the systems of the plaintiffs and defendants, and that the defendants were bound to make certain specified connections between the defendants' exchange at Swansea and certain junction lines laid by the plaintiffs; and (2) to have it determined what further works ought to be done, and by whom, for the purposes of such intercommunication, and how the costs of the necessary works should be borne.

On the 29th of November, 1884, the defendants obtained from the then Postmaster-General a general licence to carry on the business of transmitting telephonic messages for a period of thirty-one years from 1st of January, 1881. By the Telegraph Act, 1892, certain special privileges were granted to licensees from the Postmaster-General in connection with certain areas to be defined by the Postmaster-General, and a further licence was granted to the defendants on the 25th of March, 1896 under which the defendants were given the special privileges provided for by the Telegraph Act, 1892, in respect of the area defined in the licence as the Swansea area, which area was modified by a deed-poll under the hand of the Postmaster-General, dated the 25th of March, 1898.

The Telegraph Act, 1899, s. 3 (5) provides as follows: "If the licence of an existing company is, under the provisions of this section, extended in respect of any exchange area for a period of not less than eight years beyond the term existing at the passing of this Act, the company shall, at the request of any other licensee of the Postmaster-General providing public telephonic communication in the whole or any part of that exchange area, and under such circumstances and on such terms and conditions as may, within six months from the passing of this Act, be prescribed by an order of the Postmaster-General, made with the approval of the Treasury, afford all proper facilities for the transmission of telephonic messages between persons using the system of the company (either in the whole or in part of the exchange area, as the Postmaster-General may prescribe) and persons using the system of such other licensee, provided that the licensee so requiring intercommunication shall in any such case afford similar facilities."

(a.) Reported by H. H. KING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 27th of September, 1902, the plaintiffs were licensed by the Postmaster-General to provide public telephonic communication in the Swansea area for a term to commence on the 1st of October, 1902, and terminating on the 31st of December, 1920.

By a deed of the same date the licence granted to the defendants by the deeds of the 29th of November, 1884, and the 25th of March, 1896, was extended, so far as regards the Swansea area, to the 31st of December, 1920; but this extension was only to take effect upon the establishment by the plaintiffs of a system of public telephonic communication in the Swansea area in competition with the existing system of the defendants.

The Telegraph (Telephonic Intercommunication) Order, 1899, was made in pursuance of section 3 (5) of the Telegraph Act, 1899, and provided: (1) "When the subscribers of the new licensee (i e., in the present case the plaintiffs), at the date when intercommunication is requested, equal or exceed in number one-fourth of those of the company at that date, in the area specified in the new licence, or number 500, whichever first happens, but not before, mutual intercommunication shall be afforded by the company and the new licensee between their respective subscribers and other persons using their respective systems in the area specified in the new licence only; such intercommunication as aforesaid is hereinafter referred to as 'restricted intercommunication'"; and (5) "Any new licensee requesting facilities for intercommunication shall satisfy the Postmaster-General that such licensee possesses the required number of bonâ fide subscribers actually working."

On the 1st of January, 1904, the plaintiffs made a written request to the defendants for restricted intercommunication between persons using their respective systems, and at the same time they informed the Postmaster-General that the request had been made, and subsequently satisfied him that they possessed the requisite number of subscribers.

The plaintiffs and defendants both have telephone exchanges at Swansea and also at two other places, Mumbles and Morriston, within the Swansea area. The plaintiffs laid junction cables from their exchange at Swansea to a point close to the defendants' exchange at Swansea, and their contention was that these cables ought to be connected with the defendants' exchange, and that the means of intercommunication afforded by this connection and by connecting the exchanges at Mumbles and at Morriston would be sufficient and workable. The defendants took up the position that the plaintiffs were bound to make connections from their central exchange at Swansea to each of the defendants' sub-exchanges in the Swansea area, and refused to allow any intercommunication at all until this was done.

Buckmaster, K.C., and R. J. Parker, for the plaintiffs.—The object of the Act and order is, where you have two systems, to so connect them that a subscriber on one may communicate with a subscriber on the other. The defendants want us to connect with each of their exchanges within the area; we are not bound to do this under the statute; it might be impossible, and would, at any rate, cause great delay; but the defendants say that until it is done they will not let us communicate through their exchange at Swansea. The question is, what are proper facilities for putting all the subscribers on one system in communication with all those on the other. When the systems have been linked up, each may then have to increase its accommodation, and there may be payments to be made by one party to the other. There is nothing in the order to say what particular thing is to be done, and at whose expense.

Astbury, K.C., Danckwerts, K.C., and H. H. Guise, for the defendants.—The defendants have no desire to obstruct the plaintiffs in obtaining such intercommunication as they are entitled to, but we say that it can only be done in what we consider a fair and proper way. Our contention is that section 3 (5) contemplates that the Postmaster-General shall be able to lay down, within six months of the passing of the Act, the terms and conditions upon which intercommunication is to be established. If he does lay them down they are binding on the parties, but if he does not lay them down, the party applying for intercommunication, and being entitled to it, can agree them with the other party, or failing agreement the party applying can go to the court and ask it to declare that the terms on which the party applied to is willing to effect intercommunication are a breach of the statutory right, and amount to a refusal to comply with the section. The court cannot order the defendants to do any particular thing. A system may be suggested by experts which may meet with the approval of the court, but the court cannot force it upon us; it can only approve or disapprove of the system which we put forward. The only authority which has the power to prescribe a particular system is the Postmaster-General, and he has omitted to do so. The Railway Traffic Acts afford an analogy. Section 2 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, gives power to direct a railway company to afford certain facilities, even though the doing so may necessitate structural alterations; but there is no power to order any particular works to be carried out: South-Eastern Railway Co. v. Railway Commissioners, 6 Q. B. D. 586, 25 W. R. Dig. 109; Brown & Theobald (3rd ed.), 405. That case held that all the commissioners could do was to consider whether the facilities offered were proper. The trunk lines of our system are laid for a particular purpose, and are not part of our system in the sense that any other persons but the particular subscribers for whose use they were laid can have the right to use them. "Proper facilities" are not such as can be given by one act once for all, they require a series of acts to be done all day and every day such as the court could not order, because it could not supervise their performance. [They referred to Gas Light and Coke Co. v. South Metropolitan Gas Co., 62 L. T. 126, 129, 38 W. R. Dig. 83.] The question of what are proper facilities must be determined with reference to the nature of telephonic communication. As soon as one party puts the section into operation the other party has correlative rights, and both are entitled to proper facilities—that is, to facilities proper in the interest of both parties. Sections 1 and 2 of the order of 1899 do not apply to areas which are coterminous, and that is the meaning of the word "only." For the purposes of this case there is no Postmaster-General's order of 1899 at all. The Postmaster-General may have intended that there should only be intercommunication where the parties could agree on what facilities should be given, and this is all the more probable owing to the uselessness of intercommunication without harmony. [They also referred to Powell Duffryn Steam Coal Co. v. Taff Vale Railway Co., 9 Ch. App. 331, 22 W. R. Dig. 121, and Ryan v. Mutual Tontine Westminster Chambers Association, 41 W. R. 146, [1893] 1 Ch. 116.] We say that equality is the keynote of the section; let each party lay the wires rendered necessary by business originating on their system, and then there will be facilities for equal communication between the subscribers on the two systems. Whatever we propose for the plaintiffs to do we are prepared to do ourselves.

Buckmaster, K.C., in reply.—The argument that the Postmaster-General did not intend that there should be intercommunication between conterminous areas is impossible. The order recites the Act, and section 1 of the order contemplates every case except those covered by section 2. If intercommunication is only to come if and when the parties agree, there there is no virtue in the statute. What the defendants suggest is not intercommunication between the two systems as a whole, but they offer us the use of only so much of their system as connects their subscribers to the nearest exchange. South-Eastern Railway Co. v. Railway Commissioners does not apply because the point there was as to the special powers of the commissioners under a special Act (6 Q. B. D., at p. 599)

Cur. adv. vult.

BUCKLEY, J.—This, I am told, is the first case in which application has been made to the court to construe or enforce the Telegraph Act, 1899, with reference to intercommunication between competing telephonic systems within the same area. As the matter is one of considerable public importance, I reserved my judgment with a view to expressing as clearly as I am able the view which I take of the Act and of the remedies available for its enforcement. The third section of the Telegraph Act, 1899, contemplates a state of circumstances in which an existing company, enjoying a non-exclusive licence from the Postmaster-General, has provided a system of public telephonic communication in an exchange area, and it is proposed to grant another licence to the local authority, or to another company, to provide public telephonic communication in the same area. Subject to certain conditions being complied with, sub-sections 1 and 4 give the existing company certain benefits, the former a benefit in respect of underground wires, and the latter a benefit by way of extension of the term of its existing licence. Then follows sub-section 5, upon which the question in this action arises. It is a sub-section in favour of the new licensee. It provides that if the licence of the existing company is, under the Act, extended for a certain substantial time (not less than eight years), the new licensee shall have the benefit of a certain option. The new licensee can, by request addressed to the existing company, require the existing company to afford all proper facilities for the transmission of telephonic messages between persons using the system of the existing company and persons using the system of the new licensee, provided that the new licensee so requiring intercommunication shall in such case afford similar facilities. The sub-section provides that these facilities shall be afforded under such circumstances and on such terms and conditions as may within six months from the passing of the Act be prescribed by an order of the Postmaster-General. It is obvious that, if a right to intercommunication arises, many questions may present themselves as to the terms which may be fair as between the existing company and the new licensee in the matter. I may instance the following: First, the question as to how the expenses of connecting the two systems are to be borne between the two companies, or by one and which of them; secondly, the question who is to do the work of making the connections, whether each company can call on the other to do the necessary work on its own land, or can without trespass go upon the land of the other party for the purpose of doing the work itself; thirdly, the question whether, as between the two undertakings, the one ought to make to the other any and what payment for the advantages arising from intercommunication to their respective customers. The one undertaking might be of extensive mileage, with a large number of exchanges, having a complicated reticulation of junctions between them, and a large staff of clerks. The other might be of very small dimensions in all these respects. It is not self-evident that intercommunication would in justice be given without providing for a payment to be made by the one undertaking to the other. As to all this and other like matters which might be suggested the Act is silent. If they are to be provided for it must be by the order which the Postmaster-General had power to make. It was, I think, competent to him to have dealt with all these under the words "terms and conditions." He might probably have dealt with other matters under the words "under such circumstances." The defendants argued that under one or other of those expressions the Postmaster-General could have done more, and could have determined what are proper facilities, and that he ought to have done so, and further (for the argument was actually carried to this length), that, inasmuch as he has not done so, I cannot determine, and no authority can determine, what are proper facilities, and that the parties must agree amongst themselves as to what they are, and, failing agreement, the Act breaks down. I do not accede to the argument or any part of it. The Postmaster-General could by his order determine the circumstances under which, and the terms and conditions upon which, proper facilities shall be afforded. But the Act does not remit it to him to say what proper facilities are, and the statutory right cannot be a right to that which the parties agree. That is equivalent to saying that there is no statutory right, for either party could in that case defeat the statute by refusing to agree. Within the six months the Postmaster-General did make an order within the Act of Parliament. Its effect, for any purpose relevant to the matter before me, is only this, that by article 1 it provided that the new licensee must have a certain number of subscribers before it could demand intercommunication, and by article 4 provided for certain terminal charges which might be made by the old company and the new licensee respectively, and by article 5 that the new licensee who requested the facilities should satisfy the Postmaster-General that he had complied with article 1. The order did not deal in any way with any of the questions which I have said above would seem to require adjustment as between the two undertakings. A system of public telephonic communication comprises and includes, I think, at least the following factors: First, one or more exchanges, at which by means of switchboards any particular subscriber can be put into communication with any other subscriber; secondly, where there is more than one exchange, junction, or trunk lines running between the exchanges; thirdly, a staff of persons at each exchange to control the switchboards and make the communications; and, fourthly, separate lines from what is called a station (that is to say, a customer's residence or place of business) to the exchange which is nearest to that place. The proper facilities mentioned in sub-section 5 are facilities for the transmission of telephonic messages between the customers using the one system and the customers using the other system, and those must be, I think, proper facilities for using all such of the several component parts of the system which I have described as are in a proper course of the business appropriate for the transmission of the messages. If intercommunication is established, then the customer of company A is to have proper facilities for using all those parts of the system of company B which are appropriate for the purpose of communicating telephonically with the customer of company B. It is singular, no doubt, that if undertaking A be a large one, with extensive mileage, a number of exchanges, a large staff employed, and the like, and company B an undertaking small in all these respects the Act and the order made under it should have entitled B to call upon A for intercommunication without providing for any payment to be made by B to A for the advantage. I see, however, two grounds upon which this may not be unreasonable. First, when the customer of company A and the customer of company B enjoy the benefit of telephonic communication, it may be said that each enjoys equally the reciprocal advantage of hearing from and speaking to the other. The customer of company A has the right as between him and his company to use all the appropriate wires and other parts of the system of company A; the customer of company B has a like right as regards the wires and other parts of the system of company B. The intention of the Act and order may be, and I think is, that when the statutory right of intercommunication has arisen each of the two customers shall be entitled to converse over the aggregate mileage, over some part of which each has by contract with his company the right of communication. Whether this be so or not, it seems to me that the Act and order have created the right, and that if the right to intercommunication has arisen and intercommunication has been established the right of the customer of company B is to have proper facilities over every part of the system of company A just as much as if he were a customer of company B. Secondly, it is noticeable that the new licensee need not request intercommunication unless he desires it, so that no consideration necessarily arises as to whether it would be fair that that company should receive a payment, and that the existing company only becomes bound to give intercommunication upon request, if it has availed itself of the right within sub-section 4 of having the term of its licence extended, so that no consideration necessarily arises as to whether it would be fair that that company should receive a payment. In other words, each company may if so minded so conduct itself as that intercommunication under the Act will not result, so that it cannot be said that anything unfair is being imposed upon either company if it does result.

Having said thus much upon the Act of Parliament, I pass to a statement of the facts in this case. The revelant facts are that the defendants had before September, 1902, established a system of public telephonic communication in the Swansea area, and that in September, 1902, the Postmaster-General granted a new licence to the plaintiffs over the same area. At the same time the Postmaster-General, again under the Act, granted the defendants an extension of their then existing licence for a period such as to call section 3, sub-section 5, into operation. In November, 1903, the plaintiffs had established and then opened their system. On the 1st of January, 1904, they made a request for intercommunication within section 3, sub-section 5. They had at that time the number of subscribers required to satisfy article 1 of the order of the Postmaster-General. Before the 2nd of February, 1904, they had, within article 5 of the Postmaster-General's order, satisfied him as to that fact, and the defendants, by a letter of the 2nd of February, 1904, were informed by the Postmaster-General that he was so satisfied. That the corporation had the requisite number of subscribers is not now in dispute, but I must say something further as to it, because it goes to costs. By a letter of the 8th of August, 1904, the defendants waived any objection based upon their allegation that the facts were not as above stated, and by another of the 1st of September they repeated that they were prepared to accept the Postmaster-General's certificate as to the fact. Notwithstanding this, by paragraph 6 of the defence they denied it. It is only by reason of the fact that at the bar their counsel again admitted it that the plaintiffs have been relieved from calling evidence to prove it. The defendants upon the correspondence raise various other contentions to which I need not refer beyond saying that I am satisfied, as indeed Mr. Gaine admitted in the box, that the defendants desired to raise every objection which could be (Mr. Gaine says legitimately could be) put forward to prevent the plaintiffs from obtaining the intercommunication which they had a right to request, and requested, under the Act. The defendants had received the benefit of the extension of their licence, but intended to put every obstacle (they say legitimate obstacle) in the way, to prevent the resultant benefit to the new licensee of obtaining intercommunication. With one exception these objections are not now relied upon.

The remaining contention is that upon which arises the whole question which I have to decide in the action. That contention is as follows: The defendants have a central exchange at Swansea and eleven or twelve subsidiary exchanges. After a contention which varied from time to time, and which is to be found in its several forms in letters from the defendants of the 7th of March, the 10th of August, the 1st of September, and the 20th of September, 1904, the defendants, by their last contention, as stated in the letter of the 20th of September, required that the plaintiffs should provide junction circuits to directly connect the plaintiffs' exchange in Swansea with the defendants' exchange in Swansea, and with each of nine of the defendants' subsidiary exchanges in different parts of the area, and junction circuits to connect the two Mumbles exchanges with the two Morriston exchanges. A reference to plan A, which for the purpose of illustration has been used in the course of these proceedings, is the shortest way of conveying what this contention involves. There existed already junction or trunk lines running from Swansea—that is, from the defendants' exchange in Swansea—to each of these subsidiary exchanges. The defendants say that there must be duplicate junction or trunk lines from Swansea—that is, from the plaintiffs' exchange in Swansea—to each of these same subsidiary exchanges. In other words, they contend that every line running from Swansea to a subsidiary exchange must be duplicated by laying another junction or trunk line from Swansea to the same point. To make plain that which follows I must state that the defendants discriminate between the case in which, after intercommunication is established, the originating call comes from a customer of the plaintiffs and that in which it comes from a customer of the defendants. They say that when a customer of the plaintiffs makes the originating call the plaintiffs must perform upon their own trunk lines the whole service of the message until it reaches that exchange of the defendants which is nearest to the station of the customer to whom the call is addressed, and they say that they are willing to accept the like obligation when the originating call is made by the defendants' customer. I fail to find any justification in the Act of Parliament, or founded upon reason or good sense, for this contention. On the contrary, it seems to me to be directly in contravention of that which the Act of 1899 intended to secure. The object is not to duplicate the systems so that each of the two undertakings shall have junction or trunk wires running to every exchange in the area, but that the customer of each company shall use the trunk line of the other company running to the customer of the other company whom he wishes to address. A concrete instance will probably most readily convey the contention put forward. The plaintiffs have a junction or trunk line from Skewen to Swansea. The defendants have a junction or trunk line from Swansea to Pontardulais. Assuming the plaintiffs' exchange at Swansea to be connected with the defendants' exchange at Swansea, I understand the Act to mean that the plaintiffs' customer at Skewen is to have from the defendants all proper facilities for the transmission of his telephonic message to Pontardulais, and for that purpose to have the use of all the appropriate parts of the defendants' system. The defendants say, "No, you are not entitled to use our trunk line from Swansea to Pontardulais; the only part of our system which you shall use for the purpose of this message shall be our exchange at Pontardulais, our staff at that place, and the subscriber's separate wire from that place to his house." There are, however, other parts of the defendants' system appropriate for use for telephonic communication from Skewen to Pontardulais—namely, the defendants' exchange at Swansea, the defendants' staff at Swansea, the defendants' trunk line from Swansea to Pontardulais. The defendants say, "No, you have no right to use any of these for the purpose of this message: you, the plaintiffs, must bring the communication on your own wires to our Pontardulais exchange, and you cannot require anything more from us than that we should from that point send it on to our subscriber." The contention is extravagant and directly in destruction, as it seems to me, of that which the Act intended to give. "But further," say the defendants, "our junction or trunk lines are now fully occupied," meaning by that expression that at the busiest hour of the day they can carry no heavier load, and of course it is desirable that the system shall be competent to deal with the busiest hour of the day without congestion. This is a matter to which consideration is due, I think, in the sense that an obligation to give proper facilities does not necessarily involve that the servient company shall, at a moment's notice and without reasonable time to adjust itself to the new demand, accept and deal with a large addition of traffic. But except in this sense the consideration is not relevant. The defendants are bound to give to every intending customer within the area telephonic communication on proper terms. Their undertaking is one which, from its nature, requires extension by increase in the trunk lines as traffic develops. The effect of the Act is to introduce to the defendants, and to require them to provide for, additional customers who are entitled to service by virtue of the provisions of the Act, and if the defendants' lines are insufficient to carry the load, then I apprehend it is their business, after, of course, a sufficient reasonable margin of time, to provide the lines necessary for its transmission, just as much as it would have been their business so to provide for any new customers of their own. The Act nowhere contemplates that the new licensee shall, to the extent of any deficiency in the system of the existing company to meet the new traffic, increase for the existing company the capacity of the system of the existing company. Moreover, the defendants' lines are not congested in the sense that they cannot bear a heavier load at times other than the busiest hour of the day. There is plenty of margin at other times, and if intercommunication were established at once there would be a reasonable possibility of dealing with the additional traffic, not necessarily as speedily as is desirable, but nevertheless to the advantage of the customers, and by degrees the service could be improved, when by increase in the number of lines the congestion which I will assume would at first result at the busiest hour could be removed. Eighty-five per cent. of the plaintiffs' traffic is in Swansea, and a junction between the Swansea exchanges would at once give the means of dealing with this without raising any question of trunk lines being congested. Throughout the arguments addressed and evidence adduced by the defendants there has run a fallacy which was continually repeated—namely, that they are being called upon to do something for the plaintiffs' customers to the injury of their own customers. When intercommunication is established the increased facilities enure not for the plaintiffs' customers only, but for the defendants' customers equally. The latter are able to enjoy a facility which they could not enjoy before—namely, that of communicating telephonically with persons lying outside the defendants' service. In the events which have happened, the defendants' customers are entitled as much as the plaintiffs' customers to the benefit of intercommunication. Every conversation which takes place by way of intercommunication is a conversation to which a customer of the defendants is necessarily a party, and of which he has the benefit. Many months ago the plaintiffs, at their own expense, laid from their Swansea exchange to a manhole closely adjacent to the defendants' Swansea exchange junction lines, said to consist of 217 pairs, for the purpose of connecting the two exchanges at Swansea. The defendants refused to connect them. The plaintiffs on the 31st of August, 1904, offered further to make connections at each place at which the two undertakings have sub-exchanges closely adjacent to each other—namely, at Mumbles and at Morriston, and they further offered to connect any further sub-exchanges which the plaintiffs might provide in other parts of the area where the defendants already had an exchange if the defendants on their part would do the like. The defendants did not accede. Their letter of the 20th of September, 1904, to which I have already referred, constituted, in my opinion, a refusal to give intercommunication except upon the terms there stated. And that refusal was repeated by Mr. Gaine in the box. On the 3rd of November, 1904, the writ was issued.

The question for determination is whether the defendants have refused to afford proper facilities. In my opinion they have. "But then," say the defendants, "the remedy of the plaintiffs, if any, is only in damages; they cannot have an order that the defendants do afford proper facilities." They so contend upon two grounds—first, that this court cannot determine what proper facilities are; and, secondly, that if it can, an order to afford facilities would involve that the court should enforce the performance of a continuous act. As to the former of these, it may well be that the court could not order a definite number of junction lines to be laid, or a staff of a defined number to be employed, or the business to be conducted in any particular way, or anything of that kind. But the court may, in my judgment, indicate that a certain way of carrying out intercommunication is the proper one, leaving it to the companies to determine how, as matter of working, it can be carried into effect, and negatively the court can interfere by determining, as I have done in the former part of this judgment, that a particular way of carrying out intercommunication is not the right one. This is a course familiar in many cases that might be adduced. In cases of nuisance, for instance, the court does not take in hand the conduct of the business which is causing the nuisance and continuously supervise it and ensure that it be so carried on as that there shall not be a nuisance. The court grants an injunction, indicates sometimes for the benefit of a defendant the course which, upon the report of an expert referee, the court thinks may be adopted to abate the nuisance, and gives the defendant an opportunity to take that course. He may take it with or without modifications, or refuse to take it if he likes, but if he does refuse the court holds the means of compelling him. So here, I do not propose to order the defendants to give facilities in any defined or exhaustive form, but I will indicate what I think upon the evidence they at least ought to do, and if they do not in that way, with or without such modifications as the nature of their business requires, give proper facilities, I shall have the means of enforcing the order. The details, no doubt, must be left to those who have the conduct of the undertaking, but the powers of the court are not rendered nugatory if the defendants will not apply their minds so to conduct their undertaking as to give effect to the plaintiffs' statutory rights. As regards the second objection, I am not pressed with the contention. The defendants do not come here to say that they refuse to give intercommunication. On the contrary, Mr. Gaine has said in the box that if he cannot legitimately support any of the objections which he has raised, he is prepared to comply with the defendants' statutory obligation to give intercommunication. The question between the parties is not whether intercommunication shall be given, but how it shall be given. Upon the evidence before me, I think that proper facilities include the establishment of junctions between the following exchanges of the plaintiffs and defendants respectively—viz., first, between the two exchanges at Swansea; secondly, between the two exchanges at the Mumbles; and thirdly, between the two exchanges at Morriston, and I think that the cost ought to be borne equally by the parties. The proper incidence of the cost has not been disputed before me. The order which I propose to make will not involve that the court shall intervene to enforce the continuous doing of a succession of acts. The order will enforce the establishment of intercommunication. Under the instruments which govern the defendants they are bound, as between themselves and the Postmaster-General, not to give favour or preference to any person whomsoever as a customer of the company. They must serve the customers of the plaintiffs, who under the Act become entitled to facilities for transmission of their messages, as much as the customers of the defendants themselves. The court may safely leave it to the Postmaster-General to ensure that the obligations of the service shall be observed after the intercommunication has been established.

The judgment which I pronounce is as follows: I declare that under section 3 (5) of the Telegraph Act, 1899, and the order, and in the events which have happened, the plaintiffs are entitled to be afforded by the defendants all proper facilities for restricted intercommunication within the meaning of the order between persons using the defendants' system and persons using the plaintiffs' system, and I declare that the defendants have improperly refused to give such proper facilities. There will be an order that the defendants do give such proper facilities, and there will be liberty to apply. The defendants must pay the costs of the action. Under the liberty reserved either party can apply to the court; and, if the defendants are really in any difficulty as to the connections which they ought to make or the facilities they ought to give, they can come to the court under this liberty and not leave the matter to be determined in the most inconvenient way—viz., by a motion for sequestration. I may say for their guidance that, as at present advised, I think that junction circuits at the three places which I have named and facilities for using them will be, for the present at any rate, a compliance with the order; and experience will best show whether anything and what further is required.

Solicitors, Sharpe, Parker, Pritchards, Barham, & Lawford, for J. Thomas, Town Clerk, Swansea; W. E. L. Gaine.

Chan. Div. } April 6, 7, 14.
Buckley, J. }

In re ANDERSON.
PEGLER v. GILLATT. (a.)

Estoppel—Disposition by testatrix under incapacity—Entry of tenant for life under will and acquisition by him of possessory title—Rights of remaindermen.

Where a married woman, married before 1883, disposed of freehold property, over which she had a power of appointment, in favour of her husband for life, and by a codicil purported to devise certain other of her freehold property (over which she had no power of appointment) to her husband for life with remainders over, and the husband entered and held both properties for twenty-one years,

Held, that the husband was not estopped from denying the validity of the disposition by the codicil of the property therein comprised, and that the rights of the remaindermen were barred.

At the date of her marriage, on the 9th of March, 1871, with William Anderson, Ann Anderson was entitled in fee simple in possession to certain property (in this case referred to as the Litchurch property), and was also entitled in fee simple in reversion expectant on the death of Elizabeth Miller to certain other property (in this case referred to as the Worksop property).

By an ante-nuptial settlement, dated the 17th of February, 1871, the Litchurch property was conveyed to the use of such person or persons as Ann Anderson should in writing appoint, and in default of appointment to the separate use of Ann Anderson for life, with remainders over. The settlement contained no covenant to settle after-acquired property.

By her will, dated the 29th of April, 1871, Ann Anderson, in exercise of her power of appointment under the settlement, devised the Litchurch property to the use of her husband, William Anderson, for life, with remainder to her brother, Edwin Johnson, upon trust to sell and divide the proceeds among her three brothers, William, Frederick, and Edwin, and their heirs, share and share alike.

(a.) Reported by H. H. KING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By the death of Elizabeth Miller, on the 5th of November, 1872, the reversionary interest in the Worksop property fell into possession, and by a codicil, dated the 20th of December, 1873, Ann Anderson purported to dispose of the Worksop property in favour of her husband for life, with remainder to her brother Edwin Johnson, upon trust to sell the same and divide the proceeds between her three brothers, share and share alike. The codicil provided that in case of the death of any of her said brothers in the lifetime of her husband leaving issue, such issue should take their parent's share of the property bequeathed either by the will or the codicil, and in case of such death without leaving issue the share in both properties of the brother so dying should go to the survivors.

Ann Anderson died on the 29th of May, 1882, leaving her husband and her three brothers her surviving.

William Anderson thereupon entered into possession of both the Litchurch property and the Worksop property and continued in undisputed possession until his death on the 8th of December, 1903. The question raised by the summons was, shortly, whether, having so entered on both properties, either under the will and codicil of his wife or otherwise, he could claim the Worksop property against the persons entitled in remainder under the codicil, on the ground that, being married before 1882, his wife had no power to dispose of the Worksop property.

The summons was taken out by Ann Elizabeth Pegler, the only child of Edwin Johnson, and her husband for the determination of the question whether Ann Elizabeth Pegler (William and Frederick Johnson having both died in the lifetime of William Anderson without issue) was entitled in fee simple in possession to both the Litchurch property and the Worksop property.

The defendant Jane Gillatt was the legal personal representative of the widow (and universal devisee and legatee) of William Johnson, the eldest brother and heir-at-law of Ann Anderson.

William Anderson left a will, of which probate was granted to the defendant Mary Mason as attorney for the executor to whom he had devised his real estate.

Buckmaster, K.C., and S. Leeke, for the plaintiffs.—Ann Elizabeth Pegler is entitled to the Worksop property as well as to the Litchurch property, as the sole surviving issue of Ann Anderson's three brothers. Ann Anderson had power under the settlement to dispose of the Litchurch property, but being married before 1883 had no power to dispose of the Worksop property. William Anderson, having taken the interest given to him by the will in the Litchurch property, could not dispute that Ann Anderson's codicil disposed of the Worksop property, though in fact she had no power to so dispose of it, and those claiming through William Anderson cannot deny that the dispositions made by the codicil were valid: Dalton v. Fitzgerald, 45 W. R. 685, [1897] 2 Ch. 86. As was said by Mellor, J., in Board v. Board, 22 W. R. 206, L. R. 9 Q. B. 48, 54, a person cannot say that a will is valid to enable him to take a benefit under it, but invalid so far as regards the interests of those in remainder who claim under the same will. William Anderson's possession must be treated as possession under the will, and his possession was for the benefit of those claiming under the will. The property therefore goes on the death of William Anderson to Ann Elizabeth Pegler, who claims under the will.

Astbury, K.C., and W. S. Sherrington, for Jane Gillatt.—This defendant's interest is that of the heir-at-law of Ann Anderson, and it cannot be disputed that the claim of the heir-at-law has been barred by adverse possession.

Cann, for Mary Mason.—This defendant is entitled to the Worksop property as legal representative of of William Anderson. William Anderson, by being in possession from 1882 to 1903 acquired a good statutory title to the Worksop property as against all the world. The argument of the defendants in Dalton v. Fitzgerald, before Stirling, J., is applicable to this defendant's case. The authorities may be divided into two classes: First, cases where the testator has no title but makes a devise which would be effective to pass the property if he had a title, such as Board v. Board and Hawksbee v. Hawksbee, 11 Hare 230; and secondly, cases where the testator has a good title but cannot make an effective devise, such as Paine v. Jones, 22 W. R. 837, L. R. 18 Eq. 320, and In re Stringer's Estate, 25 W. R. 815, 6 Ch. D. 1. In the latter class of cases a person who enters under the impression that he is taking under the will is not estopped thereby from setting up a title against the remainderman. The present case falls into the latter class. Ann Anderson had a good title but no testamentary capacity. In Paine v. Jones Malins, V.C., distinguishes Hawksbee v. Hawksbee and Anstee v. Nelms, 1 H. & N. 225. Under the old law by which a testator could not dispose of lands acquired after the date of the will, if a will was insufficiently executed to pass realty, no case of election arose, the will, so far as it purported to affect realty, being considered as non-existent (Sheddon v. Goodrich, 8 Ves. 481), and so, too, where the testator was incapacitated by infancy or coverture: Hearle v. Greenbank, 3 Atk. 695; Rich v. Cockell, 9 Ves. 369; and Theobald on Wills (6th ed.), 111, 112.

Buckmaster, K.C., in reply.—The argument for Mary Mason rests upon Paine v. Jones, but in that case there were special circumstances. Mary Mason can only escape from Dalton v. Fitzgerald by saying that Paine v. Jones lays down a principle and applies where the facts are partly but not wholly the same as there. Lopes, L.J., lays down a principle in Dalton v. Fitzgerald which covers this case, and Mellor, J., lays down the same principle, though less distinctly, in Board v. Board.

Cur. adv. vult.

BUCKLEY, J.—At the date of her will, on the 29th of April, 1871, Ann Anderson, who was married on the 9th of March, 1871, was, by virtue of a power contained in her marriage settlement, dated the 17th of February, 1871, competent to dispose of the Litchurch property, and she made a testamentary disposition of it under which her husband William Anderson took a life estate. At the date of her codicil, on the 20th of December, 1873, Ann Anderson was entitled for an estate which had fallen into possession by the dropping of a life on the 5th of November, 1872, in the Worksop property, but, being a married woman married before the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, she had no testamentary power over it. By her codicil she purported to devise it to her husband, the said William Anderson, for life, with remainder over, and confirmed her will. Ann Anderson died on the 29th of May, 1882, and thereupon William Anderson entered into possession of both properties, and so continued until his death on the 5th of December, 1903. Under these circumstances Ann Anderson's heir does not dispute that he is barred as regards the Worksop property by adverse possession. The question is whether William Anderson's estate is entitled, or whether the gift of the Worksop property after William Anderson's death contained in Ann Anderson's codicil is to have effect as against William Anderson and those deriving title under him. Is it a true proposition that William Anderson entered under Ann Anderson's testamentary disposition, and that he and those claiming under him are estopped from saying that her testamentary disposition of Worksop was invalid because she had no testamentary power. The plaintiff, who claims under the testamentary disposition, says that Mellor, J.'s, sentence in Board v. Board, L. R. 9 Q. B. 48, at p. 54, applies—viz., "A person cannot say that a will is valid to enable him to take a benefit under it, but invalid so far as regards the interests of those in remainder who claim under the same will." Board v. Board was a case of a testamentary instrument validly executed by a person who had no title to the property in dispute. Its principle does not, I think, apply to the case of a person who has a title but does not (because she cannot) devise. An analogy is, I think, to be found in the cases as to election under the old law when a man could not dispose by will of lands acquired after the date of his will. In those cases it was held that if there was a will validly executed and expressing a clear intention to dispose of the after-acquired lands the heir was put to his election, but that if the will was insufficently executed to pass realty, or the testatrix by reason of infancy or coverture was incompetent to dispose by will, no case of election arose: Hearle v. Greenbank, Sheddon v. Goodrich, and see Blicklock v. Grindle, 17 W. R. 114, L. R. 7 Eq. 215. In Hearle v. Greenbank, 3 Atk. 695, at p. 715, Lord Hardwicke says: "But suppose the execution of the power is bad, yet it is said the plaintiffs have an equity to compel the infant to let them take the real estate, for she shall not take both by the will and against the will. In general this rule is right, and founded on proper premisses but a wrong conclusion; for this purpose see the case of Noys v. Mordaunt, in 2 Vern. 581: see also Morris v. Burrowes, 2 Atk. 629. I am of opinion that the infant in the present case is not to be compelled to make her election. For the instrument here being void as to the real estate, there is no instance where an infant has in such a case been compelled to make an election, for here is properly no will at all as to the lands. It is like the case where a man executes a will in the presence of two witnesses only, and devises his real estate from his heir-at-law, and the personal estate to the heir-at-law; this is a good will as to personal estate, yet for want of being executed according to the Statute of Frauds and Perjuries, is bad as to the real estate; and I should in that case be of opinion that the devisee of the real estate could not compel the heir-at-law to make good the devise of the real estate before he could entitle himself to his personal legacy, because here is no will of real estate for want of proper forms and ceremonies required by the statute." In a case like the present the question is not whether the same person can say that a will is valid for his benefit but invalid in other respects, but whether he can say that a certain part of a testamentary disposition is a will and another part is not a will. To such a case the language of Mellor, J., does not in my opinion apply. Paine v. Jones, L. R. 18 Eq. 320, is an authority which upon this point does not seem to have been affected by the subsequent decisions. In Dalton v. FitzGerald, [1897] 2 Ch. 86, 91, the decision of Malins, V.C., in Paine v. Jones is no doubt considerably shaken, but I cannot see that Lindley, L.J., threw doubt upon it upon the question which I here have to decide. On the contrary, the observations of the Lord Justice upon Sir George Jessel's decision in In re Stringer's Estate, 6 Ch. D. 1, which immediately follow upon what he said as to Paine v. Jones, lead me to think that he did not intend his language to throw any doubt upon Paine v. Jones in such a state of circumstances as the present. He seems to affirm an objection to the extension of the doctrine of estoppel to beneficiaries who do not dispute their testator's title, but do dispute that their testator made a valid disposition of property which was property of their testator.

In my judgment William Anderson and those who derive title under him are not, by reason of the fact that William Anderson under the will entered as tenant for life of the Litchurch property, estopped from denying that Ann Anderson made a good testamentary disposition of the Worksop property. It results that William Anderson's estate is entitled to the Worksop property. There is in any case no question of election, for the Worksop property was not the property of William Anderson.

Solicitors, Few & Co.; Peacock & Goddard for Henry Vickers, Son, & Brown, Sheffield; J. H. Lee & Watts, for Whittingham & Williams, Nottingham.

K. B. Div. (Bigham, J.) — May 4, 5.

SIMPSON STEAMSHIP CO. (LIMITED) v. PREMIER UNDERWRITING ASSOCIATION (LIMITED). (a.)

Insurance (Marine)—Construction of warranty—"Not to proceed east of Singapore"—Voyage to a port east of Singapore—Vessel lost before Singapore reached.

A time policy of marine insurance contained the following warranty: "Warranted not to proceed east of Singapore." The vessel was chartered to carry coals from Cardiff to a port east of Singapore. While on her voyage she was wrecked off the Tunis coast and lost.

Held, that the loss was covered by the policy, and that at the time of the loss there had been no breach of the warranty.

Action tried in the Commercial Court.

Claim for £1,000 under a policy of marine insurance on the steamship Scaw Fell, which was lost by stranding off the coast of Tunis on the 27th of April, 1904.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and Bailhache, for the plaintiffs.

Scrutton, K.C., and D. C. Leck, for the defendants.

The facts and contention appear in the following judgment:

BIGHAM, J.—This is an action on a time policy to recover for a total loss of a ship called the Scaw Fell, and the first question to be determined is whether the policy was in operation at the date of the loss. The policy ran from the 1st of March, 1904, to the 1st of March, 1905. On the 16th of April, 1904, the vessel sailed from Cardiff with a cargo of coals for Kiao-chau, a port well east of Singapore. When off the coast of Tunis, on the 27th of April, 1904, she was totally lost. The defendants refuse to pay upon the ground that before the loss occurred there had been a breach of a warranty in the policy, the effect of which was to cause the policy to cease to attach. The warranty is in the following words: "Warranted not to proceed east of Singapore except to Java and Australasia." The contention is that the moment the ship lifted her anchor at Cardiff and started on her voyage to Kiao-chau she was "proceeding east of Singapore," and therefore breaking the warranty.

(a.) Reported by W. T. TURTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

I am clearly of opinion that this contention is wrong. There was at most merely an intention to proceed east of Singapore, and an intention to commit a breach of course does not itself constitute a breach. But it was said that the question is governed by authority, and two cases were referred to. In Colledge v. Harty, 6 Exch., p. 205, 20 L. J. Exch. 146, the policy was a time policy, and the warranty was that the ship was not "to sail to any port in the Belts." The ship did sail from Newcastle, bound for the Belts. The court held that the warranty had been broken and that the policy had ceased to attach. In Simon Israel & Co. v. Sedgwick, 41 W. R. 163, [1893] 1 Q. B., p. 303, the policy was a voyage policy on goods from the Mersey to "any port in Spain this side of Gibraltar." The goods left in a ship bound for Cartagena. The court held that a voyage to Cartagena was not one of the voyages covered by the policy. Neither of these cases, in my opinion, affects the question before me. In each of them the vessel sailed on a voyage to which the policy did not apply. In the present case the only prohibition was that the vessel should not navigate waters east of Singapore, and she never did.

The next question is whether there has been a breach of a condition indorsed on the policy. The defendants are a club, and the condition is in the following terms: "Every member shall, if required, when transmitting his proposal for insurance or as soon as practicable thereafter, deliver to the managers, duly filled up and completed, a slip or form provided by the association for the purpose, wherein he shall state the rate or rates of premium and conditions of all other insurances effected by him on the steamship, and/or other insurable interests connected therewith insured by the association, or if no other insurance has been effected, such slip or form shall be filled up accordingly. The managers may require the production of all policies referred to in such slip or form and/or all covering notes relating thereto. Any member who shall on request neglect, or who shall refuse to deliver such slip or form, duly filled up and completed or produce the policies referred to in such slip or form and or covering notes relating thereto, and any member who shall deliver any such slip or form containing any misrepresentation shall absolutely forfeit all claim which he shall or may have upon the association, unless the managers and directors shall decide otherwise." It is said that the plaintiff never delivered the slip or form referred to in this condition, and it is true that he did not do so in relation to this particular policy until after the loss; but as a matter of fact, and on the evidence before me, I find that the plaintiff never on request either neglected or refused to deliver the slip. He was no doubt asked for the slip more than once, but it happened to be at times when the information required for filling it up was not at hand. Thus some delay arose. It did not, however, occur to anybody, until after the loss, that there was any neglect on the plaintiff's part in the matter, and I am satisfied that there was not. Moreover, I doubt whether the condition in question applies to the present case. This action is brought upon a renewal policy, and no proposal was ever transmitted within the meaning of the condition by the plaintiff. As the condition stipulates that the slip is to be transmitted with the proposal, and there never was any proposal, I doubt whether the condition applies at all in the present case; but whether it does or not, I am satisfied that there was no breach of it. There must be judgment for the plaintiff for the amount claimed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Smith, Rundell, & Dods, for Vachell & Co., Cardiff.

Solicitors for the defendants, Pritchard & Sons.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). Feb. 27.

MAAS v. PEPPER. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Bill of sale—Hire and purchase agreement—Colourable transaction—Inference of fact—Registration—Bills of Sale Acts, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31) and 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 8.

The appellant advanced £2,000 to a publican to enable him to complete the purchase of an hotel. It was arranged that the appellant should buy the furniture in the hotel from the vendor for £2,000, and should sell it to the publican under a hire-purchase agreement. This was carried out, the purchase was completed and the hotel carried on for some time. The publican became bankrupt, and his trustee claimed the furniture, which had already been seized by the appellant on default made in payment of one of the instalments under the hire-purchase agreement.

Held, that the £2,000 was a loan to the purchaser of the hotel, and that the hire-purchase agreement was a security for the loan, which was void for want of registration as a bill of sale.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (Mellor's Trustee v. Maas & Co.) affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Court of Appeal, affirming that of Wright, J. (50 W. R. 111, [1902] 1 K. B. 137).

The respondent was trustee in the bankruptcy of Mellor, a publican.

On the 4th of May, 1899, Mellor entered into an agreement in writing with one Sykes, whereby Sykes agreed to sell and Mellor agreed to purchase a freehold property known as the Crown Hotel, Leamington, together with the furniture, fixtures, fittings, and effects therein, save certain specifically excepted furniture, for the sum of £30,000, whereof the sum of £750 was paid by Mellor as a deposit at the time of signing the agreement.

The hotel was subject to a first mortgage of £10,000, and it was a term of the agreement that the vendor should leave the sum of £12,500 on second mortgage of the hotel, subject to the first mortgage, and that such sums should be respectively reckoned as part of the purchase price of £30,000. Mellor further arranged for a third mortgage on the hotel of £4,500, leaving a balance of £3,000 of the purchase-money to be found by him.

The purchase was to be completed on the 15th of May, and shortly before the 15th of May, 1899, Mellor asked the appellant (Maas) to advance him £2,000, in order to enable him to complete the purchase, on the security of a further mortgage. This the appellant declined to do, but offered to lend the sum on a bill of sale, which Mellor refused. At length it was agreed between the appellant and Mellor that the former should purchase the furniture, fixtures, and fittings and effects from Sykes for £2,000, being the amount required by Mellor to enable him to complete the purchase of the hotel, and that the appellant should then re-sell the same to Mellor on a hire-purchase agreement.

On the 15th of May, 1899, the appellant bought the furniture for the sum of £2,000 from Sykes, and on the same 15th of May, and before the completion of the purchase, Mellor executed a hire-purchase agreement with the appellant, by which he agreed to hire the chattels and things specified in the receipt and inventory for a sum of £2,412 16s., payable by equal quarterly instalments of £75 8s., extending over eight years, and upon the terms that on payment of the said sum of £2,412 16s. at the times and in the manner prescribed by the agreement, the chattels and things should become the property of Mellor. Mellor also signed an agreement, binding himself, as long as any money should be due under the hiring agreement, to purchase all his wines and spirits from the appellant's firm.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The purchase of the hotel by Mellor was then completed. Maas did not take possession of the furniture, which remained in the hotel, and the hire-purchase agreement was not registered as a bill of sale.

On the 19th of December, 1900, Mellor was adjudicated bankrupt. Maas seized the furniture the day before the receiving order, and gave notice to the trustee. The furniture was claimed by the appellant Maas under the hire-purchase agreement, and also claimed by the trustee in bankruptcy. By agreement the value of the furniture was paid into a bank to abide the result of the trial.

Wright, J., found that the hire-purchase agreement was a security for a loan, and gave judgment for the trustee in bankruptcy, and this judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeal.

Maas appealed.

Herbert Reed, K.C., and Frank Mellor (G. A. Layton with them), for the appellant.

Shearman, K.C., and Horace J. Rowlands, for the respondent.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—I do not think it is necessary to go through all the facts of this case. I think Wright, J., came to the right conclusion as a matter of fact. It seems to me that the whole of the evidence points in one direction. I do not think that the sale to Mr. Maas was a reality. I think the obvious purpose was that Mr. Maas was to lend £2,000 to get the security of the furniture and yet not to be within the Bills of Sale Act; that was the whole object so far as this transaction was concerned. Everything raises a very strong presumption that this was a colourable sale. The only thing that would have brought me to a different conclusion would have been if Mr. Maas himself had been called and had given a perfectly clear and credible account of how it was that the original arrangement was completely altered by all the parties, and that he was to become the vendee of these goods. I do not think he ever was that. It was for those who insisted upon the sale of the furniture being a real and bonâ fide sale, to have proved it. In my view the judgments of Wright, J., and the Court of Appeal were right, and I move your lordships that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion, but with some hesitation. The learned judge has found that this was not a real sale to Maas, but a sale to Maas on behalf of Mellor; and, having regard to the fact that Maas was not called, and consequently not subjected to cross-examination, I am not prepared to differ from the learned judge.

Lord JAMES OF HEREFORD.—I am disposed to agree with the judgment of your lordships, but I am in much the same position as my noble and learned friend Lord Macnaghten. The case comes before us upon an allegation that a wrong inference has been drawn from facts which are not in dispute. If that is so, I think this House ought to deal with great consideration with the inference which has been drawn, first by the learned judge who heard the case in the first instance, and secondly by the Court of Appeal. For my own part, I am not quite certain that I should have drawn the same inference from the facts; but I am of opinion that there has not been enough established here to show that the inference, which was drawn by Wright, J., a judge of very great experience in matters of bankruptcy, and by the learned judges in the Court of Appeal, was certainly wrong.

Lord LINDLEY.—I think the decision of Wright, J., was perfectly correct. I should have come to the same conclusion myself. I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that this was a loan on security, and that there was no sale at all.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the appellant, Edward Betteley.

Solicitor for the respondent, Wellington Taylor, for Rowlands & Co., Birmingham.

Court of Appeal.

Appeal.
(Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) — May 12.

CASE v. COLONIAL WHARVES (LIMITED). (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Earnings—Average weekly earnings—Costs of appeal—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, Schedule I. (1) (b).

There is no presumption for the purposes of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, that a casual labourer employed by the hour will continue in his employment for more than one hour.

Where an applicant under the Workmen's Compensation Act appeals unsuccessfully against the amount of compensation awarded him, the costs of appeal will be set off against his costs in the court below.

Appeal of applicant from award of the judge of Whitechapel County Court.

A workman employed by the respondents as a casual labourer at 6d. an hour worked for eleven hours on the first day of his employment and was then accidentally injured. The county court judge held that his average weekly earnings were no more than 5s. 6d., and accorded him a weekly payment of 2s. 9d.

The workman appealed.

Dodd, K.C., and George Philips, for the appellant.—The county court judge ought to have taken into account the probability of the workman continuing in his employment, and to have inquired whether there was any evidence that the applicant would have worked for more than one day but for the accident, and for how many days, and for how much in toto for the week: Ayres v. Buckeridge, 50 W. R. 115, [1902] 1 K. B. 57.

J. A. Simon, for the respondents, was not called on.

COLLINS, M.R., said that in Ayres v. Buckeridge the workman was not a mere casual labourer, and that the present case fell within the decision of the House of Lords in Lysons v. Knowles, 49 W. R. 696, [1901] A. C. 79, as explained by the Court of Appeal in Bartlett v. Sutton, 50 W. R. 149, [1902] 1 K. B. 72. The costs of the appeal should be set off against the costs of the applicant in the court below.

MATHEW and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Noon & Clarke; Hicklin, Washington, & Co.

(a.) Reported by D. R. CHALMERS-HUNT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal.
(Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) May 6.

WILKES v. DOWELL & Co. (LIMITED). (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Accident arising out of the employment—Fall owing to epileptic fit—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 1, sub-section 1.

The applicant was employed by the respondents in unloading coal from a steamer at their wharf. The coal was put into a bucket, which was raised from the hold by a hydraulic crane, and the bucket when emptied was lowered into the hold again. The applicant's duty was to stand upon a stage next to the opening into the hold and to guide the bucket when it was being lowered into the hold by the crane, and to give signals to the man who was working the crane. While so employed he was seized with an epileptic fit and fell into the hold and was injured. In proceedings for the assessment of compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897,

Held, that the injury to the applicant was caused by an "accident" which arose "out of" his employment within section 1, sub-section 1, of the Act.

Appeal from an award made by his Honour Judge Addison, K.C., at the Greenwich County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant for compensation was employed at the respondents' wharf in unloading coal from a steamer. The coal was put into a bucket which was raised from the hold by a hydraulic crane, and the bucket was then lowered into the hold again. The applicant's duty was to stand upon a stage, which was made so that he could look down the hold, and to guide the bucket by means of a long pole while it was being lowered into the hold by the crane, and to give signals to the man who was working the crane. While he was standing on the stage engaged in his work, he was seized with an epileptic fit and fell into the hold and was severely injured, breaking his thigh and fracturing his hip. The applicant had had three epileptic fits before the day in question. The county court judge was of opinion that he was bound by the authorities to hold that the injuries sustained by the applicant were not caused by an accident arising out of his employment so as to entitle him to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. He therefore decided in favour of the respondents.

The applicant appealed.

Overend and John Duncan, for the applicant.—The injuries here were caused by the fall, which was an accident, and none the less because the fall was caused by the epileptic fit: Reynolds v. Accidental Insurance Co., 18 W. R. 1141; Winspear v. Accident Insurance Co., 29 W. R. 116, 6 Q. B. D. 42; Lawrence v. Accident Insurance Co., 29 W. R. 802, 7 Q. B. D. 216. The word "accident" has a wider meaning in the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, than in a policy of insurance against accidents: Fenton v. Thorley & Co., 52 W. R. 81, [1903] A. C. 443, Turvey v. Brintons (Limited), 52 W. R. 195, [1904] 1 K. B. 328, in H. L., 21 T. L. R. Secondly, the accident arose out of the applicant's employment. He was employed to stand upon a stage close to the opening into the hold, and if he fell he must almost necessarily fall down the hold. The fall, therefore, was an accident arising out of his employment. The Act therefore applied.

Ruegg, K.C., and W. Shakespeare, for the employers.—The injuries were not caused by "accident" within section 1, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The epileptic fit was the cause of the injury. The accident insurance cases, as was pointed out by the House of Lords in Fenton v. Thorley & Co., have no real bearing upon the meaning of "accident" in this Act. Next, if the injuries were caused by "accident," the accident did not arise "out of" the employment. In Fenton v. Thorley & Co. and Turvey v. Brintons (Limited) the only question was as to the meaning of the word "accident," and no question arose as to whether the accident arose "out of" the employment. The disease here caused the fall, and the fact that the workman was at the time standing near a hole and fell into it could not make the employers liable. The employment did not in any way cause the accident. The real effective cause was the disease—namely, the epileptic fit, and not any risk arising from the applicant's employment. The applicant carried with him to his work a disability arising from his predisposition to epileptic fits, and he cannot throw upon his employers liability for any injury caused by that predisposition. The county court judge found that the cause of the injury was the fit, and this court will not interfere with that finding.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the decision of Judge Addison, sitting at the Greenwich County Court, by a workman who met with an injury under circumstances which, it is contended, brings the case within the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, as being an injury caused by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment. The judge came to the conclusion, as it seems to me, rather as a matter of law than as a matter of fact, that the injury was not caused by an accident arising out of and in the course of the employment. The circumstances were that the workman was employed close to the opening into the hold of a ship, his duty being to stand upon a stage, and to guide a bucket which was lowered into and raised from the hold by means of a crane. The man was subject to epileptic fits, and he had a seizure while he was standing on the stage and fell into the hold and was injured. The question is whether the injury was caused by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment.

It is contended that, inasmuch as the original cause of the fall was the epileptic fit, which was a cause carried by the workman to his place of employment, the injury which he sustained was not caused by accident arising out of the employment, but that it arose from what Mr. Ruegg called the idiopathic condition of the man. It seems to me that that argument is excluded by authority. The cases of insurance against accident which have been referred to have always been followed and have never been doubted, and, as was pointed out by the House of Lords in Fenton v. Thorley & Co., the policies in those cases were carefully framed in the interest of the insurers, with the object of excluding liability by reason of what is called the idiopathic condition of the assured bringing on an injury by accident. In Reynolds v. Accidental Insurance Co. the assured, while bathing in shallow water, was seized with sudden insensibility and fell down and was drowned; in Winspear v. Accident Insurance Co. the assured, while crossing a stream, was seized with an epileptic fit and fell into the water and was drowned; and in Lawrence v. Accident Insurance Co. the assured, while on a railway platform, was seized with a fit and fell on to the line and was run over by an engine. In all those cases it was held that, notwithstanding the special stipulations in the policies, the injury was caused by an accident. In other words, that the causa proxima must be looked at, the accident being the falling into the water, or the falling on to the railway line, though the original cause of the fall in each case, and therefore the more remote cause of the injury, was the sudden seizure at a particular place. It is said that those cases have no application to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and reliance is placed upon some observations in Fenton v. Thorley & Co. in the House of Lords. When looked at those observations do not affect the authority of the cases upon the point before us. The point of those observations is that the remedy of the workman is not to be limited by the qualifications put upon the meaning of the word "accident" by the special contract in those cases. They are directed towards showing that the words "injury by accident" in the Act are wider in their scope than similar words in the special contract of insurance. If what happened would be an accident within a policy of insurance where there are such special stipulations, à fortiori it would be an accident within the meaning of the Act. Moreover, it is clear, in accordance with the principle which lies behind those decisions, that the injury in the present case was an injury by accident. The man was found lying in the hold. The cause of his injuries was the fall. That fall was caused by the idiopathic condition of the man himself, and on that ground it is said that the injury was not caused by an accident. It is precisely there that the principle upon which the insurance cases are founded comes in. Though the original cause of the fall was the fit, the fall itself was an accident, and the injury was caused by that accident.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The only remaining question is, Did the accident arise out of and in the course of the employment? When once one gets rid of the confusion arising from the fact that the original cause of the fall was the fit, and the confusion that is involved in not dissevering the actual injury and the cause thereof from the more remote cause—namely, the fit—the difficulty arising from the words "arising out of" the employment is removed. How did the accident come about? Because by the conditions of his employment the man was bound to stand upon a stage close to the opening into the hold. It was part of his duty to stand on the edge of a precipice, and when he was seized with a fit he almost necessarily fell over that precipice. The injury resulted from the fall, which was brought about by the necessity imposed upon him of working next to the opening into the hold. It did not cease to be an accident arising out of the employment because the more remote cause of it was the idiopathic condition of the man himself. The accident, therefore, arose out of and in the course of the employment. The Act accordingly applies, and the workman is entitled to compensation.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The true cause of the injuries to this workman was the fall. We have the high authority of the House of Lords for saying that a case like this comes within the Act. In Fenton v. Thorley & Co. Lord Macnaghten said: "It does seem to me extraordinary that anybody should suppose that when the advantages of insurance against accident at their employers' expense was being conferred on workmen, Parliament could have intended to exclude from the benefit of the Act some injuries ordinarily described as 'accidents' which beyond all others merit favourable consideration in the interest of workmen and employers alike." Applying the view there expressed, the Act operates as a statutory policy of insurance against accidents in certain employments. According to the cases referred to by the Master of the Rolls this statutory policy covers the injury in the present case. We should be going contrary to those cases if we went back to the remote condition of the man himself, which brought about the fall. He was injured by the accident of falling from the place where he was bound to work, and therefore the Act applies.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. It is plain from the authorities referred to that there was here an "accident." It is also clear that the accident arose in the course of the employment. The only question is whether it arose "out of" the employment. Upon the whole I think that it did. If we were to adopt the contention that the employers are not liable for the remote consequences arising from a disability which a workman brings with him to his work, our decision would have a far-reaching effect. A workman brings with him to his work a particular disability. In the course of his employment he is placed in a dangerous position where he is more liable, by reason of his disability, to meet with an accident than a man who is not subject to that disability. For instance, an old man is more liable to an accident when placed in a dangerous position than a young man. The same rule must apply to an infirmity or disability other than that of old age—namely, as in the present case, a predisposition to epileptic fits. If in the discharge of his duty the workman meets with an accident, it will be an accident arising out of his employment, and none the less so because the remote cause was his physical disability.

Appeal allowed, and an order made by consent for payment of 13*s.* 9*d. a week during incapacity.*

Solicitor for the applicant, Roland H. Ward.

Solicitor for the employers, William Hurd & Son.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) — May 2, 3, 4.

FLETCHER v. COLLIS. (a.)

Trustee—Breach of trust—Consent of beneficiary—Replacement of lost fund by trustee—Impounding interest of consenting beneficiary.

Mere acquiescence in a breach of trust on the part of a beneficiary, who derives no personal benefit from the breach of trust, does not render such beneficiary's interest in the trust estate liable to be impounded in order to indemnify the trustee liable to make good the loss occasioned by the breach. But in the absence of special circumstances, such as the existence of a peculiarly confidential relation between the trustee and the beneficiary, a beneficiary who has consented to a breach of trust cannot make the trustee liable to him for any damage suffered in respect of his interest in the trust estate. Nor if the loss be made good by the trustee at the instance of other beneficiaries, is the beneficiary, who has consented to the breach of trust which gave rise to the loss, entitled as against the trustee to any benefit from the fund so made good.

This was an appeal from Warrington, J.

On the marriage in November, 1881, of a Mr. and Mrs. Fletcher a settlement was made of a personalty fund amounting to £3,100, which was vested in trustees upon trust for the husband for life, with remainder to the wife for life, with remainder to the children of the marriage in the usual way.

In the year 1885 the whole fund vested in the trustees was sold by them with the written assent of the husband, and the whole proceeds of the sale were, in the presence of the husband, paid over by the trustees to his wife, Mrs. Fletcher, who misspent the whole fund.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In 1891 the husband was adjudicated bankrupt, and in the August following the present action was commenced by the infant children of the marriage by their next friend in order to make the trustees liable for the breach of trust which they had committed.

It was admitted by Mr. Fletcher, the husband, that he saw the whole proceeds paid over to his wife, and that he knew that it was intended that she should have £1,000 for her own use, but as regards the balance he said that he understood that that was not to be so used but re-invested at some time or other.

By order of the 22nd of February, 1893, which was made by consent of all parties other than the trustee in bankruptcy of Mr. Fletcher, one of the trustees, the defendant Collis, who had taken the active part in committing the breach of trust, undertook, out of a pension to which he was entitled, and by means of certain policies of assurance over which he gave a mortgage, to pay into court the whole of the sum which had been paid over to the wife with interest at 4 per cent. from the 5th of August, 1891, to the commencement of the action. This order was expressed to be without prejudice to any claim which the trustee in bankruptcy of Mr. Fletcher might have against the trustees of the settlement or either of them.

The defendant Collis had died since the date of this order, and by means of payments from time to time made during his lifetime and by the proceeds of certain policies of assurance after his death, the whole corpus of the trust fund had been replaced, together with interest from the date mentioned in the order. On the 31st of July, 1902, a summons was taken out in the action by the present trustees of the marriage settlement to have it determined (among other things) whether the portion of the said trust funds representing income or any part thereof was payable to the defendant Margaret Agnes Collis as legal personal representative of the defendant William Collis, deceased. This summons was adjourned into court and came on for hearing before Byrne, J., on the 15th and 16th of July and the 8th of August 1903. On the 10th of May, 1904, it came on for further hearing before Warrington, J., and the order was then made which was the subject of the present appeal. By this order it was declared that Margaret Agnes Collis, as such legal personal representative as aforesaid, was entitled to have the life interest of the defendant William Fletcher in the sum of £3,100, being the said settlement trust funds and the investments for the time being representing the same, impounded by way of indemnity in respect of the sum of £1,000, part of the said sum of £3,100.

The legal personal representative appealed from this order in order to have it declared that William Fletcher's interest in the whole sum of £3,100 was liable to be impounded. The trustee in bankruptcy of William Fletcher served a cross-notice of appeal against the declaration that his interest in respect of the £1,000 was liable to be impounded.

Levett, K.C., and A. & B. Terrell, for the legal personal representative of the trustee William Collis.—There is no reason for making any distinction between the £1,000 and the balance of the £3,100. The whole sum was paid away to the wife with the knowledge and consent of the husband. A party who consents to a breach of trust cannot have any claim against the trustee who committed the breach with his concurrence.

They cited Trafford v. Boehm, 3 Atk. 440; Walker v. Symonds, 3 Swanst., at p. 64; Bolton v. Curre, 43 W. R. 521, [1895] 1 Ch. 544.

Alexander, K.C., and Jessel, for the trustee in bankruptcy.—This is really a claim on behalf of a trustee who has committed a breach of trust to impound the interest of a beneficiary. In all the cases before the Trustee Act, 1888, it will be found that for a beneficiary's interest to be impounded he must either have instigated the breach of trust or received a benefit from the breach of trust. In no case has a beneficiary's interest been impounded where there has been mere passive acquiescence on his part. Consent was never a ground for impounding the interest till the passing of section 6 of the Trustee Act, 1888, now replaced by section 45 of the Trustee Act, 1893. But the Legislature in those Acts extended the previously existing law in the interests of the trustee. The Acts do not apply here because the consent must be in writing, and therefore the case depends on the law prior to the passing of the Acts. The husband did not instigate this breach of trust, and he received no benefit from it. The representatives of the trustee are not, therefore, entitled to impound his interest.

In addition to the cases above the following authorities were cited: Lincoln v. Wright, 4 Beav. 427; Sawyer v. Sawyer, 33 W. R. 403, 28 Ch. D. 595; In re Somerset, Somerset v. Paulett, 42 W. R. 145, [1894] 1 Ch. 231; Chillingworth v. Chambers, 44 W. R. 388, [1896] 1 Ch. 685.

Hewitt, for the trustee of the settlement.

Levett, K.C., replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., stated the facts and continued: Under those circumstances the substantial result of this case is, that the trustee in bankruptcy representing Mr. Fletcher the cestui que trust who concurred in the breach of trust has really come into court to say: "I am entitled to complain of this breach of trust and I am entitled to have paid over to me the income which is now embodied in the surplus beyond what is necessary for the replacement of the trust fund.

Now, the question is whether, having regard to the facts which I have mentioned as constituting this concurrence by the cestui que trust in the breach of trust he can come here and be heard to complain at all against the trustee of the breach of trust by the trustee. Can he be heard as against that trustee? I am not speaking of his rights as against other parties, but as against the trustee—to say that that which he concurred in the trustee doing, was wrong? He concurred in it, and in my judgment he ought not to be allowed to say anything of the sort. Now, the way in which Mr. Alexander in his argument—which was very clear, if I may say so—put the case was this. He quite accepted for the purpose of this argument that there was a concurrence by the cestui que trust of the character which I have described, but he said: "If you take the cases beginning with Trafford v. Boehm, the case before Lord Hardwicke, which is reported in 3 Atk. 440, and go all through the cases you will not find any case in which a cestui que trust has been held liable to have the interest either impounded or retained or withheld from him unless the cestui que trust has derived a benefit from the breach of trust, and then only to the extent of the benefit which he derived;" and Mr. Alexander said further that Mr. Levett, appearing for the representatives of the trustee, admitted that he could not say that this was a case in which the cestui que trust received a benefit in the sense in which the word had been used with regard to these cases of breach of trust and impounding of interest.

With regard to that I wish to say that I do not agree with this view of the cases. I will call attention in a moment to the cases in which it seems to me that, although the cestui que trust received no benefit personally, yet he was held to be debarred from complaining of the breach of trust. I propose before I call attention to those cases to go a step further and say that quite independently of any authority, and if there had been no authority to that effect I should have been prepared to say that on general principles it is impossible to hold that a cestui que trust who had so concurred should be allowed to take proceedings against the trustee based upon a complaint of the impropriety or wrong dealing with the trust property in which dealing he had himself concurred. The case which I prefer to take as an instance where this principle has been recognized (there are others, but I do not propose to refer to those at length) is the case of Chillingworth v. Chambers, [1896] 1 Ch. 685, and I propose to read a passage in the judgment of Lord Lindley at p. 700. In that case Lord Lindley says this: "Suppose a cestui que trust in remainder to induce his trustee to commit a breach of trust for the benefit of the tenant for life—perhaps his own father or mother—can such a remainderman compel the trustees to make good the loss or resist their claim to have it made good out of his interest when it falls in if some other cestui que trust compels them to make the loss good? I apprehend not; and yet in the case supposed the cestui que trust in remainder might not himself have derived any benefit at all from the breach of trust." I do not say that that passage is exactly upon all fours with the present case, because the word which Lord Lindley uses, "induce," is consistent with instigation as distinguished from mere concurrence; but what he does plainly negative is that a receipt of a benefit is essential if the cestui que trust is to be debarred from recovering against the trustee that which he is entitled to under the settlement. I am not going to call attention at any length to the case of In re Somerset, but if the words at the conclusion of the judgments of Lindley, and Davey, L.JJ., are read, the same negation of the benefit being essential will be found involved in those judgments. Under those circumstances, in my judgment, the trustee in bankruptcy being here in the same position for this purpose that Mr. Fletcher, the concurring cestui que trust, would have been, is not entitled to complain against those who represent the trustee of the loss which was brought about by what the trustee did with his concurrence, nor is he entitled to make any claim against this fund which has been placed in court really at the expense and out of the pocket of the trustee. To hold that Mr. Fletcher, the husband, could enforce a claim against the trustee in this respect would really be to say that the husband was entitled to complain of that which he, the husband, concurred in doing as being a wrong against himself.

Under those circumstances I think that the substantial claim made by Mr. Alexander's client fails altogether. In order to prevent any mistake as to how far I mean to go in respect of my negation of the right of a party to a breach of trust to complain of a breach of trust and make a claim against the trustee in respect of a matter to which he has been a party, I wish to say that I can quite conceive circumstances in which it might be right to allow such a claim to be made even by a person concurring. In the first place, one may take the case where the trustee owed a particular duty to the cestui que trust—for example, the case in which such a duty existed in the trustee towards a married woman who under the trust deed had property settled upon her for her separate use without power of anticipation. That is not the only case. I can quite conceive other cases. But in the present case I see no circumstances whatsoever which should induce this court to assist the cestui que trust who has concurred in the breach of trust in recovering as against the trustee any loss which he sustains by the breach of trust. This deals with the whole case. There is the money in court—money which undoubtedly has been provided by the deceased trustee—which money in court, in my judgment, having regard to the order which was made, is his money unless and until the trustee in bankruptcy can establish a claim to it.

ROMER, L.J.—There was one proposition of law urged by counsel on behalf of the respondents before us to which I accede. It is this: If a beneficiary claiming under a trust does not instigate or request a breach of trust, is not the active moving party towards it, but merely consents to it, and he obtains no personal benefit from it, then his interest in the trust estate would not be impoundable in order to indemnify the trustee liable to make good loss occasioned by the breach, even though the trustee derived no benefit himself from the breach. I think this is what was meant and referred to by Chitty, J., in his judgment in Sawyer v. Sawyer, 28 Ch. D., where he says, at p. 598: "It strikes me as a novelty in law, and a proposition not founded on principle, to say that the person who merely consents is bound to to do more than what he says he consents to do. It does not mean that he makes himself personally liable, nor does he render any property liable to make it good." But that proposition of law must be taken to be subject to the following right of the trustee as between him and the beneficiaries. In the case I have before referred to, in respect to the general proposition, the beneficiary who knowingly consented to the breach could not, if of full contracting age and capacity, and in the absence of special circumstances, afterwards be heard to say that the conduct of the trustee in committing the breach of trust was against him, the particular beneficiary, improper, so as to make the trustee liable to the beneficiary for any damage suffered in respect of that beneficiary's interest in the trust estate by reason of the loss occasioned by the breach, and, of course, if satisfactorily proved, the consent of the beneficiary to the breach need not be in writing.

I will illustrate what I have said by a concrete case, not only to make my meaning perfectly plain, but also because the illustration will have a bearing upon the case before us. Take a simple case of a trust under a settlement, say, of £3,000 for a tenant for life and after the death of the tenant for life for certain remaindermen. Suppose a trustee commits a breach of trust and sells out £1,000 and pays it over to some third person, so that the trustee does not benefit by it himself, and suppose that the tenant for life, being, as I have said, of full age and so forth, knows of that act of the trustee and consents to it, what would be the position in reference to that breach of trust if the trustee were at the instance of the remaindermen attacked and made liable for the loss accruing by the breach of trust? Assuming the £1,000 to have been lost, the remaindermen would have the right of saying, so far as their interest in remainder is concerned the capital must be made good by the trustee, but the tenant for life who consented could not himself have brought an action against the trustee to make him liable for the loss of income suffered by the tenant for life by reason of the breach of trust as to the £1,000. On the other hand, the trustee would not have a right, to my mind, as against the cestui que trust—the tenant for life—to have impounded the tenant for life's interest on the £2,000 remaining of the trust fund in order to indemnify the trustee. Now, suppose the remaindermen having brought an action to make good the breach of trust against the trustee, the tenant for life is co-plaintiff; defence by the trustee raising his right as against the tenant for life seeking relief in respect of the loss of the income, but admitting the right of the remainderman. What would the court in such a case do if the question between the tenant for life and the trustee had been tried out, as it might have been, and the tenant for life was found to have consented knowingly to the breach of trust. To my mind the right of the court would have been clear. It might have ordered the £1,000 to be paid into court by the trustee, but pending the life of the tenant for life have ordered the income to be paid to the trustee because the income of the £1,000 would have been out of the pocket of the trustee just as much as the corpus from which it proceeded, and not to have given that relief to the trustee would have been to ignore his right and to have acceded to the claim of the tenant for life in the action by him that I have indicated. Now, suppose that the tenant for life is not a plaintiff, but co-defendant with the trustee, so that the question cannot be tried out at the trial as between the tenant for life and the trustee, what might the court do if so advised in that case? It might order the £1,000 to be paid into court by the trustee, and it might reserve the question of the right as between the tenant for life and the trustee to the income, to be determined at some later period. It will be found that the illustration is pertinent to the case that is now before us. In such a case, when the question as to income arose, the trustees would be able to say, "The remaindermen are not entitled clearly to the income on the trust fund I have found, and if the tenant for life is not entitled to it as against me, I find it, it is my money, and I am entitled to it," and therefore when the question came to be tried out ultimately as between the tenant for life and the trustee, if that income was still under the control of the court, the court would again have the right to say to the trustee who found the corpus: The income is yours in the absence of the right of the beneficiary, the tenant for life, to claim as against you to make you liable for that income. Now, the right of a trustee which I have been dealing with, the right to resist the claim by the beneficiary as against the trustee to make good the income, has, to my mind, clearly not been affected either by section 6 of the Trustee Act, 1888, or by section 45 of the Trustee Act, 1893. As I have elsewhere pointed out, those sections were intended to and did extend the powers of the court for the benefit of the trustee. They clearly extended the powers of the court so far as concerns the case of a married woman entitled to income for her separate use and restrained from anticipation, but they also extended them in another respect, by giving power to the court to impound any part of the interest in the trust property of any beneficiary who consented to a breach of trust provided that consent was in writing. But clearly there was nothing in those sections which was intended to, and nothing in my opinion which operated so as to deprive the trustee of such a right as I indicated previously—the right of saying as against a beneficiary who has consented to a breach of trust that that beneficiary cannot make him, the trustee, personally liable to recoup to the beneficiary who consented, the loss accruing to that beneficiary by the breach of trust committed with his consent. The beneficiary, if he consented to the breach of trust, could not be heard to make that a ground of complaint and a ground of action as against the trustee. Of course the right I have indicated of a trustee as against the consenting beneficiary might possibly be lost if not raised by the trustee before it was too late. Probably—I say probably, for I have not to decide the question—if the trustee in such a case were to hand over the funds out of his own pockets to new trustees without preserving his right in any way as against the tenant for life, it might be—I will say no more—that he might be held to have lost his right to claim the income after he had parted with the fund. It might be so, and other cases might be given, but so long as his right can be claimed by him it is a right which must be recognized by the court and given full effect to when it is insisted upon at the proper time.

Now, that being to my mind the law so far as it is necessary to deal with it for the purpose of the present case, I will say a few words about the facts of this case, and I ask myself, looking at those facts, this question: Is this matter that we have to deal with on this appeal in substance not one where a beneficiary who has consented to a breach of trust is now for his own benefit calling upon the trustee to make good the loss accruing to the beneficiary by reason of the breach? I think it is. In this case the tenant for life—the husband—knew of and consented to the breach. He authorized the selling out of the trust funds, and it appeared from his evidence (he was not, to my mind, a truthful witness in many respects as far I can see, but he was driven to admit it at last) that he was actually present when the trustee handed over the proceeds of the sale of the funds to the wife. The judge in the court below has made a difference with regard to those proceeds, a difference, I am bound to say, that I cannot follow. Mr. Fletcher, the tenant for life—the husband—tried to make a difference with regard to the funds in this way. He said: "I knew the funds were going to her," at least he could not help saying that seeing that he saw them absolutely handed over to her, but he said: "I thought she was going to use only about £1,000, about one third part, for her own benefit, and I thought she was going to hand back the balance, the two-thirds, or in some form it was to come back to the trustee to be re-invested." To use a homely phrase, that story as to the re-investment of about £2,000 so deposed, was what is called a cock and bull story. But, even if anyone would attribute any substance to such a statement at all, how does it avail this husband who allowed the whole funds to go to his wife? He knew they were to go to her; he knew she was to have the control of them; and in fact it was by reason of that that the funds were lost and they never came back, nor did the husband ever take any proceedings for their restoration. I can draw no distinction for the purposes of such a case as this as between the husband and the trustee, between the £1,000 or the third and the remaining two-thirds. It appears to me he consented to the whole of the funds being handed over in breach of trust to the wife, and he cannot afterwards say as against the trustee that the trustee is bound to make good to him any loss accruing to him—the husband—by reason of the trust funds having been lost and dealt with by the wife.

I need scarcely say that the fact that the husband has become bankrupt makes no difference. The trustee in bankruptcy can only take such right as the husband would have had if he had not been bankrupt.

Now, there was the breach of trust and there was the consent of the husband. What happened when the action was brought in this case? The sole plaintiffs were the remaindermen. As against them in respect of their interest in remainder there was no defence. The trustee in bankruptcy of the tenant for life was a defendent. A compromise was made, by which the trustee, out of his own funds, made up by instalments the trust fund. He was ordered to pay in these instalments even though they exceeded the capital, the reason being that at that time the question as between the trustee in bankruptcy and the trustee of the settlement with regard to the life income and with regard to the consent given by the tenant for life had not been determined. That order was one made entirely without prejudice to the right of the trustee in bankruptcy. So far as the order directed these instalments to come in beyond what was necessary to recoup the capital to make good the interests of the remaindermen, all rights were reserved. I notice that on p. 3 of the order by which those instalments were directed to be paid there is this order, namely, "That all moneys paid into court by the said defendant (the trustee) pursuant to his undertaking be applied first in satisfaction of the said proposed sum of £3,100, and then on the interest thereof, or upon an application for that purpose." To my mind the order is reasonably clear. The trustee of the settlement had not so dealt with these instalments that he could be said to have lost the right that he had as against the consenting tenant for life. He still had the right to say: "No income shall come out of my pocket to benefit you, the tenant for life." A hold was kept upon the funds, and the trustee of the settlement is now entitled, in my opinion, to say: "Subject to the interests of the remaindermen, unless the tenant for life by his trustee in bankruptcy can claim the income, that income is mine; it certainly is not the remaindermen's—that income is mine unless the tenant for life is entitled to it as against me; and the court having the hold it has upon this fund is bound to decide that question, to my mind, as if the trustee in bankruptcy were now actively claiming as against that income, as if it was still in the pockets of the trustee, to make him hand over that income to him. The right which I have indicated, that the trustee, to my mind, can still enforce, is still existing, can be enforced, and ought to be enforced. I think it ought to be enforced, as I have pointed out, to the whole income. It is not belonging to the tenant for life as against the trustee.

That being so, I think the appeal of the trustee of the settlement should be allowed, and the cross-appeal of the trustee in bankruptcy should be dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J., stated the facts, and continued: It seems to me that as a conclusion of fact it is perfectly clear that the husband concurred in the breach of trust which was committed by the trustees.

Now what is the effect in point of law of concurrence in a breach of trust? It seems to me that the law is clear. In Walker v. Symonds, in 3 Swanst. 64, Lord Eldon said: "It is established by all the cases that if the cestui que trust joins with the trustees in that which is a breach of trust knowing the circumstances, such a cestui que trust can never complain of such a breach of trust. I go further and agree that either concurrence in the act or acquiescence without original concurrence will release the trustees, but that is only a general rule, and the court must inquire into the circumstances which induced concurrence or acquiescence." I will pause there to remark that in the present case there are no special circumstances which would in any way modify the application of the general rule stated by Lord Eldon. In the case of Chillingworth v. Chambers, which has already been referred to, in [1896] 1 Ch., Lord Lindley says: "If I request a person to deal with my property in a particular way, and loss ensues, I cannot justly throw that loss on him," and Kay, L.J., in the same case, after referring to the passage which I have read from Walker v. Symonds, says this: "This refers only to an attempt by the cestui que trust to make the trustee liable for any loss which the cestui que trust may suffer by reason of a breach of trust which he instigated or concurred in. Such a claimant is estopped by his concurrence in the breach of trust." In the case of In re Somerset a remarkable illustration, as it seems to me, was given of the application of the rule. In that case there was, as here, a settlement. The tenant for life under the settlement was very anxious that the trust fund should be invested in a particular mortgage, and he requested the trustees to make that investment. The trustees did so, and it turned out that the property the subject of the mortgage was an insufficient security, and the trustees had to make good the loss at the instance of the remainderman. They then made an application to the court seeking to put in force the provisions of clause 6 of the Trustee Act of 1888, which are substantially the same as those of the 45th section of the Trustee Act of 1893. Now, that provides that any person who instigates or requests or consents in writing to a breach of trust is liable to have his interest impounded for the purpose of indemnifying the trustee. It was held by the Court of Appeal that the tenant for life did not know that the trustees were committing a breach of trust. He simply asked them to invest in a particular security, but he left it to them to make the proper inquiries as to the nature of the property which was offered as security. Consequently the trustees were held liable for neglect in the discharge of their duties, to which the tenant for life was no party; and it was pointed out by the Court of Appeal that he was not seeking in any way to get an advantage or benefit to himself at the expense of the remainderman, but was simply, as it is put by, I think, Lord Davey, seeking to get a good security for the fund. What happened there? It was held that the application to impound any interest in the remaining property failed, but the trustees having replaced the fund, it was held that they were entitled to interest upon the fund which they had themselves found and replaced, and that the tenant for life had no claim to that, but must in accordance with the rule be bound by the result of his own concurrence in the act which the trustees had done.

That being so, we have to apply the law in the present case. In the first place, if the tenant for life had not become bankrupt, if the application had been made by him, it is quite clear upon these authorities to which I have referred that he could not in any way attempt to make the trustees liable for a loss which had been occasioned by his concurrence in the payment of the trust fund to his wife, and the trustee in bankruptcy cannot stand in any better position unless indeed he has in some way acquired some new and better right than he would have had simply as trustee in bankruptcy succeeding to the position of a cestui que trust who had concurred in a breach of trust.

It is suggested, or rather contended, that the trustee in bankruptcy is in such a better position by reason of the order to which I have referred of the 22nd of February, 1893. In my judgment he is not. It seems to me the effect of that order was simply to preserve to the trustee in bankruptcy who declined to assent to that order, or consent to it in any way, his rights, but not to give him any new or better rights; I think, therefore, that he simply stands in the same position as the bankrupt's husband would have been in if no bankruptcy had occurred.

Then what is the present position? A fund is in court of capital and interest, and no decision has been given by the court. Nothing is decided by the form of the order as to who is entitled to the interest for the period which I have mentioned. The order directs that in the first instance the payments into court shall be applied in satisfaction of the capital; and secondly, of the interest upon an application for that purpose. There has been no application made to the court as yet, but there the fund is, and it seems to me in that state of things the right of the legal personal representative of the deceased trustee who has paid the fund in ought to be given effect to. It seems to me that in reality the trustee in bankruptcy is setting up a claim to this interest. It is true that in form the application must be taken to have been made by the legal personal representative of the deceased trustee, and the trustee in bankruptcy is served. But what course does the trustee in bankruptcy take? He appears and resists, and insists on an order being made in his favour, and he has succeeded before the learned judge in the court below as to part.

In my judgment the legal personal representative is entitled to the fund. The income has not arisen from the original trust fund at all. That trust fund has disappeared by reason of its having been paid over to the wife, who lost it, and that payment was made with the concurrence of the husband. He therefore is precluded from claiming anything from the trustee, and the trustee in bankruptcy is in no better position.

For these reasons I think that the decision of the learned judge as regards that portion of the fund which was to the knowledge of the husband applied for the benefit of the wife was right; but that he ought to have gone on and applied the same rule as regards the balance which the husband stated that he believed was to be reserved for reinvestment.

I therefore agree that the appeal of Mr. Levett's client should be allowed, and that the cross-appeal of Mr. Alexander's client should be dismissed.

Solicitors, Allingham & Heys-Jones; Emmanuel & Simmonds; Brooks, Jenkins, & Co.

From P. D. & Ad. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) April 6.

"THE MINNETONKA." (a.)

Ship — Collision — Substituted expense — Compromise — Reasonableness of compromise — Loss arising out of collision.

A collier steamship chartered by the plaintiffs to carry a cargo of coal from the Tyne to Cape Town came into collision with a steamship of the defendants and put into the Thames for repairs. An agreement was entered into between the plaintiffs and the owners of the collier by which the voyage was to be abandoned, the cargo was to be sold, and a sum of money was to be paid by the plaintiffs to the owners of the collier as a "substituted expense" in lieu of the estimated greater expense of storing the cargo during the repairs and reshipping it after the repairs had been effected. Both vessels were held to blame for the collision, and the defendants paid the owners of the collier a half of the damage sustained by them. The plaintiffs then issued a writ against the defendants and claimed a half of the sum paid by them as a substituted expense. No part of this claim had been dealt with in the proceedings between the two vessels.

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the sum claimed.

Judgment of Bucknill, J. (52 W. R. 672, [1904] P. 202), reversed.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from a decision of Bucknill, J., sitting in Admiralty, on a motion in objection to a report of the assistant registrar (52 W. R. 672, [1904] P. 202).

The plaintiffs, the commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, as the owners of a cargo of coal laden on board the steam collier Uskmoor, claimed to recover from the owners of the steamship Minnetonka a half of the sum of £276 18s. 4d., as damages arising out of a collision between The Uskmoor and The Minnetonka. The circumstances of the case were as follows:

On the 15th of May, 1902, the Admiralty chartered the steamship Uskmoor to carry a cargo of coal from the Tyne to Cape Town, the owners of the vessel to receive one-third of the freight by draft at three days' sight on signing bills of lading. On the 9th of June The Uskmoor was proceeding down the English Channel in pursuance of the charter-party when she came into collision, off Beachy Head, with the steamship Minnetonka, and was so seriously damaged that she was obliged to jettison part of her cargo and put back to the Thames. She arrived in the Thames on the 11th of June, when the surveyor for the owners reported that it would be necessary for the whole of the cargo to be discharged and for the vessel to undergo repairs, which it was calculated would take six weeks. Correspondence passed between the owners of The Uskmoor and the Director of Navy Contracts, and in the result an agreement was arrived at that the voyage should be treated as abandoned, and that the Admiralty should sell the cargo and should pay the owners of The Uskmoor the sum of £1,000 as a substituted expense in lieu of the larger sum which, it was estimated, would have been incurred for storage and reshipment if The Uskmoor had carried on the coal at the end of the six weeks required for repairs. Cross-actions of damage by collision were commenced by the owners of The Minnetonka and the owners of The Uskmoor. These actions were consolidated, and at the trial both vessels were found to blame. At the usual ships' reference the owners of The Uskmoor claimed £2,426 in respect of discharging cargo, expenses before collision, and demurrage. This claim was allowed by the registrar, and the owners of The Minnetonka paid a moiety of the sum to the owners of The Uskmoor. Subsequently the Admiralty issued a writ against the owners of The Minnetonka, claiming, as owners of the cargo laden on board The Uskmoor, damages in respect of the collision, and a settlement was arrived at on the terms of the defendants paying 50 per cent. of the plaintiffs' damages to be assessed by the registrar and merchants. The claim filed in the registry by the Admiralty, as owners of cargo ex Uskmoor, against the owners of The Minnetonka, consisted of two items—viz. (1) £447, the difference between the cost price and the selling price of the coal, and (2) £276, the proportion attributable to the cargo of the sum of £1,000 agreed to be paid by the Admiralty to the owners of The Uskmoor in view of the voyage being abandoned in London. At the reference the registrar disallowed both items of the claim. The ground for the disallowance of the item of £276 was that the payment of that sum by the Admiralty as a substituted expense was not such a consequence of the collision as to render the owners of The Minnetonka liable for their proportion as wrongdoers. The registrar stated in his report that no part of the claim for £276 had been dealt with in the ships' reference. On a motion by the Admiralty to vary the report, so far as the claim for £276 was concerned, Bucknill, J., affirmed the report of the registrar.

The Admiralty appealed.

R. B. D. Acland, K.C., and William Wills, for the Admiralty.

Aspinall, K.C., and Arthur Pritchard, for the respondents, the owners of The Minnetonka.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision by Bucknill, J., who was asked to review a finding of the registrar and merchants on a matter referred to them. The question arises in an Admiralty action between the Lords of the Admiralty and the owners of the steamship Minnetonka. The Admiralty had chartered the steamship Uskmoor to carry a cargo of coals from the Tyne to South Africa. While The Uskmoor was proceeding down the Channel near Beachy Head she came into collision with The Minnetonka, and was so seriously damaged that she had to put back to London. It was found that the necessary repairs would require considerable time and expense; but still she was capable of being repaired, and therefore the shipowners had the right to insist on carrying the cargo to its destination and thereby earning the balance of their freight, one-third of which had been paid in advance. An action was pending in respect of the collision, but The Uskmoor naturally considered, and no doubt told the cargo-owners, the Admiralty, that she was not to blame, and that The Minnetonka was alone to blame. The rights between The Minnetonka and The Uskmoor had not then been ascertained, and the only existing facts were that The Uskmoor had been disabled, but was capable of being repaired, and that her owners were insisting on their right to carry the cargo to its destination when the repairs should have been completed. In these circumstances a compromise was arranged between the Admiralty and the owners of The Uskmoor. A calculation was made of the length of time which would be required for the repairs and of the cost of discharging, warehousing, and reshipping the cargo, and an estimate was made of what contribution would have been due from the cargo-owners in general average if the voyage had been continued. This was assessed at the conjectural sum of £332. The compromise involved the abandonment of the voyage and the sale of the cargo, and provided for the payment by the Admiralty to the owners of The Uskmoor of the sum of £276. In this way the Admiralty reduced the payment which they would have had to make if the voyage had been continued, and they were also saved the loss which they would have incurred through deterioration of the cargo; and at the same time the shipowners gained the advantage of being at liberty to obtain another charter-party as soon as the repairs should be done. If that was a reasonable compromise to make, it seems to me that the amount paid by the Admiralty under the compromise is a fair measure of the damages which the Admiralty would be entitled to claim from the wrongdoer, The Minnetonka. An important point in the case was brought out in an answer given by Mr. Acland to a question put by Mathew, L.J.—viz., that as between the Admiralty and the owners of The Uskmoor, by the terms of the charter-party the owners of The Uskmoor were relieved from all liability for negligence. Therefore, although in the action between the two ships both were held to blame, yet, in the arrangement of the compromise between the Admiralty and The Uskmoor, the Admiralty had to regard The Uskmoor as being free from blame; and the Admiralty were not in a position so say that the owners of The Uskmoor were not entitled to receive anything at all. The Admiralty could only recover damages from the owners of The Minnetonka, and they brought this action against them, claiming, in accordance with the rule in Admiralty, one-half of the sum of £276. The report of the registrar and merchants on this claim was the basis of the argument which has been addressed to the court. Although the claim was not allowed by the registrar, and although the learned judge has affirmed his decision, the report found as a fact that no part of that claim had been dealt with in the ship's reference on the claim of The Uskmoor. In my opinion that fact, that no part of this sum has been recovered by The Uskmoor as against The Minnetonka, disposes of the argument of the respondents. For some time I was under the impression that, if the owners of The Minnetonka were ordered to pay this sum, they would be paying over again a sum which they had already paid in the proceedings taken against them by the owners of The Uskmoor. The findings, however, negative that, and we are disembarrassed of the consideration that we shall be ordering the same sum to be paid a second time. Therefore the question comes back to this—Was the compromise a reasonable one? For the reason which I have already given I think that it was reasonable. It was contended on the part of the respondents that, however reasonable the compromise itself might be, the sum to be paid under the compromise ought to have been adjusted in view of the litigation between The Uskmoor and The Minnetonka. It was suggested that there ought to have been some arrangement by which the amount might be modified in accordance with the result of that litigation. But the answer is that this sum of £276 did not come into discussion between The Uskmoor and The Minnetonka. That disposes of the suggestion that it was not reasonable to settle the compromise without regard to the litigation between the two ships. When the case is disengaged from a certain confusion in which it has been involved, it seems to me to be clear that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the sum claimed from the owners of The Minnetonka. The learned judge had not all the facts before him which have been brought to the consideration of this court. His judgment seems to have been based on a proposition of law which he extracted from the case of The Marpesia, 42 W. R. 239, [1891] P. 403. The suggestion appears to be that a wrongdoer against whom a claim is made for a sum of money in respect of damage caused to the plaintiff is relieved from all liability if that sum of money has been arrived at by some compromise, whether reasonable or not, on the ground that the sum in respect of which the claim is made against the wrongdoer is a sum which became payable under a compromise, and is, therefore, not the direct consequence of the wrongdoing. But the assessment of the sum by a compromise does not break the chain of causality between the loss sustained and the wrong done out of which it was sustained; it is merely a mode of adjusting the loss, and not an intermediate fact cutting off the liability of the wrongdoer. The real point was not argued before the learned judge, and I do not think I am really differing from the learned judge's view in holding that this sum can be recovered. The appeal must be allowed.

MATHEW and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the plaintiffs, The Treasury Solicitor.

Solicitors for the defendants, Pritchard & Sons.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. March 1, 2.

TAYLOR v. ALLHUSEN. (a.)

Settlement—Power—Limited power—Appointment to a class—Donee of power one of class—Right of donee of power to appoint to herself.

Where the donee of a power of appointment limited to members of a certain class is a member of that class herself it is competent to her to appoint to herself.

In May, 1890, the plaintiff Isabel Taylor, then Isabel Allhusen, was entitled to certain securities of the value of £3,500, standing in the name of her uncle, the defendant Wilton Allhusen as trustee for her.

By a settlement dated the 31st of May, 1890, and made between the plaintiff of the one part and the defendant W. Allhusen of the other part, it was declared that the income of the trust funds should be paid to the plaintiff for her life, and after her death, in case she should by deed or will so appoint, to any husband who might survive her for his life; and subject to any such appointment, the defendant W. Allhusen was to stand possessed of the trust funds and the income thereof in trust for the children of the plaintiff as she should by deed or will appoint, and in default of appointment for all the children of the plaintiff who being a son or sons should attain the age of twenty-one years, or being a daughter or daughters should attain that age or marry, and if there should be no child of the plaintiff who should attain that age or marry then the trust fund and the income thereof should be held "in trust for such persons and purposes and in such manner as the said Isabel Allhusen shall by deed or will appoint so only that every such appointment be made to or in favour of a grandchild or grandchildren of the late Christian Allhusen, the paternal grandfather of the said Isabel Allhusen, who shall have attained or shall attain the age of twenty-one years, or being female shall have previously married, and in default and subject to any such appointment upon trust for all such grandchildren of the said Christian Allhusen equally share and share alike."

At the time this settlement was made the plaintiff was engaged to and shortly afterwards married her cousin, Charles Percy Hale, who was one of the grandchildren of Christian Allhusen.

The settlement was not expressed to be made in consideration of the marriage, and was in fact a voluntary settlement. There was no issue of the marriage.

C. P. Hale died in 1896.

In 1903 the plaintiff married Francis Pitt Stewart Taylor. There was one child the issue of this marriage, the defendant Reginald Pitt Stewart Taylor, who was born in July, 1904.

The plaintiff now claimed (1) cancellation of the settlement, or (2) rectification in manner therein stated, or (3) alternatively, that the construction of the settlement might be declared, and the trusts thereof executed, and that a new trustee or trustees might be appointed.

At the trial the questions of cancellation and rectification were not pressed, the only question argued being on the construction of the settlement, and whether, on the true construction of the settlement, the plaintiff could appoint the trust funds to herself under the power.

(a.) Reported by C. W. MEAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendant W. Allhusen was willing to continue to act as trustee with a Mr. Cotton Cooke, who was willing to act with him.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and Percy F. Wheeler, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff, as one of the grandchildren of Christian Allhusen, is one of the objects of the power; she may therefore appoint to herself. She is a member of the class to which the power is limited, and there is nothing in the instrument to exclude her from the class, or to prevent her appointing to herself; in default of appointment, she would undoubtedly take a share as a member of the class, and there is no reason why she should not take under an appointment. There is no decided case directly in point, but Farwell, J., in Farwell on Powers (2nd ed.), p. 492, states that an appointment may be made to himself by the donee of a power if an exclusive appointment is authorized, and refers to In re Sinclaire's Estate, 2 Ir. Eq. 45.

Stewart Smith, K.C., and Dighton Pollock, for the trustee of the settlement.—In re Sinclaire's Estate had reference to the construction of a particular will, and is not relevant here. The only other passage in any text-book which bears on the subject is one in Sugden on Powers, c. 11, s. 6, p. 145.

Wace, for the infant defendant R. P. S. Taylor.

KEKEWICH, J.—This point seems to me to be one of some importance apart from its novelty, and having considered it since the court rose yesterday, I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiff's contention ought to be upheld. The question is whether, assuming the settlement to stand, this lady, the plaintiff, can appoint to herself, and that depends entirely upon the construction of the particular instrument. There seems to be no authority directly bearing upon the point, and the books which have been cited, although useful, do not give a conclusive guide. Farwell, J., at p. 492 of his book, says: "If the intention is clearly expressed there is no reason why the donee should not appoint the whole to himself if the power authorized an exclusive appointment." That is a clear summing-up of the law, and no doubt a correct summing-up, although it comes as a comment on the case of In re Sinclaire's Estate, which turned entirely upon the construction of the particular instrument then before the court, and is not, I think, valuable for the present purpose. The only other authority which was cited was Lord St. Leonards' book on Powers, c. 11, s. 6, p. 145. There Lord St. Leonards does not touch this particular point, and he does not lay down any general rule, but what he does say is certainly not inimical to the conclusions contended for by the plaintiff here. This settlement was made on marriage, but was a settlement on the lady for life, and then on any husband who might survive her for life, and then to the children in the ordinary way, with a power of appointment and a gift over in default of appointment among the children. No question arises about that now. The only question is under the clause by which in default of children taking a vested interest the property is limited as the lady should appoint by deed or will, the class being narrowed by the limitation that they are to be the grandchildren of the late Christian Allhusen. It so happens that the lady herself was one of such grandchildren and that her first husband was one also. In default of the exercise of that power of appointment there is a trust for all "such grandchildren of the said Christian Allhusen equally share and share alike." It could not be argued that if the lady does not exercise the power of appointment she will not herself be able to take a share under that gift in default of appointment. It occurred to me to refer to the case of Lees v. Massey, 9 W. R. 425, 3 De G. F. & J. 113. The point upon which the case is reported is from what time and at what date the next-of-kin were to be ascertained; but there was a very able argument on the question whether the lady herself in that case could take as one of the next-of-kin. There was a gift by will of all the testator's real estate to a daughter in fee simple, subject to intervening limitations, and the will contained a proviso that if the daughter should die without lawful issue, the testator's wife surviving, then the said estates should go to his wife for life and after her decease to his relations, share and share alike. The word "relations" is, of course, equivalent to next-of-kin. Now it turned out that when the estate came to be disposed of under the ultimate gift it went to the daughter, and the daughter only, as the testator's next-of-kin, and the argument was that it was really inconsistent with the whole gift that she should take under the gift to the testator's "relations"; that it could not be that the daughter was to take that which was only to go to the next-of-kin in the event of her not being able to take—that is to say, the preceeding limitations failing. However, that view found no favour with the Mas'er of the Rolls or the Court of Appeal; and the decision, although it turned upon an entirely different point, resulted in giving the daughter, who was said to be excluded, the whole estate. Therefore I may fairly say that there is nothing inconsistent with or contrary to the ordinary rules of construction in holding in the present case that this lady would herself take a share in default of appointment, and that view is valuable for the purpose of the construction of this settlement. The trust is "for such persons and purposes and in such manner as the said Isabel Allhusen shall by deed or will appoint, so only that any such appointment be made to or in favour of a grandchild or grandchildren of the late Christian Allhusen," and then there is a gift over in default of and subject to any such appointment upon trust for those grandchildren of whom she was one; and if, remembering what I have just said, there is a gift in default of appointment to her as regards part of the property, that seems to me to be an extremely strong argument in support of the view that she was not to be excluded from the objects of the general power of appointment which preceded. As she was to take in default of appointment, it is difficult to say that she ought to be excluded from taking under the appointment.

But that is not the only way of looking at the case. I was very much struck by the argument of the plaintiff's counsel, that if the clause in the settlement had stopped at the word "appoint," that is to say, if it read simply "in trust for such persons and purposes and in such manner as the plaintiff shall by deed or will appoint," she might certainly have appointed to herself, and not only so, but it is the common form of general power of appointment. Why should you cut that down? You would cut it down, of course, if the language so provided; but to cut it down so as to exclude herself from the general power of appointment when there are no clear words to do it, and when that general power would certainly have enabled her to make an appointment in her own favour, seems to me to be a straining of language which would be entirely wrong. Therefore I hold that upon the true construction of the instrument the lady is entitled to appoint by deed or will to any of the grandchildren of Christian Allhusen, including herself. There will be a declaration to that effect, and the defendant W. Allhusen being willing to continue trustee of the settlement, another trustee will be appointed to act with him, and there will be consequential directions as to the transfer of the trust funds to the two trustees.

Solicitors, Badham & Comins; Johnson, Long, & Co.

Chan. Div.
Swinfen Eady, J. } May 3.

In re LEVESON-GOWER (a.)

Settled land—Improvements—Application of capital moneys—Additions to or alterations in buildings—Rebuilding vinery, peach-house, and greenhouse with a view to letting—Scheme submitted to trustees after long interval—House agent's commission—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 21, 25, sub-section 11—Settled Land Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 69), ss. 13 (ii.), 15.

The rebuilding of an entirely new vinery and peach-house in place of two old glasshouses pulled down, in order to let the principal mansion-house, does not fall within sub-section 2 of section 13 of the Act of 1890, as "any additions or alterations in buildings reasonably necessary or proper to enable the same to be let," on which capital moneys in the hands of trustees can be expended, and the rebuilding of a new greenhouse in place of an old one in a dilapidated condition is in the same position. But the building of loose boxes and the making of a sunk fence in the park to keep out cattle is within the meaning of "repairs" on which capital money can be spent. The commission chargeable by an agent for obtaining a tenant of the mansion-house on a short tenancy is an ordinary income charge, and neither the whole nor any part is properly payable out of capital.

Adjourned summons.

By an indenture dated the 24th of June, 1889, Mr. Granville C. Gresham Leveson-Gower, the applicant in the summons, became, in certain events which had already taken place, tenant for life in possession of certain settled estates situate in Surrey and Kent, settled by the said indenture subject to certain rent-charges therein mentioned of £300 and £800. His eldest son, one of the defendants to the summons, was tenant in tail of the said estates, the other defendants being the present trustees of the said indenture for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts.

The settled estates, subject to the uses of the said indenture, comprised a mansion-house with the gardens and park known as Titsey Place, another house and grounds known as Hookwood, and several farms in various other parishes.

In 1902 the tenant for life placed Titsey Place and grounds in the hands of an agent, and by an agreement dated the 15th of November, 1902, it was let to Lord Burghclere on a short tenancy of a few months.

By an indenture dated the 2nd of June, 1903, Lord Burghclere took it for a term of years (determinable as therein mentioned). The applicant stated in an affidavit that Lord Burghclere had made it a condition of his taking Titsey Place that a vinery and peach-house, which were at the time in a dilapidated state, should be rebuilt; also that a new fence should be constructed between the park and the gardens in order to keep out the cattle, the then existing fence being also in a state of bad repair and quite unfit for its purpose. As it was necessary to let the house, these improvements were carried out and paid for by the tenant for life out of his own pocket.

It was shown that rebuilding these houses and fence was absolutely essential, as they were quite past repair.

Further improvements were carried out by the tenant for life as follows: In 1896 he erected a new cattle-shed in the park, and the following year built four loose-boxes and saddle-room, with mens' rooms above, and also rebuilt a greenhouse, which was very old and falling into decay.

(a.) Reported by A. R. TAYLOUR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The tenant for life had only recently submitted a scheme to the trustees, one of his reasons for the delay being that there were no capital moneys subsisting in the hands of the trustees which they could apply.

All the above expenses so incurred were paid for personally by the tenant for life.

Owing to the heavy outgoings on the estate, due to its being put in repair for letting, death duties, &c., the tenant for life took out the present summons, asking for a declaration that the respondents, as trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890, might be directed to repay and recoup to the applicant out of capital moneys that had since arisen under the said Acts, and were then in their hands, the following sums, which represented the amounts expended by him on the before-mentioned improvements—viz.: £294 17s. 7d. for rebuilding the vinery and peach-house, £48 10s. for a new cattle-shed, £258 for new loose-boxes, &c., £194 5s. 6d. for the park fence, and £249 16s. 6d. for rebuilding the greenhouse. And also whether a sum of £60 which was paid by way of commission to the agents for the letting of Titsey Place to Lord Burghclere was properly payable out of such capital moneys as aforesaid.

Austen-Cartmell, for the applicant.—These various rebuildings would not have been done unless the lessee who took the house had made it a condition they should be. On the question of no scheme having been submitted to the trustees for so long a period, it falls within section 15 of the Settled Land Act, 1890. "The court may in any case where it appears proper make an order directing or authorizing capital money to be applied in or towards payment for any improvement authorized by the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890, notwithstanding that a scheme was not, before the execution of the improvement, submitted for approval, as required by the Act of 1882, to the trustees of the settlement or to the court." These expenditures are substantial improvements. This is a proper case where a tenant for life has, out of his own pocket, incurred heavy expenditure which the court is asked may be thrown on the capital. These additions are "reasonably necessary and proper" within section 13, sub-section 2, of the Settled Land Act, 1890, to enable Titsey Place to be let to Lord Burghclere: see In re Gaskell's Settled Estates, 42 W. R. 219, [1894] 1 Ch. 485; In re Clarke, 50 W. R. 585, [1902] 2 Ch. 327. It has been also held a tenant for life need not actually have in contemplation a tenant, but it must not be a mere vague idea he will obtain one. Here there is a definite letting. If as here you have a building to be let, and it must be rebuilt in order to let it, then it falls within the sub-section. [SWINFEN EADY, J.—Therefore you can only justify this expenditure under sub-section 2.] It is all part of the subject-matter of the letting. The expenditure on the loose-boxes comes within section 25, sub-section 11, of the Act of 1882. Treating the question of a new vinery and peach-house as an addition, it is to an entirely new structure, and it is for the court to say whether it is so or not: see In re Gerard, [1893] 3 Ch. 252, where "stables" came within sub-section 4. On the question of the agents' commission. This lease owes its existence solely to the powers of the applicant as tenant for life under the Settled Land Acts. If he were to die soon, the estate would be subject to a beneficial lease. There is no difference in principle between a letting on a building lease and a letting on an occupation lease: see In re Maryon-Wilson's Settled Estates, [1901] 1 Ch. 934, 49 W. R. Dig. 157. The ratio decidendi was only an exercise of the powers of the Settled Land Acts.

He referred to Hood and Challis on the Settled Land Acts (6th ed.), at p. 336.

P. Wheeler, for the tenant in tail.—The two questions are whether this application falls within sub-section 2 of section 13 of the Act of 1890, and if so whether the court can exercise its jurisdiction. In the present case what the tenant for life means to do is to substitute a new building for an old one; that is not an addition, nor was the request of the lessee "reasonable and proper" to bring it within the sub-section. The court cannot exercise its discretion under section 15, on account of the weak case of the applicant and his not submitting his scheme to the trustees for such a long time.

Austen-Cartmell mentioned on the meaning of the word "additions" In re Calverley's Settled Estates, 52 W. R. 206, [1904] 1 Ch. 150.

Wheeler referred to In re Verney's Settled Estates, 46 W. R. 348, [1898] 1 Ch. 508. Maryon-Wilson's case wholly different from the present application. [SWINFEN EADY, J., referred to Stanford v. Roberts, 49 W. R. 315, [1901] 1 Ch. 440.]

Austen-Cartmell replied.

R. Burleigh Muir, for the trustees.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—This is an application by the tenant for life of certain estates situated partly in the counties of Surrey and Kent. He claims under a settlement made in 1889. The previous tenant for life died on the 30th of May, 1895, and on his death the present applicant became the tenant for life in possession. I am told that he is between thirty and forty years of age. There are two rent-charges still subsisting on the property and the interest on certain mortgages amount to between £3,000 and £4,000. Both the mansion-houses on the estate have been let, and it appears that with respect to the house and grounds now in question a sum of £294 17s. 7d. was expended on rebuilding a vinery and peach-house, and this sum is amongst other items claimed to be allowed out of the capital moneys. It appears that these glasshouses were in a state of dilapidation seven years ago. In the autumn of 1902 Lord Burghclere took Titsey Place, the house in question, on a short tenancy for three or four months, and in the following year entered into an agreement to take it for a term of years. The applicant states that it was a term of the agreement that the vinery and peach-house should be rebuilt in order to secure Lord Burghclere as a tenant. Though evidence is wanting on this point, nevertheless I think it was probably the fact that such was the case, and I will accept the statement of the applicant. The peach-house was not rebuilt until some months after the vinery had been. The first question before the court is whether the erection of a vinery and peach-house fall within sub-section 2 of section 13 of the Settled Land Act of 1890. The glasshouses are some distance from the house, and were pulled down completely before they were rebuilt. Under the circumstances I am of opinion that where a building is entirely removed, and an entirely new building is erected, it does not fall within the sub-section, which runs: "Making any additions or alterations in buildings reasonably necessary or proper to enable the same to be let." Even if the cost of erecting these glasshouses were to come within the sub-section, and the court could exercise its discretion, I should hesitate, because the cost of these glasshouses is something like a half-year's rental, and having regard to the state of the rent and general rental of the estate, and the cost of the glasshouses, and the fact that no scheme was submitted to the trustees for so long a time, I should hesitate rather before I sanctioned it. With regard to the greenhouse, the old one was built many years before the other buildings, and it was apparently quite past repair.

The new one is much smaller than the old one, but, in my opinion, a new greenhouse is in no better position than the vinery or peach-house. With respect to the items for loose-boxes and the sunk fence in the park, I am of opinion that both fall within the meaning of repairs on which capital money can be expended. I think the sum of £400 will meet the justice of that case. With regard to the remaining question of the commission which was charged for the letting to Lord Burghclere, it is a short tenancy under an occupation lease, and the agents have charged a commission of £60, at the rate of 5 per cent. for the first year and 2½ per cent. for the second and third years. The application is made after the first two years have practically expired. I think it is an ordinary income charge. I am therefore of opinion that commission payable to an agent on securing a short tenancy is not an expense that ought to be thrown on the capital, and I decline to order the trustees to pay that commission, or any part of it, out of the capital.

Solicitors, Cooper, Turner, & Evans, for Morrisons & Nightingale, Reigate.

Chan. Div. } May 17, 24.
Warrington, J. }

In re CHANT.
BIRD v. GODFREY. (a.)

Administration — Simple contract debt — Real estate devised—Tenant for life and remaindermen—Part payment by tenant for life—Limitation Act, 1623 (21 Jac. 1, c. 16).

The part payment by a devisee for life of a simple contract debt of his testator and of interest thereon is sufficient to keep the debt alive, notwithstanding the lapse of time, not only as against the devisees in remainder after the life estate, but also as against devisees of other real estate of the testator.

In re Hollingshead, Hollingshead v. Webster, 36 W. R. 660, 37 Ch. D. 651, followed.

The principles of Roddam v. Morley, 5 W. R. 510, 1 D. G. & J. 1, and Dibb v. Walker, 41 W. R. 427, [1893] 2 Ch. 429, applied.

Originating summons.

This summons raised a question as to the effect of part payment of a debt of a testator by a tenant for life of part of the devised real estate in preventing the debt becoming barred by the lapse of time as against the remaindermen and the devisees of other part of the real estate.

By his will made in 1894 Thomas Chant, after bequeathing his personal estate to his wife, Emma Chant, subject to his debts, devised certain houses to his brother, E. J. Chant, and other houses to his sister, Elizabeth Brake, and he devised the residue of his real estate to his wife for her life and after her death as to part thereof to Elizabeth Brake, and as to the rest to E. J. Chant. And he appointed certain persons executors and trustees of his will.

The testator died in October, 1894. He was at the time of his death indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of £298 for work and materials in building houses upon simple contract.

In 1895 the plaintiffs had entered into an arrangement with the executors and the tenant for life under which they had from time to time received payments on account of the principal and interest of the debt. It was admitted that some at least of these payments—at all events of the more recent ones—were made out of the parts of the real estate of which Mrs. Chant was tenant for life. These payments continued until 1903.

In February, 1905, the creditors took out this summons on behalf of themselves and the other creditors against the executors, the tenant for life, and against Elizabeth Brake and E. J. Chant, the devisees in remainder and also specific devisees, asking for administration of the real and personal estate of the testator. The only question in dispute was whether the plaintiffs were entitled to have administration of the specifically devised and the residuary real estate of the testator as well as of the personal estate.

Fossett Lock, for the applicants.—The simple contract creditors are entitled to have the devised real estate as well as the personal estate administered for the payment of the debts of the testator under the Administration of Estates Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 104). It is true that the testator died more than six years before the summons, but if any Statute of Limitations applies, which is not clear, the debt has been kept alive by the payments that have been made on its account by Mrs. Chant, the tenant for life. It is sufficient if the payments are made by anyone interested, and if so made they set the debt free as to all the real estate of the testator. That the debt is kept alive as against the devisees in remainder was expressly decided by In re Hollingshead, Hollingshead v. Webster, 36 W. R. 660, 37 Ch. D. 651. And the principles upon which that case and Roddam v. Morley, 5 W. R. 510, 2 K. & J. 336, 1 De G. & J. 1, and Dibb v. Walker, 41 W. R. 427, [1893] 2 Ch. 429, following Forsyth v. Bristowe, 8 Exch. 716, 1 W. R. C. L. Dig. 510, were decided apply here, and show that the debt is kept alive, not only as regards the residuary estate, but also as regards the other real estate of which Mrs. Chant was not tenant for life. I admit that payment by the executors does not have this effect. This was decided in Putnam v. Bates, 3 Russ. 188; Fordham v. Wallis, 1 W. R. 118, 10 Hare 217; and Astbury v. Astbury, 46 W. R. 536, [1898] 2 Ch. 111.

Cozens-Hardy, for the devisees of the real estate other than the tenant for life.—The case is governed by the Limitation Act, 1623. To take the case out of the operation of that statute there must be a fresh promise to pay implied on the part of the person who is sued for the debt. This can only be implied where the part payment is made by the person sued, or his agent, or someone through whom he claims. This is the effect of Putnam v. Bates, Fordham v. Wallis, Bolding v. Lane, 11 W. R. 386, 1 De G. J. & S. 122; Dickinson v. Teasdale, 1 D. J. & S. 52, 11 W. R. Dig. 55; and Astbury v. Astbury. No promise to pay can be implied on the part of the devisees in remainder of the residuary estate from the part payment by the tenant for life, and still less on the part of the devisees of the other real estate. Even if the former devisees are held bound by the payments the latter should not be. Roddam v. Morley and Dibb v. Walker were cases of specialty debts, and were decided upon the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, which does not apply to this case. Moreover, Roddam v. Morley was disapproved of by Lord Chelmsford in Coope v. Cresswell, 15 W. R. 242, L. R. 2 Ch. 112, and was said by Lord Westbury in Dickinson v. Teasdale not to apply to land other than that of the tenancy for life. The same principle is recognized and enacted by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97), s. 14, as between joint debtors.

He also referred to In re England, 43 W. R. 491, [1895] 2 Ch. 100, and In re Macdonald, 45 W. R. 628, [1897] 2 Ch. 181.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

E. S. Ford, for the executors and tenant for life, took no part in the argument.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 24.—WARRINGTON, J.—The debt is a simple contract debt, and the right of action is equitable only, arising under the Administration of Estates Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 104). The suit contemplated is a suit against the real estate as a whole, not against any particular part, nor does the statute constitute the debts a charge on the estate. So far as any Statute of Limitations can be said to be applicable to a suit in equity the statute in the present case is that of 21 Jac. 1, c. 16. As regards the estate which is subject to the life interest the case is directly within the authority of In re Hollingshead. In that case it was decided that payment of interest by a devisee for life kept a simple contract debt alive against the devisees in remainder. The payment here is of principal as well as of interest. This cannot make any difference, and I must therefore hold that so far as this part of the case is concerned the case of the defendant fails. The question remains has the debt been kept alive against the other real estate in which there is no tenancy for life. The point has not been expressly decided, but in my opinion the principle of the authorities which I am about to mention cover the case. In Roddam v. Morley it was held by Cranworth, L.C., following the opinions of Williams and Crowder, JJ., that in the case of a specialty creditor payment of interest by a devisee for life kept the debt alive as against those in remainder. The case turned first on the question whether on the true construction of the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 5, payment by a tenant for life was payment by a "party liable," and secondly what would be the effect of such payment. After holding that on the construction of the statute the tenant for life was a party liable, the Lord Chancellor proceeded as follows: "The question, however, still remains, if the payment is made by one only of several persons liable, as, for instance, by a person having only a life interest, who is affected by the payment? Does it operate against the party only by whom the payment is made? Or does it affect all the other parties liable? Does it merely enable the creditor to sue the party by whom the payment was made, or does it set free the action generally? I have come to the conclusion that when a part payment or payment of interest has been made, which has the effect of preserving any right of action, that right will be saved, not only against the party making the payment, but also against all other parties liable on the specialty." In Dibb v. Walker Chitty, J., applying the principles of Roddam v. Morley, held that payment of interest by a tenant for life of an equity of redemption kept alive the right of action on the covenant so as to enable the mortgagee to recover the balance of his debt which his security was insufficient to satisfy as against the general assets of the covenantor; that is to say, as against property other than that in which the tenant was interested. I think that In re Hollingshead shows that as to the effect of part payment there is no material difference between the case of a simple contract debt and a specialty debt. All the devisees are liable in the sense that they may all be sued in equity, and in my opinion payment by any one of them is a payment by a person liable, and therefore, according to the decisions in Roddam v. Morley and Dibb v. Walker, sets free the action not only as against the person making the payment, but against all other parties liable. I hold, therefore, that the part payment in the present case was sufficient to keep the action alive as against all the persons interested in the real estate. It was argued that I ought not to follow Roddam v. Morley, having regard to the criticisms on it contained in Dickinson v. Teasdale and Coope v. Cresswell; but on this point it is enough to refer to the remarks of Chitty, J., in In re Hollingshead. Dickinson v. Teasdale, moreover, was decided on a different statute altogether—namely, the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833. None of the other cases cited by the defendants conflict with the opinion I have expressed. There must therefore be the usual judgment for administration of the real and personal estate.

Solicitors, J. Trevor Davies; Robbins, Hay, Waters, & Hay, for H. S. & S. Watts, Yeovil; Samuel Price & Sons.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy and Ridley, JJ.) April 6.

REX v. PHILBRICK (COUNTY COURT JUDGE) AND ANOTHER.
Ex parte EDWARDS. (a.)

Poor law—Rating—Recovery—Distress—Costs of levy—Distress for sum not exceeding £20—Alleged overcharge—Right to sue in county court—Distress (Costs) Acts, 1817 and 1827—Distress for Rates Act, 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 14), s. 1.

The plaintiff, a passive resister, sought to recover 12*s.* 6*d. in the county court, the amount which he alleged he had been overcharged in connection with a distress not exceeding* £20 levied on his goods. The county court judge considered, following Hill v. Pannifer, 52 W. R. 588, [1904] 1 K. B. 811, that he had no jurisdiction to go into the reasonableness of the charges, and that the plaintiff's course was to apply to the justices, who were the proper tribunal to deal with the case.

Held, following Headland v. Coster & Lamb, 49 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL 133, [1905] 1 K. B. 219, in which Hill v. Pannifer was discussed and overruled, that the action would lie, and that the learned judge had jurisdiction to entertain it.

In this case a rule nisi for a mandamus had been obtained at the instance of one Edwards, directed to his Honour Judge Philbrick, K.C., requiring him to show cause why he should not hear and determine an action brought by the applicant for the rule against the defendant Morey, a certified bailiff, in the Bridport County Court, which action the learned judge had decided he had no jurisdiction to try.

The plaintiff, a passive resister, had refused to pay 5s. 7d., a part of the poor rate levied on him, and the defendant had under a distress warrant levied a distress in respect of this unpaid balance. The articles taken were a gold watch and brooch. These were duly sold and realized £2 4s., out of which Morey retained £1 18s. 7d. made up as follows: Unpaid rate 5s. 7d., cost of warrant 3s. 6d., charges for taking, keeping, and selling of distress £1 9s. 6d. This latter sum included an item of 17s. 6d. for the "removal, storage, keeping possession, and delivery at sale-yard, including haulage, &c." It was to this charge of 17s. 6d. that Edwards took exception, and as he considered that 5s. was the utmost that could reasonably be charged for keeping the levy, and having paid the full sum demanded for costs under protest, he brought this action in the county court to recover back 12s. 6d. as money paid over and above the sum that legally could be demanded from him.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

At the time the action was brought in the county court Hill v. Pannifer, 52 W. R. 588, [1904] 1 K. B. 811, had been decided by the Divisional Court. That case was afterwards overruled by Headland v. Coster & Lamb, 49 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL 133, [1905] 1 K. B. 219. The Court of Appeal in Headland's case decided that the provisions of the Distress (Costs) Acts, 1817 and 1827, limiting the charges that may be made for taking, keeping, and selling goods distrained on for poor rates and certain other rates, where the amount demanded and due does not exceed £20, were not impliedly repealed as regards the poor rate by the Distress for Rates Act, 1849, but were still applicable to that rate.

On the authority of Hill v. Pannifer Judge Philbrick considered that the question of whether any particular item of charges for a levy under £20 was reasonable, was a question for the justices to determine; that the plaintiff's proper course was to have applied to the justices for them to decide whether the charge complained of was or was not reasonable, and that there being a statutory remedy given by appeal to justices, the jurisdiction of the county court was ousted, and the action was therefore one that could not be maintained. He accordingly dismissed the action with costs.

In these circumstances the rule was obtained and now came on for argument.

Randolph showed cause.

R. M. Montgomery supported the rule.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—We, of course, are bound by the decision in Headland v. Coster & Lamb, given in the Court of Appeal. I do not know that it is very material, but the reason I thought the charges made for distress were not limited having regard to the Act of 1849 was on the ground that the Act of 1849 applied specially to poor rates. That is a point which the Court of Appeal have not dealt with. They have impliedly considered it of none effect, therefore we must take it for the purpose of poor rates all the provisions of the Act of 1817 apply. If the Act of 1817 had created a special statutory remedy for this particular grievance, I think that Mr. Randolph's point would have been a perfectly good one; because I think there is abundant authority with regard to such a matter as this if there is a special tribunal whereby relief is given in respect of breaches of duty under a statute that that relief must be pursued. I need not go into those cases. Mr. Randolph cited two (Barraclough v. Brown, H. L. (E.) [1897] A. C. 615, 45 W. R. Dig. 152, and Grand Junction Waterworks Co. v. Hampton District Council, [1898] 46 W. R. 644, 2 Ch. D., at p. 346), and there are many others. But in the first place, if you look at the Act of 1817 itself I think it is pretty plain that it is not intended to interfere with other rights of action because section 4 provided as it then stood: "It shall be lawful for such justice, if he shall find that the complaint of the party or parties aggrieved is not well-founded, to order and adjudge costs not exceeding twenty shillings to be paid to the party or parties complained against, which order shall be carried into effect and levied and paid in such manner and with like power of commitment as is hereinbefore directed as to the order and judgment founded on such original complaint. Provided always that nothing herein contained shall empower such justice to make any order or judgment against the landlord for whose benefit any such distress shall have been made, unless such landlord shall have personally levied such distress. Provided always that no person or persons who shall be aggrieved by any distress for rent or by any proceedings had in the course thereof, or by any costs or charges levied upon them in respect of the same shall be barred from any legal or other suit or remedy which he or they might have had before the passing of this Act." Therefore, the extension of the provisions of the Act of 1817 to a number of other rates, including poor rate, by the Act of 1849 applied to all the provisions of the Act of 1817, including the provision of the right of recovery in other ways if other remedy was not barred.

That seems to have been the view taken by Lord Blackburn (then Blackburn, J.), in Nott v. Round, L. R. 1 Q. B. 405, 14 W. R. Dig. 31. That was an action which was brought against a bailiff for charging greater charges than the schedule allowed, and there the learned judge decided in favour of the bailiff on the ground that he had not committed a breach under the statute but had acted perfectly bonâ fide. The learned judge there said "he may be liable to be made to refund, by an action in the county court, charges which were unnecessary or not strictly lawful, but he is not liable to the treble penalty." In that judgment Shee, J., concurred. Although I do not say that it was absolutely necessary to the decision, it is a very strong point in favour of Mr. Montgomery's view, and it was at any rate upon a matter which had certainly to be considered by the learned judge because he was dealing with what the rights and remedies were against the bailiff under the section of the Act of 1817. I also think that Mr. Montgomery is entitled to rely, at any rate in this court, upon what I may call the effect of the authority in the case of Headland v. Coster & Lamb. That was an action in the county court brought in order to recover the excess amount. There the Court of Appeal overruled our decision in Hill v. Pannifer and decided that the action would lie, or, at any rate, treated the action as lying, and decided that in that action the plaintiff was entitled to recover such amounts as were in excess of the charges under the Act of 1817. It is scarcely possible to think, therefore, that they had not before them the provisions of the Act of 1817; and they either took the view that section 4, to which Mr. Montgomery has called attention, was an answer, or at any rate, that the power to proceed under the Act of 1817 was not sufficient to oust the plaintiff of his right to recover elsewhere in respect of an unreasonable amount either above the schedule or below the schedule price which he alleged had been charged against him. It is said that Mr. Danckwerts, the very learned counsel who argued the case for the respondents, and who tried to support Hill v. Pannifer, declined to take this point that the jurisdiction of the county court was ousted by the Act of 1817, or rather that the remedy must be under the Act of 1817. That, if so, rather strengthens Mr. Montgomery's view; but, in any event, it seems to us that this court, having regard to the language of Blackburn, J., and the proceedings of the Court of Appeal in Headland's case, ought to hold that the county court judge had jurisdiction and ought to have entertained the action in respect of which this rule has been moved. I think therefore the order must be made absolute for the county court judge to hear and determine the case.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree.

RIDLEY, J.—I agree.

Order made absolute with costs accordingly.

Solicitors, Lloyd-George, Roberts, & Co., for Bowen & Symes, Weymouth, for the rule.

Solicitors, Bisgood & Marshall, for Austen Whetham, Bridport, against the rule.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) May 17.

Ex parte COHEN & COHEN. (a.)

Solicitor—Costs—Taxation—Third party—Agreement—Indemnity—Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 38.

A third party, who has agreed to pay the costs incurred in an action of another party, does not by obtaining an order for taxation under section 38 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, enlarge his liability, and cannot be charged with items which could only be claimed by the solicitor as against his own client by virtue of express instructions.

In re Longbotham & Sons (52 W. R. 660) followed.

Judgment of Swinfen Eady, J. (ante, p. 315, [1905] 1 Ch. 345) affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Swinfen Eady, J., arising out of a former decision (reported ante, p. 315; 1905, 1 Ch. 345).

The facts are fully set out in the earlier report, and may be stated here more briefly:

From 1902 to 1904 certain litigation took place between Mrs. Cotton, a lady in the theatrical profession, and Mr. Edwardes, a theatrical manager. There was a common law action for a breach of an agreement to employ the lady, and a Chancery action to restrain singing a song. Both actions were stayed by an agreement dated the 12th of January, 1904, whereby Mr. Edwardes, who is herein referred to as the third party, agreed to pay the costs of the other party "as between solicitor and client relating to the matters in dispute in the said two actions, such costs to be agreed or taxed." A petition for the taxation of the costs was presented, and the master partly taxed the bill. The bill included several unusual items, which had been incurred on the express instruction of the client. The solicitors for the third party carried in objections, and, on the suggestion of the master, obtained an order to tax under the Solicitors Act, 1843, s. 38. On taxation under this order the master disallowed several items as unusual and unreasonable for the third party to pay. The solicitors carried in objections to the effect that the agreement was an indemnity agreement, and that in any case the bill must be taxed between the solicitors and their own client, and all items properly allowable against the client and within the scope of the agreement must be allowed against the third party. The master declined to entertain these objections.

The solicitors then took out a summons to review the taxation and vary the certificate.

On the case coming before him Swinfen Eady, J., expressed the opinion that the agreement was not an indemnity agreement, and that on a taxation under section 38 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, there might be a considerable number of items for which the client might be liable to the solicitor—e.g., items incurred by the express instructions of the client—yet that the third party might not be liable to pay; but that when once the items for which the third party was liable were ascertained, the taxation must proceed as between the solicitor and the party chargeable, and not as between the solicitor and the third party; the master, however, having stated not that he had taxed as between the solicitor and the party chargeable, but as between the solicitor and the party liable, he thought that the proper course would be to send the matter back to the master to review his taxation, and he would amend his certificate.

This was done, and on the 17th of April the matter came before the court on a second summons to review, when it appeared that the master had taxed on the right principle—namely, that obtaining an order under section 38 had not enlarged the third party's liability, that the bill must be taxed as between the solicitors and the client and not as between the solicitors and the third party, and that the agreement was not for indemnity, but meant that reasonable and proper costs should be paid by the third party, leaving unusual costs to be borne by the client.

Swinfen Eady, J., held that the case was covered by his former judgment, and dismissed the summons with costs.

The solicitors appealed.

Hon. E. E. Macnaghten, K.C., and Greenwood, for the solicitors.—In the first place, on the construction of this agreement it was an indemnity agreement and covered all costs the client is liable to pay. Secondly, by electing to tax under section 38 the third party is precluded from objecting to any item allowable against the client and within the scope of the agreement. The case is really covered by the decision in In re Holliday and Godlee, 58 L. T. 301, 36 W. R. Dig. 56. That case was recognized in In re Gray, 49 W. R. 298, [1901] 1 Ch. 239, which was followed by the Court of Appeal in In re Longbotham & Sons, 52 W. R. 630, [1904] 2 Ch. 152; In re Blythe and Fanshawe, 31 W. R. 283, 10 Q. B. D. 207; In re Brown, 15 W. R. 1030, 4 Eq. 464; In re Morecroft, 29 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL 471; In re Negus, 43 W. R. 68, [1895] 1 Ch. 73.

Cave, K.C., and Peterson, for the respondent, were not called upon.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In my judgment the decision of Swinfen Eady, J., was quite right and ought to be affirmed. In substance the argument of counsel for the appellants to-day was divided into two parts. The first argument is really upon the construction of this agreement. We were invited, as was Swinfen Eady, J., to construe this agreement according to its words as an indemnity agreement. Counsel pressed that view upon us to a certain extent. I do not think that he urged upon us, certainly he did not do so very strenuously, that the items disallowed by the taxing-master could come within this agreement, unless we acquiesce in the contention that this is an indemnity agreement. Something certainly was said to suggest that even if we construed this agreement otherwise than as an indemnity agreement the decision of the taxing-master would not be justified. But it does not seem to me that really that point was discussed at all before Swinfen Eady, J., and it is a matter on which the decision of the master cannot be seriously impeached as a decision on a question of fact. I look for one moment at the agreement to see whether it is an indemnity agreement. Paragraph 4 contains a passage by which Mr. Edwardes agreed to pay Mrs. Cotton's costs "as between solicitor and client relating to the matters in dispute in the said two actions, such costs to be agreed or taxed." In my judgment that is not an indemnity agreement. I think that, construing these words naturally, according to their plain meaning, they were not intended to include any costs which Mrs. Cotton might have chosen to incur relating to the matters in dispute, but only such as were reasonable and proper and necessary in the actions. I do not propose to say anything more upon the question of the construction of the agreement. That is my view. It is manifestly not an indemnity agreement.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Now, taking that to be so, the second point was, that by electing to tax under section 38 a third party is precluded from objecting to any item which the client could be called upon to pay by the section and within the scope of the agreement. We have got rid of any question of the scope of the agreement, so that leaves it that the effect of section 38 is that a third party who chooses to obtain an order for taxation under the section alters the nature and scope of his liability. In substance that is what was contended before us to-day and, so far as I can make out, before Swinfen Eady, J. The learned judge began his judgment by saying "It is quite clear from the decision in In re Gray, the principle of which was affirmed by the Court of Appeal in In re Longbotham & Sons, that where a third party obtains an order to tax it does not alter the nature or enlarge the scope of his liability." I entirely assent that that was our decision in In re Longbotham & Sons, and I say again, as I said in that case, that we were merely following that which had been laid down by Cozens-Hardy, J., in In re Gray and by Chitty, J., in In re Negus. What was laid down by Cozens-Hardy, J., in In re Gray was as follows: "With respect to matters falling within his liability under a contract express or implied, he cannot dispute the amount properly payable as between the solicitor and his own client, but in other respects his liability is not increased by obtaining a third party order to tax." The learned judge referred to the judgment of Chitty, J., in In re Negus and read a long passage from that judgment beginning "The other point remains, viz., that this is a third party taxation and the general rule is that a third party stands as between himself and the solicitor whose bill he is taxing in the position of a party chargeable. But that rule does not prevent the taxing-master from considering the question of the liability of the third party." Speaking for myself, I do not think it is necessary to say any more. I agree with the judgment of Swinfen Eady, J. I think his judgment followed, as indeed he said it followed, our own decision in In re Longbotham & Sons, and I really regard the argument which has been addressed to us to-day as an attempt to persuade us that we were wrong in that case.

I will add a word upon In re Gray. It is said that in that case Cozens-Hardy, J., recognized the decision in In re Holliday and Godlee. I cannot agree with that suggestion. In In re Gray, [1901] 1 Ch., at p. 246, Cozens-Hardy, J., in dealing with the case before him, said: "In the present case it was conceded by counsel for the solicitors that certain charges inserted in the bill, though proper as between the solicitors and their client, ought to be excluded from the bill, and the master has taken this view. I refer to charges with reference to a writ for specific performance of the agreement for a lease. The master has also struck out from the bill the costs relating to the counterpart lease although such costs were clearly proper as between the solicitors and their client. How is the line to be drawn? There is great difficulty in arriving at a satisfactory answer. I think that the true view is that the third-party order does not alter the nature or enlarge the scope of the liability upon the existence of which the order is based." The learned judge said that, just after he had been dealing with the judgment of North, J., in In re Holliday and Godlee—and it seems to me, therefore, quite plain that what he was doing was simply to distinguish In re Gray from In re Holliday and Godlee, upon the ground which brings in In re Gray and also the case now before us within our decision in In re Longbotham & Sons. In my judgment it does not make any difference whatsoever that in In re Longbotham & Sons the liability was that of a mortgagor to mortgagee, and therefore was not the result of an agreement inter partes but of an agreement implied by law, or whether the obligation arises from an agreement inter partes. In either case, if there is an obligation limited by an agreement, whether implied by law or inter partes, obtaining an order under section 38 does not alter or enlarge the liability. I think, therefore, that this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

ROMER, L.J.—I also am of opinion that this appeal fails. First, on the question of the construction of the agreement, I have come to the conclusion that Mr. Edwardes did not contract with the lady to indemnify her against all sums which she might have to pay, nor against all the liabilities which she might have incurred to her solicitors. The agreement speaks of costs "as between solicitor and client relating to the matters in dispute in the said two actions, such costs to be agreed as taxed." In my opinion the proper construction of that agreement is that Mr. Edwardes made himself liable for all costs which would ordinarily be allowed between solicitor and client on taxation. In my view he did not make himself liable for items which could not be properly charged by the solicitor against his own client except by virtue of some special agreement. Test it in this way: Suppose the lady had agreed to pay £50 to the solicitor as a retaining fee, and assume that it was paid in circumstances which precluded her from getting it back again, could it be said that it was within the contemplation of the parties to this agreement that Mr. Edwards should be liable to pay such an item as that? To my mind, no. I think that he has contracted to pay solicitor and client costs to be taxed in the ordinary way without regard to any special arrangement which may have extended the original client's liability.

That being the construction of the agreement, Mr. Edwardes was a third party entitled to obtain this order under section 38. Since the full discussion of of these third party orders in In re Longbotham & Sons, and in the cases then cited, it is clear at the present day that a third party obtaining such an order does not make himself liable to pay such items as I have referred to, which could not be charged by the solicitors as being solicitor and client costs except by virtue of a special arrangement. To hold otherwise would be to prevent third parties from obtaining the benefit of section 38. Either he would have to forego taxation or, if he obtained it, he would find himself liable to pay sums which could not be anticipated by him, and for which as third party he was not liable. Applying the general principle of In re Longbotham & Sons to this case, it is clear that the items disallowed by the taxing-master were items for which Mr. Edwardes was not liable. They are items for which the lady would not have been liable to her own solicitor but for the special arrangement between them. Unless the solicitor had explained these items to Mrs. Cotton and shown her that they could not be properly charged against her, and would not be allowed on a party and party taxation, and obtained her special authority, these items could not have been charged against her by her solicitors. Therefore the third party is not liable. They are items to my mind for which a third party is not liable and which would not come within the liability which he incurred under the present agreement, and his liability is not enlarged because he obtained the advantage of section 38. That ends the case. But I should like to say a word on the so-called hardship to solicitors which may be caused by this decision. The hardship would be the other way to my mind if we decided differently. It would be a great hardship if a person who had made himself liable to pay solicitor and client costs of the ordinary kind could by obtaining an order under section 38 find himself liable to pay sums which he knew nothing about, and which could only be chargeable against the client by virtue of some special agreement. There, to my mind, would lie the hardship; on the other hand, I see no hardship on the solicitors. They have always the liability of their own client to fall back upon. Every solicitor knows his liability to have his bill of costs taxed. His bill is always liable to be taxed under the third party section, and if he puts into his bill items which cannot be charged against a third party, it is no hardship on him if they are not allowed. Nor is it any hardship that he cannot be allowed against the third party items which can only be allowed by special agreement when his bill is taxed as between solicitor and client. On the question of hardship I am clear that our decision ought to be the same.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. There are two points to be considered. First, the construction of the agreement entered into with the third party, and, secondly, whether the circumstance that the party who is liable to pay has taken advantage of section 38 makes any difference. The agreement is that the third party is to pay the client's costs "as between solicitor and client relating to the matters in dispute in the said two actions, such costs to be agreed or taxed." To my mind that means proper and reasonable costs relating to the matters in dispute and does not extend to costs which the solicitors could only recover from their client if they showed that they had obtained proper authority from her after giving her an explanation. Then does the fact of an order having been obtained under section 38 make any difference? Prior to the decision in In re Longbotham & Sons there was a great deal to be said on that question, but I understand that that decision was intended to affirm the law as laid down by Cozens-Hardy, J., in In re Gray, where it was said, at p. 248, ". . . even on a third party taxation the court is bound to look at the nature of the items and to consider whether apart from the order the applicant is under any liability to pay them. In other words, although the solicitor may put in one bill as against his own client a series of items some of which may go beyond the liability of the third party the third party does not by obtaining an order to tax render himself liable to the whole bill. With respect to matters falling within his liability under a contract express or implied he cannot dispute the amount properly payable as between the solicitor and his own client, but in other respects his liability is not increased by obtaining a third party order to tax." That being the view which I take, I think that the judgment of Swinfen Eady, J., was right and that the appeal fails.

Solicitors, Cohen & Cohen; Slark, Edwards, & Co.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div.
Swinfen Eady, J. } May 3, 4.

In re GOULDER (DECEASED).
GOULDER v. GOULDER. (a.)

Will—Absolute gift—Legacy on condition—Share of residue at time of testator's decease or at any time prior to actual payment of share—Gift over on bankruptcy—"Actual payment"—"Actual receipt"—Vesting of legacy—Notice—Assignment by trustee in bankruptcy—Effect of gift over—Authorities.

Bequest by a testator after death of a tenant for life of a share of residue to J., "but if J. should be unable at the time of his (the testator's) decease, or at any time prior to the actual payment to him of his share or any part thereof on the division of the estate, to give a receipt to his trustees for his share by reason of his having committed or suffered any act whereby he had deprived himself of the right to the benefit of such share either in whole or in part," then in such case the share, or that part which he could not receive for his own benefit, was to be divided equally between J.'s children. On the day of distribution by the trustees they received notice that two bankruptcy notices had been served on J., and accordingly refused to pay him his share of the residue.

Held, on the construction of the will, that the divesting had happened before the legacy had taken effect, and that the gift over was valid, and must be given effect to.

Johnson v. Crook, 28 W. R. 12, 12 Ch. D. 639; In re Chaston, Chaston v. Seago (29 W. R. 778, 18 Ch. D. 218); In re Wilkins, Spencer v. Duckworth (29 W. R. 911, 18 Ch. D. 634), followed.

Martin v. Martin (14 W. R. 986, L. R. 2 Eq. 404) and Bubb v. Padwick (28 W. R. 382, 13 Ch. D. 517) disapproved.

Adjourned summons.

This was a summons taken out by the trustees and executors of the will of James Goulder for the purpose of determining whether the gift over of a share or part of a share of residue bequeathed by the testator to his brother on his being unable at any time prior to "actual payment" of such share to give a receipt "by reason of his having committed or suffered any act whereby he had deprived himself of the benefit thereof," was valid or not. The facts were as follows:

By his will dated the 22nd of November, 1894, the above-named testator, after appointing George Goulder and Thomas Hattersley trustees and executors of his said will, and after sundry bequests, devised and bequeathed all the residue of his real and personal estate whatsoever and wheresoever unto and to the use of his trustees upon certain trusts therein mentioned until the decease of his said wife, and on her death after providing for certain payments therein mentioned, upon trust to divide the same into eleven equal parts, and to pay (inter alia) two eleventh parts to his brother John Goulder for his own use absolutely, and the testator further provided that if his said brother should be unable at the time of his (the testator's) decease, or at any time prior to the actual payment to him of his share or any part thereof on the division of the estate, to give a receipt to his trustees for his share by reason of his having committed or suffered any act whereby he had deprived himself of the right to the benefit of such share, either in whole or in part, then such share or that part which his said brother could not receive for his own benefit was to be paid unto and equally between such of his said brother's children as should then be living.

(a.) Reported by A. R. TAYLOUR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The said James Goulder died on the 23rd of November, 1894, and his will was duly proved by the said executors and trustees.

The widow died on the 16th of August, 1904. The amount of the residue realized after the death of the widow amounted to £986 7s. 6d.

On the 31st of October, 1904, the trustees requested their solicitors to write to the various beneficiaries under the will explaining that they would be prepared to distribute the estate on the 2nd of November. On that date the trustees' solicitors received notice that two bankruptcy notices had been served on the said John Goulder and that the bankruptcy was fixed for hearing next day. The solicitors thereupon, at an interview the same day, informed John Goulder that in consequence of this information they advised the trustees not to pay to him his share in the two-elevenths, as under the trusts of the will it would pass to his children.

A receiving order was made against the said John Goulder on the 3rd of November, and on the 1st of December a Mr. J. L. Taafe was appointed trustee in bankruptcy of his estate. By an indenture dated the 20th of March, 1905, the said J. L. Taafe as trustee assigned to E. D. Mullis, G. H. Johnson, and H. H. Stones, as assignees, the two-eleventh parts or shares of the said John Goulder in the residue of the said sum of £1,200. The originating summons having been already issued, the three assignees were joined respondents. The remaining respondent, as a son of the said John Goulder, claimed to be entitled to his father's share under the gift over.

Owen Thompson, for the trustees.

W. M. Hunt, for the persons claiming under the gift over.—Under the circumstances the bankrupt's share has passsd to his children. The acts of bankruptcy were the non-compliance with a bankruptcy notice: Ex parte Eyston, In re Throckmorton, 26 W. R. 181, 7 Ch. D. 145. Here the testator uses the word "suffer," therefore non-compliance with a bankruptcy notice is "suffering any act," &c.: Johnson v. Crook, 28 W. R. 12, 12 Ch. D. 639; and see Malins, V.C.'s, remarks in Bubb v. Padwick, 28 W. R. 382, 13 Ch. D. 517, on p. 523.

Gatey, for the assignees, cited Martin v. Martin, 14 W. R. 986, L. R. 2 Eq. 404. This case is entirely distinct from Johnson v. Crook, and it is governed by Martin v. Martin. Hutchin v. Mannington, 1 Ves. jun. 367, is the groundwork of all these cases; in which the judge says there must be a definite time before which your gift over takes effect: Minors v. Battison, 25 W. R. 27, 1 A. C. 428, on p. 443 (Lord Hatherley) and p. 446 (Lord O'Hagan's remarks); Collins v. Macpherson, 2 Sim. 87. Fry, J.'s, approval of Johnson v. Crook is outweighed by Martin v. Martin: Bubb v. Padwick, 28 W. R. 382, 13 Ch. D. 517.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—The question is, What is the true construction of the language which the testator uses in his will? By that will a sum of £1,200 is set apart for the widow for life, and after her death the residue is divided into eleven equal parts, two-elevenths of which he leaves to his brother John Goulder absolutely. Then follows the proviso on which the question turns: "Provided always that in the event of either of my said brothers John Goulder and Alfred Goulder being unable at the time of my decease, or at any time prior to the actual payment to him of his share or any part of his share on the division of my estate, to give a receipt to my trustees for his share by reason of his having committed or suffered any act whereby he has deprived himself of the right to the benefit of such share, either in whole or in part, then I direct my trustees to stand possessed of the share of such brother, or that part of such share which my said brother is unable to receive for his own benefit, and to pay the same unto and equally between such of his children as are then living, as being sons shall attain or have attained the age of twenty-one years, or being daughters shall attain or have attained that age, or shall marry or have married under that age, and if there be only one such child, then all to such one child." Now, the estate was insufficient to provide this sum of £1,200, therefore there was no residue as to that. The widow died on the 16th of August, 1904, and thereupon so much of the estate as was set aside for this sum of £1,200 by the trustees—namely, £986 7s. 6d., became then divisible.

The notice by the trustees that they would be prepared to distribute, was made as early as the 2nd of November, when they had received notice of these acts of bankruptcy committed by John Goulder. On the 16th of November he was adjudicated a bankrupt. It has not been successfully disputed that before the actual payment he had committed this act of bankruptcy by non-compliance with a bankruptcy notice. It is said that the true construction of the will is, if John "should" commit or suffer any act, &c., before the actual date at which it shall be payable—that is, before the death of the tenant for life. I am of opinion that the will is a great deal too clear to permit of effect being given to that proposition. The testator provides that the whole or any part of his share is to go over, and he evidently contemplates the date of the actual payment as the date for giving the receipt, and also, when the son shall actually receive payment of such as is his share.

The will also contemplates that there may be successive payments, but before he actually receives any he may be disqualified, and so much as he does not receive is to go over. Counsel for the assignees referred me to In re Sampson, 44 W. R. 557, [1896] 1 Ch. 630. [His lordship referred to Stirling, L.J.'s (then Stirling, J.), remarks on pp. 634, 635.] I am of opinion that upon the true construction of this will the words are not susceptible of the construction placed on them in that case, they are clear and refer to the share or any part thereof. Also in the present case the language of the testator is much stronger than in Martin v. Martin, 14 W. R. 986, L. R. 2 Eq. 404, another of the cases on which counsel for the three assignees laid so much stress (see the remarks of Wood, V.C., on p. 413), and when the testator here gives these shares, he means "actual payment," and he refers to the legatee giving an actual receipt. Having arrived at that conclusion, the question remains, Is such a proviso legal? Can the law give effect to it? In Johnson v. Crook, 28 W. R. 12, 12 Ch. D. 639, Sir George Jessel examines the cases, and he points out such a proviso was lawful, and the rule of law to prevent effect being given must be one that is definite and certain. In In re Chaston, Chaston v. Seago, 29 W. R. 778, 18 Ch. D. 218, and In re Wilkins, Spencer v. Duckworth, 29 W. R. 911, 18 Ch. D. 634, Fry, J., in both cases approves Johnson v. Crook. It is clear that you may have a gift vested and liable to be divested. The cases which counsel for the assignees relied on of Martin v. Martin and Bubb v. Padwick, 28 W. R. 382, 13 Ch. D. 517, I cannot agree with, and I must give effect to the law as laid down by Jessel, M.R., and Fry, J., in the cases I have mentioned above.

It is a common provision to make a gift to A. for life with remainder to the children of A.; the children take vested interests. Singular as is the particular evidence on which the divesting is to take effect I must give legal effect to the will. Under the circumstances I come to the conclusion that the divesting had happened before the legacy had taken effect, and the gift over must be given effect to.

Solicitors, Peacock & Goddard, for Henry Vickers, Son, & Brown, Sheffield; T. H. Aldous, for J. E. Wing, Sheffield.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy and Ridley, JJ.) April 3.

In re HENRY AINSWORTH (AN UNQUALIFIED PERSON).

Ex parte THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY. (a.)

Solicitor—Unqualified person—Carrying on proceedings—Entering appearance as agent for defendant—Motion to attach—Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 2—Solicitors Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 127), s. 26—Rules of the Supreme Court, ord. 12, rr. 9, 11.

Held, that giving notice of appearance as agent on behalf of the defendant in an action was "carrying on a proceeding" within the meaning of section 2 of the Solicitors Act, 1843; and, therefore, when such notice was given to the plaintiffs by an unqualified person, such person was guilty of a contempt of court by virtue of section 26 of the Solicitors Act, 1860.

Motion to commit an unqualified person for contempt of court under section 2 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, and section 26 of the Solicitors Act, 1860, in carrying on a proceeding by giving notice of appearance under ord. 12, r. 9, of the Rules of the Supreme Court on behalf of a defendant in an action brought in the District Registry of Manchester.

The affidavit in support of the motion stated the following facts: On the 29th of August, 1904, a writ was issued in the Manchester District Begistry in an action of Kirker, Greer, & Co. (Limited) v. Greenhalgh for money lent and goods supplied.

On the 5th of September the solicitors for the plaintiffs in the above action received by registered post a notice of appearance, dated the 3rd of September, in these terms: "Take notice that I have this day entered an appearance at the office of the Registrar of the Manchester District Registry for the defendant Joseph Greenhalgh to the writ of summons in this action. The said defendant requires delivery of a statement of claim. Dated the 3rd of September, 1904. (Signed) HENRY AINSWORTH, of 24, Crompton-street, Bury, agent for Joseph Greenhalgh."

Henry Ainsworth was not a solicitor.

F. W. Hollams, for the Law Society, having stated the facts, said that Henry Ainsworth, in his affidavit filed in the motion, expressed his regret for having done anything illegal, and undertook, if the court should accept his apology, to pay the costs of the motion.

THE COURT called upon

Mallinson, for Henry Ainsworth.—There was no suggestion in the letter, or in anything that Ainsworth did, to point to his representing himself to be a solicitor. He was clearly entitled to enter an appearance, which, under the Rules of the Supreme Court, may be done by a defendant personally, or by anyone duly authorized on his behalf. That very point was decided in Oake v. Moorecroft, 18 W. R. 115, L. R. 5 Q. B. 76. It was therefore not an illegal act to enter the appearance, and the mere fact that he did not accurately describe what was done could not render an act that was per se legal illegal. Moreover, it was clear that he intended to describe what in fact was done.

F. W. Hollams, in reply.—If instead of giving notice of appearance Ainsworth had delivered a defence the case would have been unarguable. There was no real distinction between the two cases, for each was a step in the proceedings, and therefore notice of appearance equally with delivery of defence could only be taken either by the defendant himself or by his solicitor.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In this case I think I am justified in saying that a technical offence has been committed. It was urged for the respondent that he was justified in taking a document signed by the defendant to the registrar so that an appearance might be entered, and having done that, he was justified in any form in telling the plaintiff that he had taken that step. I am not prepared to say if that was all that Mr. Ainsworth had done it might not be an answer to that which is a technical breach of the rules. I think that rule 9 of order 12 means more, and I think it means that "the defendant shall, on the day on which he enters an appearance to a writ of summons, give notice of appearance (Form No. 2 in Appendix A, Part II.) to the plaintiff's solicitor, or, if the plaintiff sues in person, to the plaintiff himself. The notice may be given either by notice in writing. served in the ordinary way at the address for service (which, in the case of a writ issued out of a district registry, must be the address for service within the district), or by prepaid leter," and so on. The form is given; the statute contemplates that step being taken in the action. When the document is looked at it is a document in which Henry Ainsworth states that he has this day entered an appearance for the defendant Greenhalgh, and he requires delivery of a statement of claim, and it purports to be signed by Henry Ainsworth, agent for Joseph Greenhalgh. I think it was intended that the notice should be given either by the defendant himself or by his solicitor, and the intervention of a third party acting for the defendant purporting to do that which the rule states is taking a step which would properly be taken when a man does not do it himself by a solicitor was, under the circumstances, a technical breach of the rules. I agree with Mr. Hollams that, this explanation having been given, although beyond pointing out what is right and wrong in the matter it is not of great importance—we might accept Mr. Ainsworth's offer to express regret that he has broken the rule, and pay the costs. We see no reason not to hold him to that, and I think we ought to give effect to it, and make that order, notwithstanding the contention Mr. Mallinson has urged upon us.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me this was carrying on a proceeding in the action. The document was one prescribed by the rules and forms, and there is common sense and meaning in insisting on the rule being followed out. This document is sent to the plaintiff or his solicitor, the complaining party; he looks at the signature, and if he has the signature of a person who says he is agent for the defendant, he has neither the assertion of the defendant nor of the only class of persons who according to the law can represent—and if he represents falsely is subject to very serious pains and penalties—namely, a responsible solicitor who says: "I have entered an appearance." What he has on the face of this document is not that contemplated by the rule, the word "agent" there being used to meet the case, so to speak, of the person being not the solicitor himself, but the agent for the solicitor, and not the agent for the defendant. All the plaintiff gets in this case is the signature of a person without any proof that he had the authority of the defendant to make this entry and send this official document. Mr. Mallinson argued that it is merely a notifying to the plaintiff of the defendant's act by a third party which, according to decision and authority, was permissible. It is clearly decided that the defendant need not attend personally to enter an appearance, and the appearance is good though delivered to the officer by a third person. But it must be borne in mind that in that case it has the signature of the person who is sued upon it.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

RIDLEY, J.—I agree. Although it is possible for the defendant to properly enter his appearance without doing it in person, yet when you come to deal with ord. 12, r. 9, it is necessary for either the defendant personally, or a solicitor properly authorized to represent him, to give the notice, and I cannot see how the requirements of the rule are complied with unless that is so.

Solicitor for the Incorporated Law Society, E. W. Williamson.

Solicitor for the respondent, R. H. Bentley.

K. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy and Ridley, JJ.) } Jan. 20; April 14.

LANDAUER v. ASSER. (a.)

Arbitration—Award bad in point of law—Marine insurance—Depreciation in value of goods covered by policy—Undertaking—Covering note—Usage.

A contract of sale contains a term that A., the vendor, shall effect on account of L., the vendee, insurance for 5 per cent. over net invoice price. Subsequently to the sale A. receives an undertaking from his vendor to hold a policy of insurance for account of A. to the extent of the value of the goods sold to A.—viz., £1,280, which goods A. has by the old contract resold to L. at a depreciated price—viz., £1,107. L. having paid the contract price, A. hands over to him the shipping documents, including the said undertaking. A. alleges that the mercantile usage in such cases is not to hand over the undertaking, but a covering note for the actual value of the goods insured, and that it was owing to a mistake of a clerk that it was not the course pursued in this case. The goods were destroyed by fire after the property in them had passed to L. The underwriter paid L. £1,280 in pursuance of the undertaking. A. claims the amount represented by the difference between £1,280 and £1,107, and goes to arbitration under a clause in the contract. The award delivered pursuant to these proceedings stated that under the contract A. was entitled to the sum in dispute.

Held, that inasmuch as it was not a term of the contract that A. should be entitled to the sum in dispute, the award was bad in point of law on its face, and therefore must be set aside; that A. having no legal title to recover anything from the underwriters by reason of the fact that he had lost all interest in the property insured, he could have no better title against L. unless under an express or implied stipulation to that effect.

Held, further, that even if there were a mercantile usage supporting A.'s contention, yet the umpire had not so found in his award.

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Quere (Kennedy, J.) whether such a usage could be supported in a court of law.

This was a motion to set aside the award of an umpire on the grounds that it was bad in point of law on its face. The facts material to the case are fully set out in the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice.

Leck, for the appellants Landauer & Co.—I agree if the underwriters had tendered the appellants £1,107 they could have claimed no more; but, seeing that they, the underwriters, are willing to pay the full amount—viz., £1,280, the appellants are entitled to retain it for themselves. The vendors had lost all interest in the property insured, and therefore could not have maintained an action against the underwriters: see Ralli v. Universal Marine Insurance Co., 10 W. R. 278. The award professes to construe the contract of sale, and has plainly misconstrued it, and the award must be set aside.

J. H. Hamilton, K.C. (F. Gover with him), for the respondents Asser & Co.—Where there is an error in law on the face of an award I agree that there are grounds for appeal, but it must appear from the documents referred to in the award that the umpire was wrong in law. Mercantile usage must be taken into consideration, and in this case the umpire must, as a matter of fact, have taken it into consideration before he could have given any legal effect at all to the insurance documents, for the actual facts show that on the first sale the seller to the respondent declared on a floating policy, which declaration was accepted by the respondents, who might have insisted upon a fresh marine policy; the underwriters, but for the mercantile usage, could not be compelled to pay on such a declaration at all. There is evidence on affidavits of a usage that in the case of a resale of a portion of goods duly insured a covering note to protect the purchaser to the value of the goods sold is handed over, and the umpire took that into consideration. He was entitled to do so, the submission to arbitration being of the usual mercantile character. In the Ralli case the policy was an existing policy, but in this case it was not existing at all at the time of the contract, and was to be under the terms of the contract for strictly a limited amount—viz., 5 per cent over net invoice price. Tamvaco v. Lucas, 3 B. & S. 89, shows that it is a question of fact as to what documents the buyer is entitled to have handed over to him, therefore the umpire was entitled to treat the question in this case as a question of fact.

He referred to Ionides v. Harper, 29 L. J. Exch, p. 36.

Leck, in reply.—The award does not show that the umpire took into consideration the question of usage at all. No usage could give Asser & Co. an interest so as to support a claim against the underwriters. [KENNEDY, J.—Suppose there had been a clause in the contract to some such effect as "any excess to be held by you for me." Would that have bound the appellants?] That would not have been binding, because it would have been illegal. It would have been in the nature of a gambling contract: Lloyd v. Fleming, 20 W. R. 296, L. R. 7 Q. B. 302.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 14.—Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., read the following judgment: This was a motion to set aside an award made by Mr. Bibby, an umpire appointed under an arbitration clause in a contract for sale of the 3rd of November, 1903. The only ground on which it is alleged that the award should be set aside is that the arbitrator has gone wrong in point of law.

and that the error in point of law appears upon the face of the award. There is no doubt whatever that if this can be established the award ought to be set aside: see Hodgkinson v. Fenice, 3 C. B. N. S. 189. The contract of sale was dated the 3rd of November, 1903, and made between Messrs. Landauer as purchasers, and Messrs. Asser & Co. as sellers, of 250 bales of Manilla hemp at the price of £35 10s. per ton cost, freight, and usual f. p. a insurance. The shipment was to be made from the Philippine Islands, Hong Kong, or Singapore to London, between the 1st of January and 31st of March, 1904. The contract contained the following clause: "Should hemp or any portion thereof not arrive in London from loss of vessel or unavoidable cause this contract to be fulfilled for such portion by handing documents including insurance policy against payment of invoice; but should the hemp or any portion thereof be transshipped and arrive in other vessel or vessels for account of the original sellers the contract shall hold good for such portion. Insurance for 5 per cent. over net invoice amount to be effected by sellers for account of buyers under a f. p. a. policy, or usual Lloyds' conditions at Lloyds, or with a London insurance company, or with a company having a responsible and well-known London agent." At the time of the contract there does not appear to have been any policy in existence. The goods were paid for on the 4th of May, 1904, and on that day the purchasers, Messrs. Landauer, received from Messrs. Asser & Co. the shipping documents including an undertaking dated the 29th of April, 1904, in the following terms:

"2, East India-avenue, London, 29th of April, 1904. The Manager, Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation.—Sir,—In pursuance of directions from F. A. Coney & Co., of Mincing House, E.C., by whose order we, as their broker, effected a policy of insurance for £5,616 on hemp per steamers from Phillippines to U.K. Continent, and being dated the 29th of April, 1904, now remaining in our hands, to hold the same as far as relates to the interests declared on such policy as per declaration of £1,280 say one thousand two hundred and eighty pounds on 250 bales hemp so valued per steamship Peleus to London as a security for your bank to protect its interests in the subject-matter of the above declaration to the extent of £1,280, and we hereby hold such policy to the extent of the above declaration for your bank free from any lien on our part on the policy.—We are, Sir, yours, &c., G. DUNCAN & Co. (pp. A. DUNDAS)."

Some word is omitted in the above document, but it was treated before us as an undertaking to hold the amount of £1,280 therein mentioned. This sum, £1,280, was in excess of the net invoice amount plus 5 per cent., which it is agreed would amount to £1,107.

After the arrival in Liverpool about 160 bales of the goods were injured by fire while in the warehouses at the docks. A claim was made by Messrs. Landauer upon the insurance company, who, as I understand, made a payment on account to them of 75 per cent. and were prepared to pay over according to the terms of the undertaking the balance of the amount due upon a basis of the whole parcel being insured for the amount of £1,280. Before, however, the remaining 25 per cent. was paid over the sellers, Messrs. Asser & Co., claimed that they were entitled to receive such amount of the insurance money as represented the difference between £1,107, that is, the net invoice amount plus 5 per cent., and £1,280. The matter was referred to arbitration pursuant to the supplementary clauses of the contract. The only one of the supplementary clauses which seem to have any bearing upon the matter is clause 5: "The evidence and proceedings upon arbitration may be taken in a mercantile way without regarding legal technicalities respecting evidence."

Mr. Bibby made his award in the following terms:

"Having been asked to act as umpire in the question as to the liability and interest in the policy of insurance appertaining to 250 bales Manilla hemp per Peleus, I decide that as the parties to the contract dated the 3rd of November, 1903, were by the terms thereof the principals thereto, their interest and liability in insurance is defined to be the value of the invoice plus 5 per cent., and that the buyers are therefore entitled to and only to said amount, the balance one way or the other being due from or to the sellers."

It is alleged on behalf of Messrs. Landauer that the award is bad because it decides that the buyers are only entitled under the contract to such amount of the insurance money as represents the net price plus 5 per cent., and that the balance is due to Messrs. Asser & Co. It is alleged on behalf of Messrs. Asser that the question to be decided by the umpire was one of mercantile usage, and that he was entitled to say, under the contract, that the interests of Messrs. Landauer was limited to the extent of the purchase-money plus 5 per cent., and that, as against Messrs. Landauer, the sellers, Messrs. Asser, were entitled to receive from the underwriters and retain the difference between the amount of the insurance and the amount of the net price plus 5 per cent. The umpire appears to have decided so far as one can gather from his award that under the contract of the 3rd of November the purchasers are, as against the sellers, not entitled to claim more than £1,107 plus 5 per cent. even though the policies handed over in pursuance of the contract were intended to be so handed over as a discharge of the sellers' obligation to deliver the policy of insurance.

This seems to me to be an error in point of law. If policies are handed over by a seller under such a contract the interest in them passes wholly to the purchaser, and, assuming the underwriters to pay on those policies the amount insured, I do not see under what right the sellers are entitled to claim that the purchasers are trustees for them of any portion of the amount so insured. The sellers, Messrs. Asser & Co. had, at the time of the loss, no interest in the subject-matter of the insurance, and could not upon the facts assumed have made any valid claim against the underwriters; and if the underwriters pay, they must be taken to have paid to the persons who were entitled to the goods at the time of the loss. The only reason stated in the award for a different conclusion is that the parties to the contract were principals and not brokers, and the award states that the buyers are therefore entitled only to the value plus 5 per cent. This seems to me immaterial except, possibly, for the purpose of excluding any question of the right of the sellers or purchasers respectively to represent the interests of third parties. I can see no other bearing that it has upon the question. Although not directly in point, the case of Ralli v. Universal Marine Insurance Co., 31 L. J. Ch. 313, supports the contention that under such a contract policies which are in fact handed over in discharge of the sellers' obligations are to be treated as belonging to the purchasers. For these reasons I think the award should be set aside and the appeal allowed.

KENNEDY, J., read the following judgment: I concur in the judgment which my lord has just delivered but it is right, as the case is somewhat peculiar, I think, to state as shortly as may be the reasons of my coming to that conclusion. It is unnecessary to recapitulate the facts which appear in the affidavits filed by the parties on this motion. There is not really any conflict as to those which are material.

We are called upon to decide whether the award made by Mr. Bibby, acting as umpire held under the provisions of the contract of purchase dated the 3rd of November, 1903, ought or ought not to be set aside for error of law appearing upon its face. It is clear that such error affords good ground for setting aside an award; see Hodgkinson v. Fernie, 3 C. B. N. S. 189.

It appears to be clear also that Messrs. Asser & Co. had not at the time of the loss and of the insurance any insurable interest in the goods insured. They could claim from the underwriters nothing for themselves. The underwriters have paid to Messrs. Landauer & Co., who were the owners of the insured goods at the time of the loss, 75 per cent. of the amount due in respect of the insurance, and are willing to pay to pay them the balance. That balance has not as yet been paid, only because Messrs. Asser have interfered and put forward a claim that as between themselves and Messrs. Landauer & Co. it belongs to them. The case comes before us in a somewhat awkward form because the underwriters are not parties to the arbitration or bound by the award. In these circumstances seeing that Messrs. Asser & Co. can have no valid legal claim against the underwriters, I ought, I think, to treat the case as if the underwriters had paid, as they are willing to pay, to Messrs. Landauer, the full amount covered by the policy of insurance and as if Messrs. Asser & Co. were suing Messrs. Landauer & Co. in respect of so much of the money paid by the underwriters to Messrs. Landauer & Co. as represents the difference between the amount recoverable by the assured under a policy for £1,280 and the amount recoverable under a policy which would satisfy the contract of the 3rd of November, 1903.

The umpire's award as to this difference, which for brevity's sake I will call the sum in dispute, runs as follows. [His lordship read the award as set out above.]

The reasoning of the umpire which he puts forward in the expression "as the parties to the contract dated the 3rd of November, 1903, were by the terms thereof the principals thereto" is, as the learned counsel for both parties seem to agree, far from clear. I do not understand in any case how the fact helps Messrs. Asser & Co. But whatever the expression means, it is quite clear I think, that the umpire bases his decision that Messrs. Asser, the sellers, are, and Messrs. Landauer, the buyers, are not, entitled to the sum in dispute entirely upon the terms of the contract of the 3rd of November, 1903. Therefore unless that contract, properly construed, justifies the umpire's conclusion the award is upon its face bad in point of law. Is there, then, anything in the contract of the 3rd of November, 1903, which would constitute Messrs. Landauer & Co. in respect of the sum in dispute trustees of it for Messrs. Asser & Co.; or anything which would make that sum when received by them money had and received for Messrs. Asser & Co.? It appears to me that, unless one or other of these propositions can be established, Messrs. Asser's & Co.'s claim fails and the award must be set aside.

In my judgment the contract does not afford good ground for the maintenance of either of these propositions. It is a c.i.f. contract for the purchase of 250 bales of Manilla hemp, to be shipped by steamer or steamers from the Philippine Islands, Hong Kong, or Singapore to London, insurance for 5 per cent. over net invoice amount to be effected by the sellers, Messrs. Asser & Co., for account of buyers, Messrs. Landauer & Co. Messrs. Landauer & Co. admittedly performed their duties as buyers, and at the time of the loss of a part of the goods by fire were the only parties who had any interest in the goods. I will assume that, as alleged by Mr. W. Asser in his affidavit, Messrs. Asser & Co. would have correctly and sufficiently performed their duty in regard to the provisions of the contract as to insurance if they had with the bill of lading handed over to Messrs. Landauer a covering letter as described by him in paragraphs 8 and 9 of that affidavit, and as appearing in exhibit A. The business effect of this, as I assume, would have been that Messrs. Asser & Co., retaining the original undertaking of the underwriters, which they, when buying, had received from the buyers, would, upon the loss occurring, have collected the insurance moneys for Messrs. Landauer, the only parties having any legal claim against the underwriters at the time of the loss, and that Messrs. Landauer & Co. could have claimed, as a matter of legal right from the underwriters through Messrs. Asser & Co., only an amount equal to 5 per cent. over the invoice price and no more. I will assume also, as now alleged by Mr. W. Asser in paragraph 10 of the same affidavit, it was owing to a mistake, in the sense of a deviation from the ordinary course of business on the part of their clerk, that Messrs. Asser, instead of sending the covering note, gave to Messrs Landauer, as in performance of their duty under the contract in respect of insurance, the marginal undertaking of the importers' underwriter for the larger sum of £1,280. What is there in the contract to justify in these circumstances a claim on the part of Messrs. Asser & Co., whose property in the goods and insurable interest, as I have already said, had passed to Messrs. Landauer & Co. before the time of the loss, that Messrs. Landauer & Co. are trustees for them in respect of any part of the insurance moneys, whatever be the amount which may be paid to Messrs. Landauer & Co. by the underwriters? Or because, if they had handed over to Messrs. Landauer not the original undertaking but only the covering note for the smaller amount, Messrs. Landauer & Co. would not have been able to insist on receiving from the underwriters, through Messrs. Asser & Co., so much as they are now willing to pay them, to justify a claim that the surplus is being received to their, Messrs. Assers', use? It appears to me that in regard to the claim of Messrs. Asser & Co. for the sum in dispute, the alleged mistake of their clerk does not assist them. As I understand the facts, they do not lose a penny to which otherwise they would have had a valid legal claim because that Messrs. Landauer receive from the underwriters more than Messrs. Landauer & Co. might otherwise have received. The fact that Messrs. Landauer, in consequence of the alleged mistake, receive, because for some reason the underwriters are willing to pay, a larger sum than they would have received if the Messrs. Asser had merely satisfied the contractual requirements as to the insurance in the usual way, could in my opinion clothe Messrs. Asser with a legal or an equitable right to the surplus only if there is to be found in the contract an express or an implied undertaking or obligation of Messrs. Landauer in case of an insurance claim arising to hold any sum which they might receive in respect of insurance beyond 5 per cent. on the invoice price for the use and benefit of Messrs. Asser. I am unable to find any such stipulation expressed or implied in the contract. Mr. Hamilton, in his able argument on behalf of the Messrs. Asser, insisted much upon the fact that this was a mercantile arbitration, and that the umpire might properly give effect to a mercantile usage. But the award expressly and explicitly founds its conclusion upon the terms of the contract of the 3rd of November, 1903, and makes no reference to custom or usage; and, further, it is difficult to see how there could be a custom or usage applicable to a set of circumstances which, according to Mr. Asser's affidavit, has arisen not in accordance with the ordinary course of business in the performance of the contract, but out of a clerk's mistake, which has created a peculiar and abnormal state of affairs. The only case cited to us which appears to have any real bearing upon the point is that of Ralli v. The Universal Marine Insurance Co., 10 W. R. 278. In that case a cargo of grain from the Black Sea had been insured with the defendants under two policies, and was sold afloat when the market was low, and, consequently, at a depreciated price, including insurance. The vendor indorsed one of the policies for its full value to the vendee, and the other for about half the amount insured in it, making together the amount of the depreciated selling price of the grain. The cargo was lost, and the vendee claimed to receive from the underwriters the whole amount covered by both policies. The vendors thereupon sued the vendee and the underwriters, claiming a declaration that as to the amount covered by the last-named policy there was as to half the amount thereby insured a trust in their favour. The underwriters paid the whole amount of the insurance into court, and the litigation proceeded. The decision is not directly in point here, because the judgment of the Lords Justices was largely influenced, at least, by the fact that in that case the policies had been effected before the time of the contract of sale, and in their view the stipulations in the contract of sale as to insurance were to be read as referring to those existing policies; whereas, in the present case, the undertaking which represents the insurance was not given until some months after the contract of sale. On the other hand, the position of the vendor was in that case stronger than that of Messrs. Asser & Co. here, because he had, as I have said, indorsed over one of the policies to the vendee only for about half the amount insured in it, and it was claimed, therefore, on his behalf, that he had in this way expressly reserved to himself as against the vendee, an interest to the extent of the half of the policy. In view of this plain reservation on the part of the vendor in respect of this policy, it is noticeable that Mr. Arnould, commenting upon the case (Marine Insurance (4th ed.), pp. 308, 309) says, "The defendants (the underwriters) had paid the full amount into court in the first instance; if they had not adopted this course, and the judgment of the learned Vice-Chancellor against the vendee's claim had been affirmed, it is difficult to understand upon what principles in law the vendor would have based his claim to the balance." My view is that, as the award decides that in point of law under the contract the Messrs. Asser had a title to the sum in dispute, it is bad in point of law and must be set aside. As we have already pointed out, the underwriters are not parties to the arbitration proceedings or to this litigation, and it is therefore neither open to us nor indeed necessary to say whether in paying Messrs. Landauer, as we are assured the underwriters are willing to do, they are doing what Messrs. Landauer would as against them have required as a legal right.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for appellants, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, & Whatton.

Solicitors for respondents, C. W. Dommett & Son.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. Admiralty. } February 23.

"THE GLENGARIFF." (a.)

Ship—Collision—Queenstown Harbour—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 25.

The entrance to Queenstown Harbour must be deemed to be a narrow channel within the meaning of article 25 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

Action.

The plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship Lough Fisher, a vessel of 418 tons gross register. The defendants were the owners of the steamship Glengariff, a vessel 1,285 gross register.

About 7.35 p.m. on the 30th of June, 1904, a collision occurred between the steamship Lough Fisher and the steamship Glengariff in Queenstown Harbour.

According to the plaintiffs' case The Lough Fisher was on a voyage from Ellesmereport to Queenstown with a cargo of coals. At the time of the collision the weather was clear and fine and the wind from the W.S.W., the tide about high and of little force. The plaintiffs' vessel was proceeding on a course of N.N.E. magnetic, making about eight knots, proceeding up channel. In those circumstances those on board saw The Glengariff about one and a-half to two miles off and broad on the port bow. As the Bar Rock buoy was approached The Lough Fisher ported her helm a little and sounded one short blast upon her whistle. As The Glengariff appeared to disregard this signal The Lough Fisher's helm was ported a little more and her engines slowed down. Directly afterwards her engines were put full steam astern and three short blasts were sounded upon her whistle, but The Glengariff came on and with her starboard bow struck the stern of The Lough Fisher and did considerable damage.

The plaintiffs contended that The Glengariff had improperly attempted to cross the bows of The Lough Fisher, and had failed both to indicate her course and to keep her proper side of the fairway.

According to the defendants' case The Glengariff was at the time of the collision on a voyage from Queenstown to Liverpool with a general cargo, with cattle and passengers, and was manned by a crew of thirty-one hands. She was making about twelve to thirteen knots, and was proceeding down on the southern side of the fairway. At a distance of about two miles and bearing broad on the starboard bow, those on board The Glengariff observed The Lough Fisher coming up to the westward of the fairway, and acting under a port helm as if intending to cross the bow of The Glengariff, The Lough Fisher being on the wrong side of the fairway. The Glengariff at once put her engines full speed astern and sounded three short blasts upon her whistle and put her helm hard aport. The Lough Fisher, however, came on at a high speed, and with her stern struck the starboard bow of The Glengariff, doing her considerable damage.

The defendants alleged that The Lough Fisher was not on her proper side of the fairway and had failed to take proper steps to pass port to port; that her helm was ported at an improper time and kept to port, and that her engines were not eased, stopped, or reversed in due time.

Aspinall, K.C., and A. D. Bateson, for the plaintiffs.—Article 19 was infringed by reason that The Glengariff did not keep out of the way when she had The Lough Fisher on her starboard side. By attempting to cross ahead of The Lough Fisher The Glengariff infringed article 22, and in neglecting to keep that side of the channel which was on her starboard side she committed a breach of article 25.

(a.) Reported by GWYNNE HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

They cited The Leverington, 11 P. D. 117, 34 W. R. Dig. 175; The Ashton, [1905] P. 21.

Laing, K.C., and Dumas, for the defendants, cited The Gustafsberg, ante, p. 350, [1905] P. 10; The Pekin, [1897] A. C. 532; and The Velocity, L. R. 3 P. C. 44.

BARGRAVE DEANE, J., in giving judgment, said: This is an action for damages caused by a collision between The Lough Fisher, a steamship of 418 gross and 168 tons net register, and The Glengariff, a steel screw steamer of 1,285 tons gross and 487 tons net register, and 450 horse-power nominal. One vessel is a great deal larger and more powerful than the other. The collision was brought about by one vessel crossing the bows of the other, and the damage done shows to us that both had way on them at the time of the collision. It is true that the master of The Glengariff says that he was stopped, and when I asked him the question he said he was going astern through the water, but the mate, who was called, agreed that he was stopped in the water, which would mean that he still had about two knots over the ground, with the tide. That would be fast enough to cause the undoubted damage, which consists in the stern of The Lough Fisher being drawn over to starboard. The damage actually done was done by the starboard bow of The Glengariff near the hawsepipe, the patent anchor in the hawsepipe being driven right through the bow of The Glengariff, and there is no doubt that was the hard substance which caused the damage done to the stem and bow of The Lough Fisher. This case has given the court a good deal of anxiety, because it involves a very large and very important question. The entrance to Cork Harbour is in one sense a very narrow entrance; that is to say, it is very narrow to the southward, where there seems to be only a few hundred yards where vessels must come in, and then there is a fairway which has been marked by buoys by the local authorities. It leads a little to the eastward of north until you come up further, and then it leads more to the westward, but to the westward of that long stretch of fairway there are several hundred yards—I think we have worked it out at about 400 or 500 yards—of navigable water. The question is, what is the effect of the various rules on a condition of things like that? There is article 25, which says that, "In narrow channels every steam vessel shall, when it is safe and practicable, keep to that side of the fairway or mid-channel which lies on the starboard side of such vessel." What is a fairway? A fairway is practically defined by this article to be mid-channel. There is no rule which says that people shall keep in the fairway, but the rule says that they shall keep to the starboard side of that fairway or mid-channel—that is to say, in narrow channels. What is a narrow channel? I do not think it has ever been laid down what is a narrow channel. There have been cases in which certain places have been held to be narrow channels, and in which definite decisions have been given on definite facts; but this is the first case, as far as I know, in which the question whether Queenstown Harbour is a narrow channel has been raised. We have discussed it at considerable length, with every possible effort to arrive at a definite conclusion, and the Trinity Masters are very strongly of opinion that this is a narrow channel, and that the channel extends from one side of the whole of this navigable channel to the other, and that article 25 requires all vessels passing up and down to keep to the starboard side. If that is right, and I so hold—and I realize that it is a very serious consideration, because it is a very important piece of water—holding that that is all a narrow channel—it is the duty of every vessel entering to pass up on the starboard side of that mid-fairway, and of every vessel coming down to keep to the starboard side of that mid-fairway. What is the result? The result is that we find The Lough Fisher is wrong. She was away to the port side of that fairway, and right over on the port side of that navigable narrow channel, and therefore we find that she is to blame. What was the intention of The Lough Fisher? I have not the smallest doubt that the intention of The Lough Fisher was, by hugging that port side of the narrow channel, to cheat the tide, which was ebb, and when she got up to the light on her port hand to hug round the shore on her starboard hand, and so get into the harbour; but when she got abreast of that light she saw ahead and on her port bow a steamer, which was coming down on the starboard side of the fairway. The vessel, which was The Glengariff, was, according to the rule I have just laid down, in her proper water. She was on her starboard side of that fairway—not necessarily in the fairway—but on her starboard side of the centre of that fairway, coming down. The Lough Fisher, when she found herself with her port bow open to the starboard side of The Glengariff, did not accept the position under article 19 and keep her course. She ported, which she had absolutely no right to do. If she was intending—it is not suggested she was—to get into her right water by crossing the bows of the other vessel, so as to get on to the starboard side of the channel, then she had no right to put The Glengariff in that position. The Glengariff assumed, according to the evidence of her master, that The Lough Fisher was going to starboard and carry on the course which she had been adopting in her own water, of hugging the shore and passing away to the westward. The only doubt the court has is whether the master of The Glengariff is altogether free from blame for not stopping his engines sooner. I do not think that he stopped his engines in the ordinary sense of the word as soon as he ought to have done, but I think that he is absolved because I think he was put into a false position by the action of The Lough Fisher; and that he is absolved by reason of his assuming, as he was entitled to assume, that that vessel having got out of her proper water, was intending, as she evidently did intend, to starboard her helm and go to port. It was not until he found that she was porting, so as to cross his bows, that he stopped, and we think he did it then as early as he was justified in doing it, in the circumstances. The result is that the court finds The Lough Fisher alone to blame.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Pritchard & Sons.

Solicitors for the defendants, Cooper & Co.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. } Admiralty. } Dec. 15, 16.

"THE SKIPSEA." (a.)

Ship — Collision — Tyne Navigation Rules, Nos. 21 and 22.

Rule 21 requires that "every vessel when under way, and requiring to pass over a part of the channel which is not within that half reserved for its navigation, for the purpose of proceeding to or from any landing, mooring, or other place, shall be navigated so as to cause no obstruction, injury, or damage to any other vessel; and every vessel continuing its navigation, after reaching such landing, mooring, or other place, shall be navigated as soon as practicable to the side of the river specified as the proper side for its navigation, and so as to cause no obstruction, injury, or damage to any other vessel." Rule 22 provides that "every vessel crossing the river, and every vessel turning, shall be navigated so as not to cause obstruction, injury, or damage to any other vessel."

(a.) Reported by GWYNNE HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Court held that what the substance of the two rules indicated was that the crossing vessel must be so navigated as not to cause obstruction to another vessel. In other words, the crossing vessel may cross if there is time and opportunity to do so without hampering another vessel, and that another vessel which sees a vessel about to cross must act reasonably with regard to that crossing vessel, and if the crossing vessel requires a little more room to assist her in crossing such more room must be given.

Action of damage by collision.

Laing, K.C., and Balloch, for the plaintiffs, the owners of the steamship Vernon.

Aspinall, K.C., and D. Stephens, for the owners of The Skipsea.

The facts of the case sufficiently appear from the judgment.

GORELL BARNES, J., in giving judgment, said: This is the case of a collision which took place between the steamship Vernon and the steamship Skipsea, about 5.45 p.m. on the 14th of September last, speaking generally, off the Northumberland Dock entrance, on the Tyne, though the spot is really a little below that. At the time in question the weather was fine and clear, the tide was flood, force of about a knot and a half, according to the evidence, and The Vernon, a vessel of 982 tons gross, was bound from the Tyne to Rochester with a cargo of coal, and was therefore proceeding out of the Northumberland Dock entrance with the object of going down the river. The Skipsea, a steam screw steamer of 2,993 tons gross, was inward bound from Rotterdam to Dunston-on-Tyne, which is above the Northumberland Dock, in water-ballast, with a pilot in charge and a tug ahead of her. She was proceeding up the river. The two vessels came into collision at a spot about which there is some considerable dispute, but which, substantially, must be not very far, I think, from the upper buoy of what is marked on the chart before me as No. 3 pier, well over to the north side of the channel. They came into collision at an angle of a very fine degree. The port bow of The Skipsea was touched, apparently, by the port bow and stem of the other vessel. There was evidently a very fine angle between them. Now, the rules which are applicable to this case are the Tyne Rules, Nos. 21 and 22. Probably the 22nd is more applicable, but the 21st is of a somewhat similar character. It is as follows: "Every vessel when under way, and requiring to pass over a part of the channel which is not within that half reserved for its navigation, for the purpose of proceeding to or from any landing, mooring, or other place, shall be navigated so as to cause no obstruction, injury, or damage to any other vessel; and every vessel continuing its navigation, after reaching such landing, mooring, or other place, shall be navigated as soon as practicable to the side of the river specified as the proper side for its navigation, and so as to cause no obstruction, injury, or damage to any other vessel." The 22nd rule is in these terms: "Every vessel crossing the river, and every vessel turning, shall be navigated so as not to cause obstruction, injury, or damage to any other vessel." The first rule I have read—namely, the 21st, referring to the part reserved for the vessel's navigation, must, of course, be read with reference to those rules which require a vessel proceeding inward and up the river to keep on the north side, and a vessel proceeding out to sea to go to the south side, so that each vessel shall pass the other on the port side. The rules which I have referred to have been dealt with in certain cases, one of which is The Thetford, 6 Asp. M. L. C. 179, but they substantially seem to me to indicate that the crossing vessel must be so navigated as not to cause obstruction to another vessel; in other words, that the crossing vessel may cross if there is time and opportunity to do so without hampering another vessel, and that another vessel which sees a vessel about to cross must act reasonably with regard to that crossing vessel, and if the crossing vessel requires a little more room to assist her in crossing such more room must be given. It is a kind of give and take, but I do not think one is going too far to say that the weight of it begins to operate upon the vessel crossing. She must see she has room to cross, and if she has she should do it. This is one of those cases in which, to my mind, it is exceedingly difficult to arrive at any decision about the matter if one binds oneself down to particular answers given by particular witnesses. In this present case there is a good deal of the evidence on both sides which one cannot possibly accept. They naturally try to make—each of them do—the best case they possibly can. The case on the part of the plaintiffs is that they were acting in such a way as to show that they were proceeding to keep away to the northward of the up-coming ship, and that the up-coming ship really had no difficulty in passing to the southward. The case presented on the other side is that the up-coming ship had the other vessel in a position in which they at first thought she would cross, and that they acted accordingly, and that the other vessel did in fact get across them (some of the defendants' witnesses say) and then came swinging back towards them. This is a gross exaggeration. It is not likely that The Vernon would come back after she once got across. That is not the evidence given by the pilot, and those who have given it, I think, have been led away by the fact that their own bows were swinging round under the reverse action of the engines. I think this may be decided upon what may be termed the undisputed facts. One of those undisputed facts, or perhaps two, one may say, are that the coming-out vessel is coming out at an angle across the river and moving, according to the statement of claim and the preliminary act, at about a knot and a half through the water, with engines moving slowly ahead. There is very little doubt about that. There is also very little doubt that the other vessel, which was coming up river, had received warning that a ship was coming out of dock, that she was proceeding at slow speed, and had reversed the engines slightly to take her off still more, and that she was also coming up river under a proper mode of navigation. I think the discrepancy between the two sets of witnesses about her position in the channel can be reconciled by noticing that the bouys of No. 3 pier stand out very considerably into the river. When the plaintiffs say that The Skipsea was coming up in mid-channel, and the defendants say she was coming up well over to the north side, they were both not very far from speaking the truth, because a vessel which appears to those on a vessel coming out to be in mid-stream may still not be very far from the buoys on the north side. and be well within what is termed her own water, It seems to me that the probabilities go rather to show that the up-coming ship was coming up in a proper position on her own side of the navigable water. The next matter that is not in much practical controversy, and may, I think, be accepted, is that the two vessels sighted each other at about 400 yards apart; that is to say, as soon as The Vernon was far enough forward from the gate of the basin to see past the corner wall there, she could see the other vessel coming up, and, of course, the upcoming vessel could see her. I do not suppose that the large vessel, The Buluwayo, that we have heard of, was any substantial obstruction to that sight. Having regard to her length and size, and the position of the shute or place where she was loading, she would not, I think, obstruct the view from the two vessels of each other as soon as the one coming out was fairly clear of the basin entrance and could see round the corner of the point. So there is another matter not much in dispute—namely, the distance apart at which these vessels saw each other. The third matter which is not in any really substantial conflict is approximately the spot of the collision; that is to say, well to the north side, not very far from the upper buoy of No. 3 pier. I think it follows from that statement of the position of the collision that, having regard to the state of the tide and the distance at which these two vessels saw each other, both vessels must have moved very nearly the same distance through the water to the spot of the collision from the time they first saw each other; and the vessel coming up had the tide with her, and was moving in the stream of it. If it is measured off with any care, as I said yesterday, the out-coming vessel must have moved a considerable distance from the edge of the basin to get to the spot of the collision.

What is the general conclusion to draw from these facts, which are independent of smaller details mentioned by witnesses, and about which there is a great deal of discrepancy? When one takes the general features of the case I think one is brought face to face with this position, and this is the real solution—namely, whether or not when those on the defendants' vessel first saw The Vernon they were justified in assuming that she was about to cross the river, and they ought to take action to help her to do so, by giving room for that, or whether they ought to have assumed that she was going to remain on the side where she was and not attempt to cross. The pilot of the defendants' vessel, who gave his evidence, I think, well, said this: "I knew from the pilot or someone on board another steamer that there was a steamer coming out of dock," and, dealing with the manœuvres which he adopted, he said: "I gave orders to stop and to my tug to 'vast towing,' and I gave a long warning blast. We had then two knots speed through the water and we reversed a few revolutions, knowing there was a ship coming out." Then he said: "I saw her 400 yards off, a little on the starboard bow, and we gave one short blast, and The Vernon replied with two. I thought she would cross and go into her water. I ported a little when I first saw The Vernon, steadied again, and blew one blast again, and she replied again with two. I saw she was acting under starboard helm and I reversed and gave three short blasts." I think the effect of that is that he had committed himself, as soon as he saw this ship coming out, to the idea that she was crossing, and to acting in consequence for the purpose of keeping to the northward, so as to allow her to cross; and the question resolves itself, again, into what I have already said—namely, were those on board the defendants' vessel justified in that assumption, and what grounds had they for so acting? As I have said, I think it is clear that The Vernon was proceeding out of the dock entrance with engines working slow ahead and making a knot and a-half, or thereabouts; and when the other vessel saw her, and when those on board her could see the other vessel, the plaintiffs contend that she (The Vernon) kept in such a position and acted in such a way that the defendants' vessel ought to have kept away to the southward of her. The defendants, on the other hand, say that the action of the plaintiffs' ship was such as to indicate, in the first instance, that she was crossing the river, and that they, the defendants, acted at first as if that was the intention of the plaintiffs' ship. That the vessels were very close together, and that the opportunity of the plaintiffs' ship for crossing the river was not a good one, was certainly tolerably clear. Possibly she might have got across if she had acted at once, but still I think that the more prudent action to take was that which was partially taken by the plaintiffs, namely, not to attempt to cross after they had seen the vessel in front of them approaching at such a short distance. I do not believe all that the plaintiffs' witnesses have said about this case. I do not believe their evidence that the defendants' ship was by the action of her port helm brought as much across river as they say, or that the tug was towing on the starboard bow as they say. If that had been so the tug would have found herself in difficulties with The Buluwayo. On the other hand, I do not accept the view of the defendants that the plaintiffs' ship got right across the bows of The Skipsea, and then came back again. I cannot accept either story in toto. The plaintiffs' vessel had, to use an expression of her master, "just got her stern nicely clear of the lock gates," and at first sight, it seems to me, those on the defendants' vessel would say, "That ship is coming out of dock and is moving ahead." If that was the impression to be conveyed, what ought the plaintiffs to do in connection with such a position? It seems to me that they are then placed upon their election, either to cross the river or to stop where they are, or to keep such a position as not to hamper or mislead the defendants; and I think myself that those on the plaintiffs' vessel ought in such a position to have indicated unmistakably to the defendants what their action was to be; that is to say, if they were intending to cross, which might be risky in the circumstances, to act at once to do so, but if, on the other hand, it was not right to cross, and they determined to stop where they were, to indicate that in an unmistakable way. As Mr. Aspinall pointed out, if the ship in the dock entrance was stationary, then the up-coming ship could say, "I can go on and pass her"; but if she was not stationary, having regard to this narrow way, then I think she should indicate properly what she was going to do. The proper way to do it was to have given three short blasts at once, and reversed her engines, and kept in the lock or near the lock entrance. If it is said that might have tended, with the tide, to cant her head to starboard, it is not really of moment, because it could only have been for a short time, and it could have been counteracted by dropping the anchor while the other ship passed. She did neither. She neither went across, nor did she indicate with any definiteness what she was going to do. I think the defendants first blew a short blast, and then The Vernon blew two, but that would be indicating only that she was trying to keep to the northward, and that is a matter which, I think, would be contrary to the general spirit of the rules. It seems to me that that failure to indicate distinctly that she was going to stop where she was and not cross the river is really the cause of this trouble, because it leaves the navigator of the upcoming ship, which was being navigated carefully and properly, and on which it is extremely difficult to find any real negligence or defect of management, in the position of thinking "Well, I am not sure whether this ship means to stop or to cross, and I think from her motion ahead she is going to cross, and she is not indicating properly that she is not going to do so." Then the vessel ports slightly and reverses her engines for a time—there is some discrepancy between her pilot and engineer about it—possibly the engines were stopped at the end because it was found that the vessel was canting so much to the northward that there was danger of her getting into difficulties with the buoys or The Buluwayo—and I do not think she could do anything else. The result, to my mind, is that the plaintiffs' vessel is alone to blame in this case.

Solicitor for the plaintiffs, Charles E. Harvey.

Solicitors for the defendants, Botterell & Roche.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. — April 17.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. ODELL. (a.)

Land transfer—Right of appeal—Forged deed—Indemnity—"Act neglect or default"—Taking deed to registry—Land Transfer Acts, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 87), s. 98; 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 65), s. 7; Land Transfer Rules, 1903, 296-8.

When the registrar has, under section 7, sub-section 5, of the Land Transfer Act, 1897, awarded indemity to an applicant who has suffered loss by the rectification of the register, the trustees of the insurance fund and the Treasury as guarantors of the fund have a right of appeal to the court as being "aggrieved persons" within section 96 of the Land Transfer Act, 1875, and rule 298 of the Land Transfer Rules, 1903. A transferee of a forged transfer took it to the Land Registry, where it was registered; subsequently on the forgery being discovered the register was rectified on the application of the true owner, whereupon the transferee applied to be indemnified out of the insurance fund.

Held, that the transferee was, under section 7, sub-section 4, entitled to indemnity out of the insurance fund, as he had suffered loss by the rectification, and that his act in taking the deed to be registered was not an "act, neglect, or default" within the meaning of section 7, sub-section 3, so as to disentitle him to indemnity.

This was an appeal by the Treasury from the decision of the registrar allowing indemnity out of the fund created under the Land Transfer Act, 1897, to Mr. Odell.

On the 7th of December, 1901, Mrs. Rose Connell, was registered as the proprietor of a charge upon 36, Kensington Park-road, Notting Hill, for £350, with interest at 5 per cent.; this charge was afterwards reduced to £300.

Mrs. Connell's solicitor entered into negotiations with Mr. Odell, the present claimant, that he should take over this charge. Mr. Odell agreed to do this and paid the money to Mrs. Connell's solicitor, and on the 23rd of February, 1903, a transfer of the said charge—which was alleged to have been made in consideration of £300 paid by the said E. T. Odell to Alexander Thompson, solicitor, in pursuance of a written authority purporting to be signed by the said Mrs. Rose Connell—was registered; the transfer purported to be signed by the said Mrs. Connell was dated the 21st of February, 1903, and the said charge was thereby purported to be transferred to the said E. T. Odell. Mrs. Connell's solicitor had in fact forged Mrs. Connell's name to the transfer, and she knew nothing about the transaction. Mr. Odell's solicitor produced the forged transfer at the registry, and procured the name of Mr. Odell being placed on the register in the place of Mrs. Connell.

When Mrs. Connell discovered the transaction, she at once applied to the court to rectify the register, and Mr. Odell's name was accordingly struck off the register and Mrs. Connell's name was restored to it.

Mr. Odell then claimed that he was entitled under section 7, sub-section 5, of the Land Transfer Act, 1897, to be indemnified in respect of the removal of his name from the register.

The registrar considered that the above state of facts exactly fitted the words of section 7, sub-section 4, of the Land Transfer Act, 1897. The register had been rectified in consequence of a fraud, the fraud had occurred in a registered disposition for valuable consideration, the grantee was not aware of the fraud and had in fact exercised reasonable care in the transaction, he had suffered loss by the rectification in that he had lost the security for the £300 which he had paid to the said A. Thompson, and therefore the registrar thought that he was entitled to indemnity and accordingly awarded him the sum of £369 17s. 4d. to be paid out of the Indemnity Fund established by section 21 of the Land Transfer Act, 1897.

From this award the trustees of the fund appealed.

By the Land Transfer Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 65), s. 7:

Sub-section 1: "Where any error or omission is made in the register, or where any entry in the register is made or procured by or in pursuance of fraud or mistake, and the error, omission, or entry is not capable of rectification under the principal Act, any person suffering loss thereby shall be entitled to be indemnified in the manner in this Act provided."

Sub-section 2: "Provided that where a registered disposition would if unregistered be absolutely void, or where the effect of such error, omission, or entry would be to deprive a person of land of which he is in possession or in receipt of the rents and profits, the register shall be rectified, and the person suffering loss by the rectification shall be entitled to the indemnity."

Sub-section 3: A person shall not be entitled to indemnity for any loss where he has caused or substantially contributed to the loss by his act, neglect, or default, and the omission to register a sufficient caution, notice, inhibition, or other restriction to protect a mortgage by deposit or other equitable interest, or any estate or interest created under section 49 of the principal Act, shall be deemed neglect within the meaning of this sub-section."

Sub-section 4: "Where the register is rectified under the principal Act by reason of fraud or mistake which has occurred in a registered disposition for valuable consideration, and which the grantee was not aware of and could not by the exercise of reasonable care have discovered, the person suffering loss by the rectification shall likewise be entitled to indemnity under this section."

Sub-section 5: "The registrar may, if the applicant desires it, and subject to an appeal to the court, determine whether a right to indemnity has arisen under this section, and, if so, award indemnity. In the event of an appeal to the court, the applicant shall not be required to pay any costs except his own, even if unsuccessful, unless the court shall consider that the appeal is unreasonable."

Sub-section 6: "Where indemnity is paid for a loss, the registrar, on behalf of the Crown, shall be entitled to recover the amount paid from any person who has caused or substantially contributed to the loss by his act, neglect, or default."

(a.) Reported by R. FRANKLIN STUBBING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Section 21, sub-section 1: "For the purpose of providing indemnity payable under this Act there shall be established an insurance fund to be raised by setting apart at the end of each financial year such portion of the receipts from fees taken in the Land Registry as the Lord Chancellor and the Treasury shall by order determine."

Sub-section 2: "The insurance fund shall be vested in such names and manner as the Treasury from time to time direct."

Sub-section 3: "If the insurance fund is at any time insufficient to pay indemnity for any loss chargeable thereon, the deficiency shall be charged on and paid out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, or the growing produce thereof; but any sum so paid out of the Consolidated Fund or the growing produce thereof shall be repaid out of the money subsequently standing to the credit of the insurance fund."

By the Land Transfer Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 87), s. 95: "Subject to any estates or rights acquired by registration in pursuance of this Act, where any court of competent jurisdiction has decided that any person is entitled to any estate, right, or interest in or to any registered land or charge, and as a consequence of such decision such court is of opinion that a rectification of the register is required, such court may make an order directing the register to be rectified in such manner as it thinks just."

Section 96: "Subject to any estates or rights acquired by registration in pursuance of this Act, if any person is aggrieved by any entry made or by the omission of any entry from the register under this Act, or if default is made, or unnecessary delay takes place in making any entry in the register, any person aggrieved by such entry, omission, default, or delay may apply to the court in the prescribed manner for an order that the register may be rectified, and the court may either refuse such application with or without costs to be paid by the applicant, or it may if satisfied of the justice of the case make an order for the rectification of the register."

Section 97: "The registrar shall obey the order of any competent court in relation to any registered land on being served with such order or an official copy thereof."

Section 98: "Subject to the provisions in this Act contained with respect to registered dispositions for valuable consideration, any disposition of land or of a charge on land which if unregistered would be fraudulent and void, shall, notwithstanding registration, be fraudulent and void in like manner."

By rule 296 of the Land Transfer Rules, 1903: "In all mere formal matters the decision of the registrar shall be final, unless the registrar or the court gives leave to appeal therefrom."

Rule 297: "In all other cases, questions arising before the registrar upon any application as to the registration of a title, incumbrance, or charge, or as to any dealing with any registered title, incumbrance, or charge, or any matter entered or noted in or omitted from the register, or as to the amendment or withdrawal from the register, of any certificate or other document, or as to any claim for indemnity (whether such questions relate to the construction, validity, or effect of any instrument, or the persons interested, or the nature or extent of their respective interests or powers, or as to order of priority, or the mode in which any entry should be made or dealt with in the register, or otherwise) shall be determined by the registrar, subject to appeal to the court; but the registrar may, if he thinks fit, instead of deciding the question himself, refer it at once to the court for decision."

Rule 298: "Subject to the provisions of rules 296 and 297, any person aggrieved by an order or decision of the registrar may appeal to the court."

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G., and R. J. Parker, for the appellants.—The trustees of the fund and the Treasury are persons aggrieved within section 96 of the Act of 1875 and rule 298 of the Land Transfer Rules, 1903, and therefore they are within their rights in appealing against the decision of the registrar. A transferee who has accepted the transfer and paid his money and registered the transfer cannot be heard to say that he acted in reliance on the deed, which he himself brought to be registered, being guaranteed by the registry, and that he is therefore entitled to be indemnified out of the insurance fund. The principle of the decision in Simm v. Anglo-American Telegraph Co., 28 W. R. 290, 5 Q. B. D. 188, is applicable here. There is nothing in the Land Transfer Acts or rules which throws upon the registry the burden of guaranteeing the validity of every deed presented to them for registration. The insurance fund was created for the purpose of indemnifying third persons who had acted on the faith of the register, and who had suffered loss by reason of the rectification of the register. It is impossible to say that Odell did not contribute to the loss by his own act in forwarding the transfer to the registry so as to bring him within sub-section 3 of section 7. The case of Gibbs v. Messer, [1891] A. C. 248, 39 W. R. Dig. 252, shows that a person who deals with a forger does not act on the faith of the register, and cannot by registration of the forged deed obtain a valid title in his own person, although he can pass a valid title to a third person who purchases from him, and such third person could claim to be indemnified on the rectification of the register, but his position is a totally different one from Odell's. The question under sub-sections 2 and 4 of section 7 is whether Odell is a person who has suffered loss by the rectification, and under sub-section 3 whether he contributed to the loss by his own act or default. In this case Odell has not suffered loss by the rectification of the register; the loss was the direct result of the forgery; he never was the owner of the property, as the instrument was a nullity. After the forgery was discovered Odell would have been guilty of fraud if he had attempted to sell the property, and he could not have made a title to the property even if the register had not been rectified, and further if he has suffered loss by the rectification he contributed to it inasmuch as he brought the forged instrument for registration. Odell acted on the representation of Thompson that he had authority to receive the money, and this representation was quite outside anything that took place at the registry. The case of Viney v. Chaplin, 4 Drew. 237, 2 De G. & J. 468, as to the right of the purchaser to have the deed executed in his presence, and his right to insist on the payment to the vendor personally or upon his written authority, has no application now in the case of sales, by reason of section 8 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, but that section does not apply to mortgages, as to which the doctrine of Viney v. Chaplin still holds good. Section 98 of the Land Transfer Act, 1875, is wide enough to cover the present case. The effect of putting a title on the register is not to make it a better title; if it was originally void it is not cured by being put on the register.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and F. Baden Fuller, for the respondent Odell.—There is a preliminary objection to the hearing of this appeal. The Attorney-General has no locus standi to appear in this appeal. Under the rules the registrar has the entire management of the fund, and the only persons concerned in an application for indemnity are the applicant and the registrar, and if the decision is against the applicant he has the right to appeal to this court, making the registrar respondent to the appeal, but he is not required to serve any other person. There is no provision in the Land Transfer Act, 1897, for the costs of anyone except the applicant's costs, and therefore it was intended that the applicant should be the only appellant, and it was not intended that there should be an appeal on the part of the Treasury or the Attorney-General. The Treasury say they are an aggrieved person within section 96 of the Act of 1875 and rule 298, and therefore entitled to appeal, but it was never contemplated that the Treasury should appeal as an aggrieved person. The right of appeal given under rule 297, "subject to appeal to the court," is the same as given by section 7, sub-section 5, of the Act of 1897, and that right is only a right of appeal by the applicant. Rule 298 gives only a right of appeal subject to the provisions of rule 297, and the Treasury is not a person aggrieved within the meaning of this rule. The decisions on the words "person aggrieved" are mainly under the Bankruptcy Acts. In Ex parte Sidebotham, 28 W. R. 715, 14 Ch. D. 458, James, L.J., said: "A 'person aggrieved' must be a man who has suffered a legal grievance, a man against whom a decision has been pronounced which has wrongfully deprived him of something, or wrongfully refused him something, or wrongfully affected his title to something." This definition was cited with approval by Lord Esher, M.R., in Ex parte Official Receiver, 35 W. R. 660, 19 Q. B. D. 174; see also In re Lamb, [1894] 2 Q. B. 805. The only persons concerned in this matter are the applicant and the registrar, otherwise the Treasury would have to be made a party to every application for an indemnity. Before the Act of 1897 there could be rectification where a name got on the register by mistake, but if the property had been dealt with bonâ fide and for valuable consideration there could not be subsequent rectification. By section 7, sub-section 1, of the Act of 1897 compensation was given to persons suffering loss where there could not be rectification, and the indemnity fund was established for compensating persons who were damnified by reason of registration or by omission from the register. Provision for rectification and compensation was made in sub-section 2 for two additional cases where the disposition was absolutely void and where the person in possession was deprived by reason of the registration. Sub-section 3 was a proviso to both the preceding sub-sections, so that a person should not get compensation where the loss was caused by virtue of his act, neglect, or default. Under section 98 of the Land Transfer Act, 1875, where a disposition of land is fraudulent and void, the register can be rectified unless there has been a subsequent disposition for value, and this provision is continued in section 7, sub-section 1, of 1897. Under section 7, sub-section 4, additional rights to compensation were given to the original grantee or volunteers claiming under him. The effect of reading section 7, sub-section 4, together with section 98 of the Act of 1875 was to give compensation to persons damnified by rectification by reason of fraud. Sub-section 4 was intended to cover such a case as the present one. The expression "likewise" meant "also" or "in like manner." Sub-section 3 provided what was to be considered neglect or default within the meaning of the section; "act" in the sub-section meant some blameworthy act ejusdem generis with neglect or default, it was not such an act as carrying in a transfer for registration; the act of registration was not a voluntary act but an act in compliance with a statutory duty. The decision in Simm v. Anglo-American Telegraph Co. had been narrowed by subsequent decisions, and had been distinguished in nearly every case where it has been cited: see Balkis Consolidated Co. (Limited) v. Tomkinson, 42 W. R. 204, [1893] A. C. 396, and Dixon v. Kennaway & Co., [1900] 1 Ch. 833, 48 W. R. Dig. 40. The case of Sheffield Corporation v. Barclay, 52 W. R. 54, [1903] 2 K. B. 580, showed that a distinction must be drawn between cases like Simm's case, where a request was made to someone who had no duty in the matter independently of the request, and cases like the present one, where the request was made to one who had a duty in the matter independent of the request, and that in the latter case something more than a mere request would be required to raise the contract of indemnity. The registry made inquiries but did not disclose the result of their inquiries till after the loss had resulted; they were therefore estopped from denying our right to indemnity. The point that the loss was occasioned by the forgery, and not by the rectification, would apply just as much to a transferee for value under sub-section 2. The forgery no doubt was the primary cause, but it is a fallacy to say that the loss was not caused by the rectification. Until the fraud was discovered Odell had rights under the Act. Before the Act a transfer by him would have given a good title, and since the Act to a right to indemnity, and this right he has lost. There was nothing in section 7, sub-section 4, about the applicant having acted on the faith of the register, but if there were, Odell did act in reliance on the register inasmuch as he searched for prior charges prior to the payment of his money. The case of Gibbs v. Messer had no application to the present case.

R. J. Parker replied.

KEKEWICH, J.—It seems to me that a decision in favour of the preliminary objection would be against all principle, and I am bound to consider that this Act of 1897 and also the Act of 1875 were intended by the Legislature to proceed under the ordinary principles which govern such matters. Before coming to that, I notice an argument—namely, that the registrar is appointed by the Act expressly in so many words to conduct the business of the registry, and large powers are given to him for that purpose. That is perfectly true, but I do not understand that this award of indemnity is part of the business of the registry at all and I do not think that the registrar could be said to conduct it. In truth, when you see the powers given to him with reference to the indemnity you immediately also see that it is not the business which he is conducting. It is very important to observe that what he has to do is to determine something. He has to act in a judicial capacity, he has not merely to see that the transfers are properly registered or to see that the machinery of the office proceeds in a proper manner, but he is created by these provisions a judge in a certain particular class of cases. The meaning of the words "conducting the business" would go far too wide to make them embrace the determination of this important question. The point seems to me to arise on something which is entirely outside the ordinary business of the office.

Provision is made that a certain class of persons, of whom Mr. Odell may or may not be one, shall be entitled to an indemnity, and that indemnity is guaranteed by the Treasury. We need not consider now whether it is the insurance fund that has to pay or the Treasury that has to pay. A fund is created one way or another out of which indemnity is to be paid, and in certain cases that indemnity arises. Then the Act provides how it is to be ascertained whether a person who applies for the benefit of that indemnity fund is entitled to it or not. By section 7, sub-section 5, of the Act of 1897 it is enacted that "the registrar may, if the applicant desires it, and subject to an appeal to the court, determine whether a right to indemnity has arisen under this section, and, if so, award indemnity." Reading those words alone it is reasonably obvious that whatever the registrar does is subject to an appeal to the court; he is only a judge of first instance with an appeal, and it is only by reading the rest of the words, and from them raising an implication, which I do not think can fairly be raised, that you can say that no one is to appeal but the applicant. Of course the registrar himself cannot be appellant against his own decision. The section continues: "In the event of an appeal to the court the applicant shall not be required to pay any costs except his own, even if unsuccessful, unless the court shall consider that the appeal is unreasonable." Now, from that it is argued, and with some plausibility, that the applicant is the only possible appellant, because there is no provision for costs except the applicant's costs. There is some foundation for that argument, but I do not think that the implication arising from that sentence ought to be considered strong enough to get rid of the first provision that there is to be an appeal to the court. If you once put the registrar into the judicial position which I think he must be held to occupy, an appeal to the court necessarily follows, unless, indeed, he is to sit as arbitrator. It seems to me that it cannot have been intended that he should sit as arbitrator; the word used, though not altogether inappropriate to an arbitration, is nevertheless not the appropriate word. What he has to do is to determine whether a right to indemnity has arisen under the section, and, if so, award the indemnity. He has not only to award whether the right to indemnity has arisen under the section, but he has to determine it, and that is the particular word which is used with regard to a judicial decision. The judge has to hear and determine. Whether the amount of the indemnity is right I am not considering now, nor how far there is an appeal as regards the amount of the indemnity. I do not by any means say there is not, but as regards the right to the indemnity, to my mind it is clear that the registrar had only to determine it as a judge.

Then I am told that if that is the right view, in every case where the indemnity is claimed these must be cited before the registrar either the Crown or the Attorney-General or the trustees, it matters not which. It seems to me that that really is the consequence and I am not by any means sure, this being the first case in which the question of indemnity has arisen, that the registrar would not have done better to insist on having the parties before him. He evidently thought that the case was perfectly plain. Well, I will not say perfectly plain, but he saw his way and did not think that necessary, but my present impression is that whenever cases of this kind arise it would be better for the registrar to say: I have to determine; I am not the arbitrator; I must have someone to argue not only in favour of the indemnity but against it. If that is the necessary consequence it does not seem to me to be one to be very highly deprecated, because the Court of Appeal will then have the advantage of the case having been argued before the registrar and of his decision as a judge of first instance which the court will be able to examine.

There is only one other point, or rather, I should say, two short points. The first is in whom is the right of appeal? It matters not, it seems to me, whether it is the Attorney-General on behalf of the Crown representing the Treasury or the trustees of the fund. They really are the same persons for this purpose. They are the protectors of the fund. The trustees might possibly have been sufficient. They would, no doubt, have done their duty to protect the fund, and the Attorney-General would do the same, except that the fund is not under the control of the Treasury in the first instance. It is under the control of the trustees, and therefore they are technically necessary parties. Being technically necessary parties the better way, it seems to me, is to do that which has been done in this particular case, which is to add the Attorney-General as a party on behalf of the Crown. If my view is right it is unnecessary to consider really whether they are persons aggrieved. I cannot conceive that they are otherwise, because the indemnity is to come out of the fund of which these trustees are trustees for all persons claiming indemnity and the Treasury behind them is the guarantor of the indemnity fund. If the registrar comes to an improper decision, as it is said he has done in this case, and has ordered indemnity to be paid where it ought not to be paid, then it seems to follow, and does follow, that money is being taken out of the fund and may be possibly demanded from the Treasury which ought not to be taken or demanded. Surely a person whoever it is from whom the money is taken or is demanded under an order which ought not to have been made is a person aggrieved. Under the circumstances I think the appeal to this court lies.

The duty of the court is confined to the construction of those provisions of the Land Transfer Act, 1897, which relate to the indemnity fund and the persons who are entitled to come upon that indemnity fund, and particularly the construction of section 7 of the Act. Now, of course, in order to understand that, one must study all the other sections of the same Act which bear upon the subject at all and the other sections of the Act of 1875 which bear on the subject, but I venture to think that although it is not possible to avoid going outside to some extent it is dangerous to go much outside the two Acts, and that one must consider with very great care the application of any authority dealing with Acts of Parliament under different circumstances and different contractual relations. It is to my mind very much like the duty of the court in the construction of a will. There are certain phrases which have received construction and by which one not only is guided, but is bound. Certain principles have been laid down from time to time which apply to all wills of a similar character, but beyond using authorities of that kind in that way, it is undesirable in most cases to use any authorities at all, because one is necessarily construing different language used in reference to different circumstances and to different relations. Therefore I am not deposed to look too much for guidance nor to find much guidance in any of the cases that have been cited. There are one or two which I think are valuable and which I am bearing in mind, but my own opinion is that it is better rather to ignore them, at any rate when one has once grasped the principle on which the cases are decided, and endeavour to see how far it is applicable or inapplicable to the question in hand.

Turning to the seventh section of the Act of 1897, it seems to me that the first impression from—I do not mean, of course, only a cursory reading of the section, but from a study of it—that which appeals in the first instance to one's intelligence when one comes to the end and reflects upon the contents of it, is, that the Legislature intended to provide an indemnity to all persons with certain exceptions—certain personal exceptions—who suffered loss by reason of fraud or mistake in the registration of transfers under the Act. That is the first impression. When one looks into it more carefully, having in view the remarks which have been made on the section, that first impression seems to me to be confirmed as being the right view of the Act. The Legislature may possibly have intended to leave something out. It may have left some claim out inadvertently or some claim which otherwise would appear to fall within it which may be excepted from it by reason of the proviso, for it all deserves attention; but, generally speaking, it seems to be a carefully framed proviso intended to embrace all the cases of loss under such circumstances as I have mentioned.

Now, the first sub-section clearly deals only with cases where no rectification was possible under the Act of 1875. That is not a case such as we are dealing with here, where rectification was possible under the Act of 1875, and the only importance of that sub-section is to see that it falls into line in a well-arranged code, I was going to say, but a well-arranged schedule of cases to which the provision for indemnity is intended to apply. Having got rid of those cases en bloc where there is no rectification under the principal Act, then we come to another clause which at first is not so simple or not so easy to understand—viz., sub-section 2, which might perhaps but for one consideration grasp or include such a case as this which we have here, where there is a registered disposition which is absolutely void by reason of forgery and where the register has to be rectified. But the observation upon that is that we have a direct provision here that the register shall be rectified under this section, and it seems to follow logically that this sub-section cannot be intended to apply to a case in which rectification was already possible. It follows on sub-section 1, which deals with cases where registration was not possible, and then it goes on apparently to deal with the case where it has not been possible but shall now be possible; and to include in a provision of that kind a case in which rectification is already possible would seem to contradict the provisions of the Act, or at any rate make one construe it as applying to cases where there is no necessity for providing now in 1897 for rectification. That seems to me to be a good sound comment on the Act and sub-section, and to show that this case which might otherwise fall within it was not intended to fall within it. Sub-section 3 has a proviso which must be looked at presently, but it is a proviso certainly on sub-section 2, and possibly a proviso on the interpretation of some other sub-sections, but let us pass it by now. Then we come to sub-section 4, which is the only other sub-section specifying cases in which the provisions for indemnity are to apply. Now that passes on to a different clause. We deal under sub-section 1 with cases where rectification was not possible under the principal Act, we deal under sub-section 2 with cases where it was intended now to apply the rule of rectification to cases where rectification was not possible under the principal Act. Now we deal with cases where the register could be rectified under the principal Act, and confessedly looking at section 98 of the principal Act, the case of an original grant—that is to say, where there has been no transfer by the grantee at all either for value or voluntarily, does come within that clause. I do not propose to pause to consider whether each case falls within the clause, that one particular case certainly does. This sub-section does certainly embrace a case where the man who is coming for a claim on the indemnity fund was himself the transferee, and who has, according to his own view which has to be examined, been aggrieved, suffered loss is the proper phrase by reason of what has occurred through a fraud or mistake. There can be no question that it does fall within that, and to my mind there is no reason why, unless there is some proviso or exception to exclude him, he should not come on the indemnity fund if he once convinces the registrar he has suffered loss by reason of fraud or mistake. There is one exception here which one must notice in the body of this sub-section 4, and that is that he is not to have any indemnity if he was aware of or could by the exercise of reasonable care have discovered the fraud or mistake which induced the loss. It is put in the section in just a slightly different way, but I have expressed the meaning. That may on some future occasion give rise to much discussion because we might have an entirely different state of facts, where a very serious question will arise whether the grantee was not aware of and could not by the exercise of reasonable care discover that forgery or other fraud existed. There is no question about that here. It has not been argued that Mr. Odell did not act reasonably and adopt all reasonable care and diligence; it is impossible to impute the want of that to him. Notice also could not be imputed, but I do not know that the words "was not aware of" do not include notice in the equitable sense of the word. It therefore comes, as it seems to me, clearly within the Act and within the sub-section according to the meaning of the words. But it does not follow that, therefore, Mr. Odell, the applicant, is entitled to indemnity, because he is only to be entitled "likewise"—that is to say, in the same way as others, which I think must mean also subject to the same liabilities, and he is to suffer, as others do, loss by rectification. I have to consider whether he has suffered loss by rectification, or whether by reason of the "likewise" or by reason of the "otherwise" in the application of sub-section 3 he is otherwise debarred from claiming the indemnity if he is entitled to it. Now we have throughout these sections a reference to loss by rectification; we find it in sub-section 2: "The register shall be rectified and the person suffering loss by the rectification shall be entitled to the indemnity," and in sub-section 4 we have "The person suffering loss by the rectification." The words are the same in section 1: "Any person suffering loss thereby," and "thereby" clearly refers to rectification. Now, has Mr. Odell suffered loss by rectification? He has certainly suffered loss. He paid for the transfer of a registered charge. It was transferred to him; it has been vacated; the register has been rectified; his money has gone and he is no longer the owner and proprietor of that charge. In connection with his defence of his rights he has incurred certain costs which nobody says were improperly incurred by him in assertion of what he believed to be his rights. So that there is no question he has suffered loss. But has he suffered it by reason of the rectification? Has he suffered it by the rectification? Now, the first argument against him is this. The loss was occasioned by the forgery—that is to say, by there being in existence a deed purporting to be executed by Mrs. Connell, the registered proprietor of the charge, but not in fact executed by her. That has occasioned the loss. The property was gone—that is to say, his property was gone, or rather, he never had any property at all—that is the more proper view. When he advanced his money and accepted what he thought to be a transfer of the charge, he paid his money for nothing. No transfer had really been registered. There had been executed between him and Mrs. Connell no deed at all, and therefore what occasioned the loss was the forged deed, and not the rectification of the register when the fraud was discovered. Then, further, it was urged that, having got on the register, he could do nothing; at any rate, as soon as he knew that there had been a forgery, he could not possibly have transferred to anyone else. He might possibly have done it before he discovered that, and there was an interval during which he was in the position of registered owner of the charge, with power, as the registered owner, to transfer, and possibly to make title to a third person, but he got something with which he could not deal, because it really had no existence. Therefore, again, he has not suffered loss by the rectification. He has suffered loss by unfortunately paying for and holding something with which he could not deal, and which was not valuable in his hands. That is the argument on that part of the case. Now it seems to me that is giving too narrow a construction to the words "by the rectification." The rectification is the immediate cause of the loss. As long as he is on the register at any rate, he is the registered proprietor of the charge, and he has lost that status by the rectification. It is the rectification which has deprived him of it. It might or might not have been valuable; that depends on a good many circumstances, but it was his, and it is the rectification which, as I have said, is the proximate cause of the loss, though, no doubt, looking back step by step you see that the original cause was the forgery. It seems to me it would be giving too narrow a construction to the Act to hold that in a case like this the rectification was not the cause of the loss within the meaning of the Act; but if that be so I have to consider whether he is debarred from claiming indemnity by reason of his having "caused or substantially contributed to the loss by his act, neglect, or default." I am applying sub-section 3 to sub-section 4, for on the whole I think it ought to be so applied. There is a little difficulty in construction in so applying it, not because it comes first in the Act—although it is a little out of order—but because, as I have already mentioned, sub-section 4 has its own restrictions on the claim of the grantee who may not have been aware of, and not have been able, by the exercise of reasonable care, to discover the fraud or mistake. It does seem a little strange, notwithstanding that special provision there, that the grantee should be affected by the provisions of sub-section 3. Still, I think it is general in its terms. It is found as a sub-section in this section, "persons claiming indemnity." The word is "indemnity" and so forth, and I think besides, although that is a mere verbal argument, that the word "likewise" at the end of sub-section 4, while it certainly means that the persons suffering shall be entitled to the indemnity in the same way as others are entitled to it, must also mean, subject to the restrictions. Now has he done this. He must have "caused or substantially contributed to the loss by his act, neglect, or default." The first suggestion is that "act" means something ejusdem generis with "neglect or default." Now that is rather a startling proposition; "act" is commission, something done, "neglect or default" are necessarily omissions, something left undone. I confess myself a little startled with the argument to say that an act of commission is ejusdem generis with an act of omission. I doubt whether you could apply a doctrine which after all is of very dangerous application to such a case as this. I think you must take "act" as standing alone and construe it, no doubt in connection with "neglect or default," but as meaning something done by them which either causes or substantially contributes (whatever that may mean) to the loss. There is one thing, and one thing only, that Mr. Odell has done, and that is that, having acquired the charge, he carried in, either personally or by his solicitor—it is quite immaterial which—the transfer of the charge for registration and asked that it might be registered. One may put it against him in the strongest possible way that he demanded registration of the tranfer to him purporting to be executed by Mrs. Connell. Now has he thereby substantially contributed to the loss by his act. In one sense he certainly has, because if he had left it alone, if nothing had ever been done, whether he paid his money or not, if he had simply omitted to carry in the transfer the registrar would not have been called upon to register the transfer of charge, Mr. Odell would never have obtained any apparent rights under it, and when Mrs. Connell came to claim her own she would have found her own unaffected by any transfer by a document purporting to be executed by her. So even after he had taken it in for registration and given due notice of it, he might even then not have insisted on its being registered, but, of course, he did. In that sense he has therefore contributed to the loss by his act. Now is that an act which is contemplated in this sub-section as what is intended to deprive a man of what he would otherwise be entitled to in my view—namely, indemnity for the loss he has suffered. I cannot think that it is. It must mean something independently of completing the transfer. The only person who can claim indemnity, or the only person who can have suffered loss, at any rate in such a case as we have to deal with, is the transferee or grantee, and he must, in order to put himself in a position to claim the indemnity, have put himself on the register, and must, being on the register, have had his name taken off the register. The register as well must have been rectified, or otherwise no claim to indemnity would have accrued. It seems to me impossible to suppose that the Legislature could have intended that merely requiring the registrar to perform his ministerial office of entering on the register this transfer of charge can be an act which substantially contributed to the loss. There I think those cases that have been cited about the registration of shares in companies, and particularly the case of Sheffield Corporation v. Barclay, 52 W. R. 54, [1903] 2 K. B. 580, do come in useful. They do enable one to see that such an act as is there mentioned must mean something like a voluntary act on the part of the person making the claim; something outside the mere transaction of procuring the registration. It is not necessary to consider what would do it, because, generally speaking, what is intended is that the man shall not claim if really he has induced the result in respect of which now he claims indemnity. He does nothing of that kind here; all he really has done is innocently to purchase a transfer of a charge, and then, having purchased it, to treat it in the regular manner. If that be so it is not necessary to go any further. But I wish to say one word about the case raised by way of a sort of answer to this, a sort of counterblast—namely, that Mr. Odell, even if he is not himself perfectly clear, ought not to lose his right to an indemnity because he was not protected by the register. To my mind there is not the slightest reason for any such argument. In fact, I think it is entirely unfounded. The matter was completed in the regular way. It seems to me that everything that had to be done was done with perfect regularity and propriety, and the unfortunate absence of Mrs. Connell, which resulted in the knowledge of the forgery not becoming known so soon as otherwise it would have been, is certainly no more the fault of the registrar than it was of Mrs. Connell. It seems to me that I am dealing here with a case in which everybody is innocent excepting the forger—that is to say, I have the parties here, the registrar, the trustees of the fund, and Mr. Odell, all taking their stand under the Act, which they are entitled, of course, to do, and thereupon arguing in support of their rights; but there is no moral obliquity on the part of any of them. There is no act, neglect, or default on either side. The claim is occasioned simply by their misfortune, and I confess, as it seems to me that we have here a clear case provided for by the Act. I am told it cannot have been contemplated by the Act, and I am told that the indemnity fund may be exhausted, and also, I believe, that the Treasury may be exhausted. I am not going so far, or anything near so far, as to say that if this is not a case within the Act, it is difficult to say what other case is within the Act; but I do say most distinctly that in my opinion this case does fall within it.

Solicitors, The Treasury Solicitor; J. T. Rossiter.

House of Lords.

From C.A. (England). April 3.

WATT v. WATT. (a.)

Practice — New trial—Excessive damages—Power of Court of Appeal to reduce—Consent of both parties.

In an action for tort the Court of Appeal has no jurisdiction to order the reduction of the damages given by the jury without the consent of both parties to the litigation.

Belt v. Lawes (32 W. R. 607, 12 Q. B. D. 356) overruled.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) setting aside a judgment of Bruce, J., and directing a new trial unless the plaintiff (the present respondent) should consent to reduction of the damages to £1,500, which the plaintiff accepted through her solicitors within the time prescribed.

The action was for libel, in which the jury gave the plaintiff damages for £5,000, and upon an application for a new trial the above-mentioned order was made.

Rufus Isaacs, K.C., and J. R. Atkin, for the appellant.

Lawson Walton, K.C., and T. Mathew, for the respondent.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case I think there ought to be a new trial. I say this quite independently of what I have to say hereafter upon the subject of the jurisdiction of the court to direct the amount of damages without the consent of both parties to the litigation. I think the trial itself was most unsatisfactory, and the verdict ought not to be permitted to stand. The learned counsel for the plaintiff in his opening speech read a letter which was written without prejudice, and which was undoubtedly well calculated to influence the jury against the defendant. It is only justice to the learned counsel to say that he was under the impression that it was not written without prejudice—an impression which he retained up to the time of the argument before your lordships—and he was only undeceived when the letter itself was produced. It is not necessary to discuss how it could have been evidence against the female defendant under any circumstances. It was a letter written by the husband to one of the solicitors in the case, and assumed to be evidence of malice on the part of the female defendant, because it was a copy in her handwriting. I will only say that I do not assent to its being evidence against her—its only relevancy being to show malice by her, and simply without more proof of authorship than that it was in her handwriting and a copy of her husband's letter. On the other hand, the plaintiff was encountered by a most insulting and offensive cross-examination, for some parts of which there does not seem to be the least justification. Even in mitigation of damages it is well settled you cannot go into evidence which, if proved, would constitute a justification. Nor does it appear to me that it makes any difference that the evidence is offered in cross-examination. See this question discussed in Watson v. Christie, 1 B. & P., p. 225, and Speck v. Phillips, 5 M. & W. 281. Of course, speaking generally, parties take their risk of such a course, and inflame the damages against themselves by such a proceeding; but in extreme cases, such as this is, I think the courts ought not to allow such an extravagant result, even though the parties have procured it by the conduct of which their representatives have been guilty. The whole theory of the jurisdiction of the courts to interfere with the verdict of the constitutional tribunal is that the court is satisfied that the jury have not really acted reasonably upon the evidence, but have been misled by prejudice or passion; and the conduct to which I have referred was what could not have been prevented by the learned judge, because if an objection had been made to the cross-examination in question the reply would have been that the party here was a witness, and every question to her credit was admissible; but that does not affect the controlling power of the court, if the court is satisfied that the jury have been misled. I remember a new trial granted because the learned counsel for the plaintiff read to the jury the amount of damages claimed in the declaration. Under the circumstances I think it is the duty of the court to interfere and remit the cause to be heard again under circumstances better calculated to secure a reasonable verdict. I do not think it is a case in which your lordships should follow the precedent of Cumming v. Sibley, 2 Burrows, or ord. 39, r. 7.

I am, however, further of opinion that the court has no jurisdiction to fix the amount of damages without the consent of both parties. This question was raised in Belt v. Lawes, 32 W. R. 607, 12 Q. B. D. 356, and though it was not necessary for the decision in that case, a weighty opinion was given by my noble friend Lord Lindley, which has made me hesitate before I come to a conclusion opposed to his. There has been doubtless some confusion in discussing the question of damages arising from the mode in which our law has grown up. The court itself has the right, and has exercised it in various ways when the question has arisen upon demurrer or default. It may send it, as has been commonly the practice, to the sheriff to assess; but it has the right, which has always been asserted, to decide that question for itself —probably because that question is often a question of law, where the damages are fixed by law, and where it was mere matter of law it was established in very early times (10 Hen. 6) that the court itself could even increase the damages, and so the learned editor of Reeves's History of the Common Law says: "There was always this distinction between trial by jury and mere inquisition or inquiry by a jury to assess damages—that in the latter case the inquisition was only to inform the mind of the court, and it was at their discretion whether they would award judgment for the amount found by the jury, whereas upon a trial they had no jurisdiction to interfere as to the amount of damages in cases of tort"; but where the jury had found larger damages than were laid in the declaration, the court held they were entitled to restrict them to the amount claimed (2 Hen. 6, 7). The courts, how-

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

